[E] Nothing was more commendable in Drusus, than the Friendship he preserved for Germanicus. Germanicus had been adopted by the Emperor: so that he was Presumptive Heir as well as Drusus. But besides that he was the darling of the People; he had performed some great Actions, and was possessed of shining Qualities. Drusus had none of these Advantages. How could he forbear hating such a Rival? How came it to pass, that a Soul so ill inclined, should yet do Justice to Germanicus, love Germanicus? We must acknowledge in this the strange Power of Constitution: Vices have not such a Connection with one another as is imagined, and there are some Virtues which are better preserved in a Heart eminently vicious, than in one that is moderately so. I have not mentioned all the Causes capable of raising Jealousy in the Soul of Drusus. Nay I had forgot the principal Reasons, which will be found in the following Words of Tacitus. The Court was divided between Drusus and Germanicus; their respective Friends quarrelled with each other, and only the Heads of the two Factions were agreed. 'Divisa & discors aula erat; tacitis in Drusum, aut Germanicum studiis. Tiberius ut proprium, & sui sanguinis Drusum fovebat: Germanico alienatio patrum amorem apud ceteros auxerat, & quia claritudine materni generis antehat, avum Marcum Antonium, avunculum Augustum ferens. Contra Druso proavus eques Romanus, Pomponius Atticus, dedecere Claudiorum imagines videbatur, & conjunx Germanici Agrippina, fecunditate ac fama Liviam uxorem Drusi præcellebat: sed fratres egregie concordores & proximorum certaminibus inconcussi (22). — The Court was divided in their Interest, some declaring for Drusus, others for Germanicus. Tiberius espoused the Party of Drusus as of his own Son. This Partiality rendered Germanicus dearer to the rest, add to this his being more nobly descended by the Mother's side; Grand-son of Marc Antony, and Nephew of Augustus. On the other hand, Pomponius Atticus, Great Grand-father of Drusus, was only a Roman Knight, and seemed to cast a Shade on the Claudian Family. Besides, Agrippina, Wife of Germanicus, had the advantage of Livia, Wife of Drusus, in Fruitfulness and Reputation; but the Brothers maintained for each other an unshaken Affection, amidst the Emulation of their Partizans.' Here is likewise another Passage of Tacitus, in which Tiberius extols to the Senate Drusus's Friendship for the Sons of Germanicus. 'Adidit orationem Cæsar multa cum laude filii sui quod patria benevolentia in fratris liberos foret, nam Drusus (quamquam arduum sit eodem loci potentiam & concordiam esse) æquus adolescentibus, aut certo non adversus habebatur (23). — The Emperor completed the Ceremony with an Harangue, wherein he highly extolled the fatherly Affection which his Son had shewed to his Nephews, for (however Power and Concord are seldom consistent with each other) Drusus was a Friend, at least no Enemy, to the young Princes.' The Historian touches upon the Reason why we should judge that Drusus performed in this a very difficult Thing, which Reason is the Competition for Power. Upon this Principle, when Piso saw himself charged with the Death of Germanicus, he applied himself to Drusus not doubting to bring him easily over to his Interest (24); he imagined that a Man who had delivered Drusus from a very dangerous Rival would not be looked upon with an ill Eye: but all he could draw from him was a very ambiguous Answer, which was taken for a Lesson of Tiberius; there appearing nothing in it of the open and uncircumspect humour of Drusus. 'Neque dubitabantur præscripta ei à Tiberio, cum inacidulus alioqui & faciliis juvenia senilibus tum artibus uteretur (25). — No one questioned, but all this was done by the Emperor's Directions; since Drusus was too free, and unreserved, to have put a piece of Policy in Practice so much beyond his Years.'

(22) Tacit. Ann. lib. ii, cap. 43.

(23) Idem, Ann. lib. iv, cap. 4.

(24) Piso premissis in urbem filio datusque mandatis per quos principem moliret, ad Drusum pergit quem haud fratris interitu truem, quam re motu amulo æquorem sibi sperabat. Piso having sent his Son to Rome, with Directions how to soften the Emperor, went to Drusus, from whom he expected more countenance for removing a Rival, than displeasure for taking off a Brother. Idem, lib. iii, cap. 8.

(25) Idem, ibid.

DRUSUS, the Son of Germanicus and Agrippina, was at first advanced to public Employments before the competent Age, and that by the Recommendation of Tiberius himself (a); but afterwards he was ruined by the Artifices of Sejanus [A]. That wicked Favourite

[A] He was ruined by the Artifices of Sejanus. We shall see a detestable Contrivance: Sejanus had his Spies every where, and spared no pains to aggrandize himself. As he aspired to the Empire, he began by making away with Drusus, who, in the Quality of Tiberius's Son, possessed the first Rank in the Order of Succession. Nero, the eldest Son of Germanicus, was next to Drusus; and the second Object of Sejanus's Machinations. Every word he spoke, was carried to the Favourite, which often furnished matter of Accusation; for though he had no ill Intentions, yet some imprudent Expressions would fall from him, to which the precipitate Counsels of his Friends contributed not a little. These Men, tired with his ill Fortune, advised him, more for their own Interest than his, to use some threatening, as the true way to Power. Whereupon, some Words escaped him, which were aggravated into Crimes. 'Maximeque insectantur Nerone proximum successioni, & quamquam modesta juvenia, plerumque tamen quid in presentiarum conduceret oblitum; dum à libertis & clientibus adipiscendæ potentia: properis exstimulatur, ut cretum & fidem animi ostenderet: velle id populum Romanum: cupere exercitus: neque ausurum contra Sejanum, qui nunc patientiam senis, & segnitiam juvenis iuxta insultet. Hæc atque talia audienti, nihil quidem pravæ cogitationis: sed interdum voces procedebant contumaces, & inconsultæ; quas adpositi custodes exceptas audiasque cum deferrent, &c (1). — Their Plot was levelled principally against

(a) Compare Tacitus, Ann. lib. iii, cap. 29; with Ann. lib. iv, cap. 4.

(1) Tacit. Ann. lib. iv, cap. 59. ad ann. 779.

Favourite had the Pleasure to see him committed to Prison; but not that of seeing him dead, for he himself died before Drusus. The condition of the latter was nothing the better for this; for they exposed him in such a cruel manner, to the rage of Hunger, that he was forced to eat the Flocks of his Mattress [B]. He languished in this Condition untill the ninth Day. After his Death, Tiberius had the Cruelty to accuse him to the Senate, and the Weakness to discover by this means the inhuman Treatment the unhappy Prince had suffered [C], during his Imprisonment; there was a Report that he had been seen in the Isles of the Ægean Sea. Tacitus, in informing us by whom this

* Nero, the next in Succession; and however discreet the young Prince might be, yet he too often suffered himself to be unseasonably transported, his Clients and Freedmen, in order to make their court to him, pushing him on; telling him, that the People of Rome were impatient to see him exert himself; that Sejanus, who now condemned the Indolence of Tiberius, and his Successor's Youth, would not dare to oppose him. Though he might bear these and such like Arguments, without receiving any ill Impressions; yet, he sometimes let fall some haughty and unguarded Expressions, which were carried by the Spies, which were placed about him, to the ear of Tiberius, and seldom lost any thing by the way. He was never free from Informers: his very Sighs, his Behaviour, asleep or awake, were carried to the Favourite. His Wife gave an Account of all to her Mother, and she to Sejanus. * Ne nox quidem secura cum uxor vigilias, somnos, suspiria matri Livie, atque illa Sejanus patetaceret (2). His Brother Drusus (3) became his Enemy. Sejanus had the cunning to gain him over, by letting him know that the first Place was secured to him by the Death of Nero; at the same time Sejanus laid the Foundation of the ruin of this Drusus, who fell into that Snare, not only out of Ambition, but because, according to Custom, he hated his Brother, and envied him the Preference he saw him favoured with, from Agrippina their common Mother. * Qui (Sejanus) fratrem quoque Neronis Drusum traxit in partes, spe obiecta principis loci, si priorem ætate & jam labefactum demovisset. Atrox Drusi ingenium super cupidinem potentie, & solita fratribus odia, accendebatur invidia, quod mater Agrippina promptior Neroni erat. Neque tamen Sejanus ita Drusum fovebat, ut non in eum quoque semina futuri exitii meditaretur; gnarus præferentem, & insidiis magis opportunum (4). — Sejanus had also drawn Drusus, Nero's Brother, to his Party, by inspiring him with hopes of the Empire, if he removed his elder Brother. Drusus had a fiery Temper, and, besides the ordinary Jealousy of Brothers, and the natural Thirst of Power, he was fired with Envy, because his Mother, Agrippina, had shewed a greater Affection for Nero. But Sejanus's intent was to decoy him into the snare likewise, knowing him to be of a violent Disposition, and seldom on his Guard. Mr de Tillemont is mistaken when he says, that Nero's own Wife promoted his ruin, by giving an Account to the Empress Livia of his most secret Actions (5). It was to Livia her Mother, the Wife of Drusus, Tiberius's Son, that she gave Information, and not to the Empress Livia. I forgot to say that Sejanus set spies upon Nero and his Mother Agrippina, whose business was to keep a Journal of all they observed (6). He also suborned Persons, who advised that Lady and her Son to go to the Army in Germany, or implore the Protection of the Public. They rejected these Counsels, and yet they were accused of lending an ear to them.

[B] They exposed him in such a cruel Manner, to the rage of Hunger, that he was forced to eat the Flocks of his Mattress. The Artifices, mentioned in the preceding Remark, did not fail of Success in the Hands of Sejanus, especially Tiberius desired nothing more than to destroy those young Princes. He suborned some Persons who prompted them to murmur and curse him, and when he had got together the Heads of an Accusation, he filled a Letter with them with great bitterness and got Nero and Drusus declared Enemies to the State. Upon which one of them was sent into the Island of Pontia, where he was forced to kill himself, an Executioner presenting himself to him with the Instruments of Death, and telling him he was come to execute the Orders of the Senate: the other, which was our Drusus, was confined in the Palace, and starved to Death. Let us hear Suetonius (7): * Ut comperit ineunte anno pro eorum quoque salute publica vota suscepta: egit cum Senatu, Non debere talia præmia tribui, nisi expertis ætate provectis: atque ex eo, patefacta interiore animi sui nota, omnium criminationibus obnoxios reddidit: varique fraude inductos, ut & concitarentur ad convitia & concitati perderentur, accusavit per literas, amarissime congestis etiam probris, & judicatos hostes fame necavit: Neronem in insula Pontia: Drusum, in ima parte Palatii. Putant Neronem ad voluntarium mortem coactum, cum ei carnis ex, quasi ex Senatus auctoritate missus, laqueos & uncas ostentaret: Druso autem adeo alimenta subducta, ut tomentum e culcitra tentaverit mandere: amborum sic reliquis dispersis, ut vix quandoque colligi possent. — When he saw, in the beginning of the Year, that public Vows were also offered for their Health, he represented to the Senate, that such Honours ought only to be paid to Persons advanced in Years, and such whose Vertues had been proved. Thus having discovered his inmost Sentiments, from that they were exposed to the Malice of every one; and by various Wiles having induced them to reflect upon him, in order to take them off, he accused them by Letter, loading them with Reproaches, and having obtained a Decree against them, caused them to be starved to Death: Nero, in the Island Pontia; and Drusus in the most retired part of the Palace. Some think that Nero put an end to his own Life, the Executioner, as tho' sent by the Authority of the Senate, having shook before him the Halter and Hook. Drusus was reduced to such Extremity that he attempted to eat the stuffing out of his Bed. The Bodies of both were so mangled and dispersed, that it was no easy Matter to bring them together. Tacitus goes much farther. He says that Drusus supported his Life for nine Days with this Nourishment. Drusus deinde extinguitur cum se miserandis alimentis mandendo ex cubili tomento nonum ad diem detinuisse (8). — Drusus at length died, having supported himself with the wretched Repast of the stuffing of his Bed, to the ninth Day. This happened two Years after the Death of Sejanus (9). We must not forget that Tiberius was in such a Consternation when he was informed of the Machinations of that Favourite, that he had some Thoughts of taking Drusus out of Prison, to oppose him to Sejanus. Tradidere quidam descriptum fuisse Macroni, si arma ab Sejanus tentarentur extractum custodia juvenem (nam in palatio atinebatur) ducent populo imponere (10). — Some say that Macro had orders, if Sejanus had recourse to Arms, to release the Prince (for he was confined in the Palace) and present him to the People.

[C] Tiberius accused him . . . and had the Weakness to discover, by this means, the inhuman Treatment, the unhappy Prince suffered. Those who guarded Drusus kept a Journal of all he did, or said, during his Confinement. This Journal was so exact, that in it were set down the Names of the Slaves, who had beaten or terrified the Prisoner when he went out of his Chamber. There were seen in it the Curses he pronounced with his dying Breath, against the Author of his cruel Persecution. The Refusals of a morsel of Bread to him; the blows by which the Slaves knocked him down, and such like Things. All this Tiberius was not ashamed to order to be read in the Senate. Quin & investus in defunctum, probra corporis, exitiabilem in suos, insensum Reipublicæ animus obiect: recitarique factorum dictorumque ejus descripta per dies iussit. Quo non aliud atrocius visum: addidisse tot per annos, qui vultum, gemitus, occultum etiam murmur exciperent; & potuisse avum audire, legere, in publicum promovere, vix fides: nisi quod Actii Centurionis, & Didymi liberti epistolæ, servorum nomina præferebant, ut qui egredientem cubiculo Drusum pullaverat, exterruerat; etiam nius (7): * Ut comperit ineunte anno pro eorum quoque salute publica vota suscepta: egit cum Senatu, Non debere talia præmia tribui, nisi expertis ætate provectis: atque ex eo, patefacta interiore animi sui nota, omnium criminationibus obnoxios reddidit: varique fraude inductos, ut & concitarentur ad convitia & concitati perderentur, accusavit per literas, amarissime congestis etiam probris, & judicatos hostes fame necavit: Neronem in insula Pontia: Drusum, in ima parte Palatii. Putant Neronem ad voluntarium mortem coactum, cum ei carnis ex, quasi ex Senatus auctoritate missus, laqueos & uncas ostentaret: Druso autem adeo alimenta subducta, ut tomentum e culcitra tentaverit mandere: amborum sic reliquis dispersis, ut vix quandoque colligi possent. —

When he saw, in the beginning of the Year, that public Vows were also offered for their Health, he represented to the Senate, that such Honours ought only to be paid to Persons advanced in Years, and such whose Vertues had been proved. Thus having discovered his inmost Sentiments, from that they were exposed to the Malice of every one; and by various Wiles having induced them to reflect upon him, in order to take them off, he accused them by Letter, loading them with Reproaches, and having obtained a Decree against them, caused them to be starved to Death: Nero, in the Island Pontia; and Drusus in the most retired part of the Palace. Some think that Nero put an end to his own Life, the Executioner, as tho' sent by the Authority of the Senate, having shook before him the Halter and Hook. Drusus was reduced to such Extremity that he attempted to eat the stuffing out of his Bed. The Bodies of both were so mangled and dispersed, that it was no easy Matter to bring them together. Tacitus goes much farther. He says that Drusus supported his Life for nine Days with this Nourishment. Drusus deinde extinguitur cum se miserandis alimentis mandendo ex cubili tomento nonum ad diem detinuisse (8). — Drusus at length died, having supported himself with the wretched Repast of the stuffing of his Bed, to the ninth Day. This happened two Years after the Death of Sejanus (9). We must not forget that Tiberius was in such a Consternation when he was informed of the Machinations of that Favourite, that he had some Thoughts of taking Drusus out of Prison, to oppose him to Sejanus. Tradidere quidam descriptum fuisse Macroni, si arma ab Sejanus tentarentur extractum custodia juvenem (nam in palatio atinebatur) ducent populo imponere (10). — Some say that Macro had orders, if Sejanus had recourse to Arms, to release the Prince (for he was confined in the Palace) and present him to the People.

When he saw, in the beginning of the Year, that public Vows were also offered for their Health, he represented to the Senate, that such Honours ought only to be paid to Persons advanced in Years, and such whose Vertues had been proved. Thus having discovered his inmost Sentiments, from that they were exposed to the Malice of every one; and by various Wiles having induced them to reflect upon him, in order to take them off, he accused them by Letter, loading them with Reproaches, and having obtained a Decree against them, caused them to be starved to Death: Nero, in the Island Pontia; and Drusus in the most retired part of the Palace. Some think that Nero put an end to his own Life, the Executioner, as tho' sent by the Authority of the Senate, having shook before him the Halter and Hook. Drusus was reduced to such Extremity that he attempted to eat the stuffing out of his Bed. The Bodies of both were so mangled and dispersed, that it was no easy Matter to bring them together. Tacitus goes much farther. He says that Drusus supported his Life for nine Days with this Nourishment. Drusus deinde extinguitur cum se miserandis alimentis mandendo ex cubili tomento nonum ad diem detinuisse (8). — Drusus at length died, having supported himself with the wretched Repast of the stuffing of his Bed, to the ninth Day. This happened two Years after the Death of Sejanus (9). We must not forget that Tiberius was in such a Consternation when he was informed of the Machinations of that Favourite, that he had some Thoughts of taking Drusus out of Prison, to oppose him to Sejanus. Tradidere quidam descriptum fuisse Macroni, si arma ab Sejanus tentarentur extractum custodia juvenem (nam in palatio atinebatur) ducent populo imponere (10). — Some say that Macro had orders, if Sejanus had recourse to Arms, to release the Prince (for he was confined in the Palace) and present him to the People.

When he saw, in the beginning of the Year, that public Vows were also offered for their Health, he represented to the Senate, that such Honours ought only to be paid to Persons advanced in Years, and such whose Vertues had been proved. Thus having discovered his inmost Sentiments, from that they were exposed to the Malice of every one; and by various Wiles having induced them to reflect upon him, in order to take them off, he accused them by Letter, loading them with Reproaches, and having obtained a Decree against them, caused them to be starved to Death: Nero, in the Island Pontia; and Drusus in the most retired part of the Palace. Some think that Nero put an end to his own Life, the Executioner, as tho' sent by the Authority of the Senate, having shook before him the Halter and Hook. Drusus was reduced to such Extremity that he attempted to eat the stuffing out of his Bed. The Bodies of both were so mangled and dispersed, that it was no easy Matter to bring them together. Tacitus goes much farther. He says that Drusus supported his Life for nine Days with this Nourishment. Drusus deinde extinguitur cum se miserandis alimentis mandendo ex cubili tomento nonum ad diem detinuisse (8). — Drusus at length died, having supported himself with the wretched Repast of the stuffing of his Bed, to the ninth Day. This happened two Years after the Death of Sejanus (9). We must not forget that Tiberius was in such a Consternation when he was informed of the Machinations of that Favourite, that he had some Thoughts of taking Drusus out of Prison, to oppose him to Sejanus. Tradidere quidam descriptum fuisse Macroni, si arma ab Sejanus tentarentur extractum custodia juvenem (nam in palatio atinebatur) ducent populo imponere (10). — Some say that Macro had orders, if Sejanus had recourse to Arms, to release the Prince (for he was confined in the Palace) and present him to the People.

When he saw, in the beginning of the Year, that public Vows were also offered for their Health, he represented to the Senate, that such Honours ought only to be paid to Persons advanced in Years, and such whose Vertues had been proved. Thus having discovered his inmost Sentiments, from that they were exposed to the Malice of every one; and by various Wiles having induced them to reflect upon him, in order to take them off, he accused them by Letter, loading them with Reproaches, and having obtained a Decree against them, caused them to be starved to Death: Nero, in the Island Pontia; and Drusus in the most retired part of the Palace. Some think that Nero put an end to his own Life, the Executioner, as tho' sent by the Authority of the Senate, having shook before him the Halter and Hook. Drusus was reduced to such Extremity that he attempted to eat the stuffing out of his Bed. The Bodies of both were so mangled and dispersed, that it was no easy Matter to bring them together. Tacitus goes much farther. He says that Drusus supported his Life for nine Days with this Nourishment. Drusus deinde extinguitur cum se miserandis alimentis mandendo ex cubili tomento nonum ad diem detinuisse (8). — Drusus at length died, having supported himself with the wretched Repast of the stuffing of his Bed, to the ninth Day. This happened two Years after the Death of Sejanus (9). We must not forget that Tiberius was in such a Consternation when he was informed of the Machinations of that Favourite, that he had some Thoughts of taking Drusus out of Prison, to oppose him to Sejanus. Tradidere quidam descriptum fuisse Macroni, si arma ab Sejanus tentarentur extractum custodia juvenem (nam in palatio atinebatur) ducent populo imponere (10). — Some say that Macro had orders, if Sejanus had recourse to Arms, to release the Prince (for he was confined in the Palace) and present him to the People.

(7) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 64.

(8) Tacit. Ann. lib. vi, cap. 23. ad ann. 786.

(9) The Year of Rome 786.

(10) Tacit. Ann. lib. vi, cap. 23. See also Suetonius in Tiberio, cap. 65.

(2) Idem, ibid. cap. 60.

(3) He was Germanicus's Son.

(4) Tacit. Ann. lib. vi, cap. 60.

(5) Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, Tom. I. pag. m. 145.

(6) Tacit. Ann. lib. vi, cap. 67.

this false Drusus was taken, does not fail to touch upon the secret Springs which excite those kinds of Rumours [D]. I do not find that Drusus had any other Offices than those of Augur (b), and Governor of Rome (c). He was very unhappy in his Marriage [E].

(b) Sueton. In Calig. cap. 12.
(c) Tacit. Ann. lib. 4, cap. 36, ad Ann. 778.

(11) Tacit. Ann. lib. vi. cap. 24.

etiam sua verba centurio sevitiae plena, tanquam egregium, voceque deficientis adiecerat (11). — Not content with this, he inveighed against the deceased, called up the deformity of his Body, his merciless Temper towards his own Friends, his implacable Aversion to the Government, and ordered the Journal of his Life, and Actions, to be publicly read. And what is still more heinous, Men were appointed to watch, so many Years, his Countenance, his Behaviour, his Discontent; which that a Grandfather should have the Power to bear, to read, and publish, is scarce credible, but that the Letters of Adrius, the Centurion, and Didymus the Freedman, expressly mention the Slaves Names, who struck or insulted Drusus at his coming out of his Chamber; the Centurion with a great deal of Vanity related his own insolent Carriage, and the dying words of the Prince. Had not the Senators good Reason to admire and dread Tiberius, who threw off the Mask so boldly, by deviating so evidently from his usual Dissimulation? — Obtrudant quidem patres specie detestandi, sed penetrabat pavor, & admiratio, callidum olim & tegendis sceleribus obscurum huc confidentiae venisse, ut tanquam dimotis parietibus ostenderet nepotem sub verbera centurionis, inter servorum ictus, extrema vitae alimenta frustra orantem. — The Senators interrupted the reading, under a Pretence that they abhorred the Thought; but horror and surprize were the real Cause, to see a Prince, hitherto famed for his Address in concealing his Faults, now draw the Curtain, and expose his own Grandson tortured by an Executioner, insulted by Slaves; and vainly imploring a little Sustenance with his dying Breath.

(12) Idem, ibid.

[D] Tacitus, in speaking of the pretended Drusus, does not fail to touch upon the secret Springs which excite those kinds of Rumours. Those, who were ill affected to the Government, gave ear to the Report of a Drusus escaped out of Prison, and those who loved Novelty, Revolutions, and Adventures, did the same. The Freedmen, who followed the counterfeit Drusus, and who pretended to believe that he was the true Son of Germanicus, easily found Credit; nothing was talked of but the vast Designs of this Drusus. This was enough to put all Greece into motion: they ran in Crouds to this Idol, and by earnestly wishing it were true, they came at length to be persuaded of the reality of their own Fictions. — Per idem tempus Asia atque Achaja exterritae sunt, acri magis quam diuturno rumore, Drusum Germanici filium apud Cyclades insulas, mox in continenti visum; & erat juvenis haud dispari aetate quibuldam Caesaris liberis, velut agnitus, per dolumque comitantibus. Alliciebantur ignari, fama nominis, & promptis Graecorum animis ad nova & mira: quippe lapsam custodia pergere ad paternos exercitus, Aegyptum aut Syriam involumum, fingebant simul, credebantque: jam juvenutis concursu, jam publicis studiis frequenta-

batur, laetus praesentibus, & inanium spe (12). — About the same time a Rumour ran through Asia and Greece, which, tho' but of short duration, greatly alarmed the People: That Drusus, Son of Germanicus, had been seen near the Cyclades, and afterwards on the Continent. It was a young Man, nearly of the same Age, attended, and seemingly espoused, by some of Caesar's Freedmen, in order to ruin him: Those who were not in the Secret stocked about him, being drawn by the Reputation of his Virtues, and the natural Curiosity of the Greeks after what is new or wonderful. The report was spread, and gained Credit, that he had made his escape, designing to put himself at the Head of his Father's Forces, and make a descent on Egypt or Syria. He was joined and caressed by the younger sort, transported at his present Success, and filled with imaginary Hopes, &c. Poppaeus Sabinus, Governor of Macedonia, was not idle, and he had Reason not to slight the Affair; the Faction might have made great Advantages of such a cheat. He made such dispatch that he seized the sham Prince. It may be remembered that, in the beginning of the XVIIth Century, all the Princes, who were Enemies to Spain, were very well pleased that the Impostor, who called himself Sebastian, King of Portugal, was not believed an Impostor; and if things had been put into Motion, all the Powers, jealous of the House of Austria, would have run to the Assistance of the pretended Sebastian. In England there were People, who maintained that the Duke of Monmouth was not taken (14), and that he, who was believed as such, was another Man. This ridiculous Story was seed sown at that Time, and which might have brought forth Fruit in it's Season. Factions Spirits were glad that this Opinion was not extinguished: Time will come perhaps, said they, when we shall want the Duke to allure the Populace. You will find some very remarkable things concerning the care that is taken to foment this Delusion, in the Historical Letters of the Month of October 1698 (15).

(12) Idem, Ann. lib. v, cap. 10, ad Ann. 784.

(14) In the Year 1686.

(15) Page 459, and following.

[E] He was very unhappy in his Marriage. We have lost that part of Tacitus, in which he mentioned the Marriage between Drusus and Emilia Lepida (16). If we had all the Annals of that incomparable Writer, we should know the horrible Persecutions Drusus underwent from that Woman. She was his Accuser, guilty as he was of a thousand Crimes, which rendered her incapable of being a Witness. She continued unpunished during the Life of her Father; but as soon as he was dead, the Informers accused her; and as it was known, she had committed Adultery with a Slave, she did not stand to make a Defence; she thought it best to put an end to her own Life (17). The curse of God was visible upon this Race. Germanicus himself, and his illustrious Wife, were involved in it.

(16) Emilia Lepida quam juveni Druso nuptam retuli. Emilia Lepida, who, as I mentioned before, married young Drusus. Tacit. Annal. lib. vi, cap. 209, ad Ann. 788. Nothing of this is found in the preceding Books.

(17) Idem, ibid.

DUAREN (FRANCIS) Professor of the Civil-Law at Bourges, in the XVIth Century, was of Saint-Brieux, a City of Bretagne: He was the first of the French Lawyers who purged the Chair in the Civil-Law Schools from the Barbarisms of the Glossaries, to introduce the pure Sources of the ancient Civil-Law: As he did not desire to share this glory with any body, he saw, with an envious Eye, the Reputation of his Colleague, Eguinard Baron, who also mixed good Literature with the Knowledge of the Civil-Law. This Jealousy prompted him to compose a Work, in which he endeavoured to lessen the Esteem they had for his Colleague (a) [A]. The Maxim

(a) Ex Sammarthano in Elogio, lib. 1, pag. m. 38.

Pascitur

[A] He composed a Work in which he endeavoured to lessen the Esteem they had for his Colleague. This design has been exposed in very strong Terms by St. Marthe. — Hominum opinioni de Baronis doctrina conceptae nonnihil detrahare conatus est, edita in eum de jurisdictione & imperio apologia malevoli animi teste in posterum futura (1). — He endeavoured to lessen the Opinion which Men had conceived of Baron, by publishing against him a Pamphlet intitled, Apologia de Jurisdictione & Imperio, which will stand as a lasting Witness of his Spleen and ill Nature. I looked for this Tract in Duaren's Works VOL. II.

(1) Sammarth. Elog. lib. 1, pag. 38.

and was surprized to find it so short (2), that it did not contain quite five Pages; but it appears by the Preamble (3), that the Author had reduced his Apology to what he calls summa Capita, and that he had suppressed the rest out of Compliance to Baron. He addresses this Abridgment to him, and dates it the first of January 1549. He observes that the Apology had been printed without his Knowledge the Year before, under the Name of Ambrosius Letus. Mr Tessier divides this Work into two, distinguishing the Treatise de Jurisdictione & Imperio from the Apologia adversus Eguinardum Baronem.

(2) In the Geneva Edition, 1608, in Folio.

(3) See pag. 283, of the second Part of Duaren's Works, Edit. Auct. Alubrog. 1608.

[B] I

(b) Posito sua pecunia in ejus honorem monumento. Sammarth. ubi supra.

(c) Papp. Musf. Elog. Parte II, pag. 257.

(d) Ballart. Académ. des Sciences. Tom. I. pag. 228. See also the Article BAUDOUIN, Remark [L].

(e) Theanus, Histor. lib. 23, pag. 4. 1.

(f) Sammarth. ubi supra.

Pascebat in vivis liquor, post fata quiescit, was verified in him; for after Baron's Death he shewed an ardent desire to eternize his Memory, and erected a Monument at his own Expence, in Honour of the deceased (b). He had other Colleagues who revived his uneasiness; he could not see, without grief, that the Reputation of Baudouin, younger than himself, began to soar high (c), and, after being delivered from that Thorn, he perceived that Cujas, who succeeded that dangerous Rival (d), had yet more Merit. He did not love this new Comer, which caused such Quarrels between them, as in the End might have raised great Confusion in the University of Bourges, if Cujas had not quitted the Field, and retired to Valence, to teach Civil-Law there (e). Duaren died in the Year 1559, at the Age of fifty Years, without ever being married (f). There are some things in Moreri which I have omitted, to avoid Repetitions; but I must explain better than he has done what relates to his Defect of Memory [B]. He has said nothing of a remarkable Circumstance which I must not conceal, viz. That it was reported Duaren was a Protestant, but never had the Courage to separate from the Church of Rome. Baudouin treated him as a Nicodemite and Prevaricator [C], and reproached him with

[B] I must explain, better than Moreri has done, what relates to his want of Memory. Mr Moreri gives out that 'Francis Duaren was forced to read the Speeches he composed, and that this want of Memory hindered him from imparting to the learned in Germany his Knowledge in the Civil-Law, for which Reason they lost something of the Value they had entertained for him.' He should have said that, not having a happy Memory, he never recited his Lectures without Book, but from his Notes. Wherefore upon his travelling into Germany, without his Collections, he never durst go into the Pulpit. They invited him to do it in several Places, and his refusal induced some ignorant and bad Judges to doubt of his Capacity. 'Erat Duarenus acerrimo quidem judicio, sed memoria minus felici, neque unquam nisi ex scripto prælegebat. Quo factum est ut in Germanico itinere cum passim à doctissimis viris ad prælegendum provocaretur, nec eorum utique desiderii obtemperare (quod à suis commentariis destitutus omnino sibi diffideret) à nonnullis rerum imperitis & iniquè judicantibus habitus sit indolior

(4) Sammarth. ubi supra.

(4). — Duaren was a Man of a very piercing Judgment, but not so happy a Memory, never reading public Lectures without his Notes. Whence it happened, that in his Travels through Germany, though he was often invited to read, yet not being furnished with his Notes, he would never comply. So that he passed among the ignorant and false Judges, for a Person of little Learning. This is the Original Moreri would have translated, and which he has spoiled in three Places. He has put Orationes, instead of Lectures: he says impart his Knowledge (5) in the Civil-Law, instead of reading Lectures in Civil-Law. He ascribes to the learned, what he ought to ascribe only to the ignorant. For none but the ignorant are capable of despising a famous Doctor, under pretence of his not mounting the Pulpit in his Passage as a Traveller, through a Place where there is an Academy. Suspect as much as you please, that he distrusts his Memory, and that it depends upon Collections he has left in his Closet, you can never conclude from thence, if you judge rightly of things, that he is not an able Man. Note, Sammarthianus insinuates that Duaren refused the Pulpit, not because he was forced to read, but because, not having his Papers, he was afraid he could not draw up a Lecture, in which every thing should be rightly quoted. Most Professors have their Writings under their eye, when they read a Lecture: their Office does not require them to do otherwise, and from thence it is that the Title of Reader in such and such a Science is synonymous to that of Professor. It must be supposed then, that the Professors, and the Students of Germany, would not have been surprized to see Duaren read; those then, who judged ill of him, did not go upon this, that they believed he had not Memory enough to learn by heart a discourse of an Hour long, but that he was not able to compose such a discourse without his Manuscripts. It signifies little, whether a Professor reads or repeats by Heart: one is as good as the other: they are appointed to inform the Understanding, not to move the Passions. If preaching was their Business, there would be a considerable Difference, and yet, to this Day, the greatest part of the English Preachers read their Sermons to the People.

Note, by the way, how Modes alter, even in Universities. It was a general Custom in the XVIth Century, for Professors, who were Strangers, and passed through a Town where an University was, to be desired to give them public Lectures. If I am not mistaken, this is now laid aside: but among Ministers, it is an essential Civility, for those of the place to offer their Pulpit to Strangers; and therefore a Minister seldom travels without carrying in his Trunk his best Sermons, knowing he shall be desired to preach in other Towns. Jesters call these Sermons Pocket Pistols.

[C] Duaren was a Protestant (§ a). . . . Baudouin treated him as a Nicodemite and Prevaricator.] Mr Catherinot, the King's Advocate at Bourges, observes, that, in 1450, 'Duaren printed his Treatise of Benefices (§ b) in which he made himself suspected of Heresy by his Doctrines and Raileries. Accordingly it was inserted in the Index Expurgatorius of Rome (6). Baudouin retiring from Bourges, and making a public Profession of the Protestant Religion at Strasbourg, wrote against Duaren under the Name of the Christian Civilians (7); and reproached him with being a Papist only in Appearance, and combating the Religion of his Heart. Those who have not this Book will find Extracts from it at the beginning of Theodore Beza's Answer to the Railings of Baudouin, who had drawn his own Character in his Reproaches to Duaren. It appears in those Extracts that the Sorbonne forced Duaren to recant. 'Tu nos fortasse alio trahere vis auribus constrictos. Equonam? an ad tribunal Sorbonicum ubi palinodium turpem & nefariam canere tuo exemplo & more nobis persuasum deas? Ignosce, Duarene, non possumus, malum (ut ille olim Philoxenus) ad Latumias (8). — You perhaps have a desire to drag me by the Ears to another Quarter; but whither? To the Tribunal of the Sorbonne, where you would persuade me to sing a base and infamous Recantation as you have done. Par-don me, Duaren, I cannot; I could sooner, like Philostratus of old, consent to dig in a Quarry.' We shall see, in the following Remark, what Commerce he had with Calvin.

(6) Catherinot, Calvinisme de Berri, pag. 4.

(7) This Book was printed at Strasbourg, in 1556.

(8) Balduinus, fol. 112, apud Theod. Beza, pag. 199, Tom. II, Opusculum.

(§ a) Teiffier, Tom. I, pag. 376, of his Elogies, last Edition, observes from Catherinot, that in 1553, Duaren, and all the other Professors of Bourges, to the number of eight, were suspected of Lutheranism, and it is known, this Suspicion, with respect to Duaren, particularly regarded his Treatise Of Benefices, &c. but every body does not know another Particular, which must needs have very much increased the ill Opinion Duaren had already given of his Catholicism. H. Stephens, cap. 38, of his Apology for Herodotus, relates certain scandalous Leonine Verses, engraved upon a Table of Free-stone, which had been a long time fastened, with iron Hooks, above the Poor's Box, to a Pillar of the Cathedral Church of Bourges; which Table, in the Year 1566, had been some few Years before pulled down, to take away from the Eyes of the Lutherans that Stone of Offence.

It was Duaren, who, by his repeated Remonstrances, at length prevailed to have that Table removed and suppressed, the Contents of which are to be seen in Hofmann's Fulmen Brutum, pag. 58, of the Leyden Edition, enlarged *, in 8vo, large Paper, and in a bigger Character than the Geneva Edition. * Ex eo dem genere (Traditionem), says the Addition which follows immediately after the eight Verses in praise of the Agnus Dei, illud est carmen impium, ac plane nefarium, quod non multis ante annis Biturige in summo with being a Plagiary from Calvin [D]. Very few have observed what I am going to relate. Duaren having quitted the Office of Professor, it was given to Baudouin, who, three Years after, advised them to recall Duaren, and yielded to him the first place [E]. I shall mention some other particulars, which may serve for a Supplement to Moreri [F]. There was an Edition of Duaren's Works printed at Frankfort in 1592, summo Episcopali in tabula lapidea incisum, & ad caput trunci five tigilli pauperum affixum erat: sed Francisci Duaren! admonitu, qui tum in illa Academia Jus Civile profitebatur, exemptum ac disturbatum est.

* Scaligeranus under the Word Hofmanni Franco-Gallia.

Hic des devotè, cœlestibus affocio te, &c.

REM. CRIT.]

[§. (β) A Mistake: The Licence for the publishing this Treatise is of the nineteenth of November of the following Year 1551. REM. CRIT.]

[D] Reproached him with being a Plagiary from Calvin. Baudouin affirmed, that whatever is found in Duaren's Books concerning the Priesthood was taken out of Calvin's Works. It is pretended he made this Observation only to expose him to the Rage of Persecutors. Duaren was enraged at this Fraud. He complained of it, both by Letter and Word of Mouth, to Calvin, who appealed him. 'In ea pugna quum veris armis destitui se videret Balduinus, ad illiberales infidias descendit, & Duareno ex puræ & orthodoxæ fidei approbatione invidiam conflando, carnificum furori eum obicit. Capitale, ut scitur, in Gallia erat, non tantum doctrinæ nostræ subscribere, sed libros etiam nostros furtim legere. Bonus hic pietatis sectator, dum ostendere conatur Duarenum ex me didicisse, & ex meis libris esse mutuatum quicquid in libro De sacerdotis probe & sincere docuerat, non alio spectavit quam ut furiosis Ecclesiæ hostibus gladium homini jugulando porrigeret. Si Barbara hæc immanitas mihi displicuerit, nihil mirum: quia potius hoc uno stratagemate detestabilem feris piis omnibus reddidit. Et tamen cum de ea per litteras, & coram conquestus est Duarenus, hominem ingenio, facundia, eruditioneque sic instructum, ut in certamine longe futurus esset superior, mitigavi (9). — In that Contest, when Balduin saw himself destitute of an honourable Defence, he had recourse to scandalous Arts, and, to raise Duaren Enemies from his Approbation of the pure and orthodox Faith, exposed him to the Fury of the most incensed Persecutors. It was a capital Crime (as all Men know) in France, not only to subscribe to our Doctrine, but to read our Works in private. This true Promoter of Piety, endeavouring to show that Duaren had borrowed from me whatever he had taught with Justice and Sincerity in his Treatise of Priesthood, wanted only to point him out as a Victim to the implacable Enemies of the Church. No wonder such barbarous Cruelty should be displeasing to me, or that by such a base Stratagem he should render himself odious to all who have any regard for true Piety. And yet when Duaren, a Man of that Wit, Eloquence, and Erudition, which would have undoubtedly gained him the Victory in the Dispute, complained to me both by Letter, and by Word of Mouth, I entirely pacified him.' Add to this a Passage in Theodore Beza's Answer to the same Baudouin (10).

[E] Duaren having quitted the Office of Professor, it was given to Baudouin, who . . . yielded to him the first Place. Here is my Proof (11). 'Certe tam habitus jam tunc fuit pro Jurisconsulto minime vulgari, ut non solum Gratianopolitani talem professorem requirerent (tamest quia istic (12) vixerat existimationem suam minuisse) sed & Bituriges eum acceperunt ut Duareno qui tunc abdicarat succederet. — It is certain he was then looked upon as more than a common Civilian, since he had an Offer of the Chair at Grenoble (though by his living there he had lessened his Reputation), and he was likewise invited to Bourges to succeed Duaren who had resigned.' This respects Baudouin in the Year 1548. Cum Barone conjunctissimus quandiu is deinde vixit, hoc est, triennium docuit totum Jus Civile Balduinus . . . mortuo Barone auctor fuit ut Duarenus revocaretur, atque ut illi redeunti ultro concessit priorem, in quo consistere poterat, locum, sic habuit toto quadriennio sine ullius simulacris significatione bonum collegam (13). — Balduin, during the rest of Barons' Life, that is three Years, lived with him in perfect Union and taught the whole Civil Law. . . . After Barons' Death he was the Author of Duaren's being recalled, and at his return voluntarily resigned him the Priority, though he might have maintained it himself, and found him a good Colleague for four Years.' I omit the latter Part of this Passage, in which he owns that a Quarrel arose between these two Professors, after Baudouin was retired. I pass over also the Contradiction there is on the other side of the Leaf, and it is a very gross one. 'Neque vero dubito quin si nunc Duarenus viveret Balduinum tam complecteretur à vobis nunc vexatum, quam ab eo vestratum partium suspecto fuit interdum ABALIENATUS (14). — Nor do I doubt, were Duaren still living, but that he would as much espouse Balduin, now oppressed by you, as he before declared against him, when suspected of favouring your Party.' It was said just before, that while Baudouin taught at Bourges he received no Marks of any Enmity from Duaren, and yet confessed he had received such, being suspected of Calvinism. These Suspicions cannot relate to the time that followed Baudouin's Departure; for he went from Bourges to Geneva, and then to Strasburg, and openly declared for the Protestant Religion (15). They concern therefore his stay at Bourges, during which, according to his own Confession, he was very much suspected of favouring the Protestants. So that the Contradiction is obvious and inexcusable. 'Illud vere dicere postum Balduinum in ea urbe sæpe vestro nomine in periculum venisse dum vobis amior esse credebatur, & erat fortasse quam esse debebat, neque certe aliud habebant illi quos laudas, inimici quod huic odiose objectarent (16). — This I can truly say, that Balduin brought himself several times into danger, in that City, on your account, whilst he was believed to be too much in your Interest, and perhaps was more than he ought; nor had those Persons, whom you name, any other Objections to make against him.' One of the Passages I have copied discovers a Fault of the Author of Baudouin's Elogy. 'Reverius, says he (17), Lutetiam (Balduinus) magna jam quaesita fama accersitur à Biturigibus ad docendi munus suscipiendum futurus collega Baronis & Duareni Jurisconsultorum. — Balduin being returned to Paris, and having gained an extraordinary Reputation, is sent for to Bourges, to teach, in Conjunction with Baron and Duaren, Civilians.' The meaning of which is, that the University of Bourges sent for Baudouin to make him Colleague of Baron and Duaren. A notorious Falshood! for he was invited to accept the Chair Duaren had left. We must not forget that Baudouin read Lectures in that University before he received his Doctor's Degree there. 'Cum publice juris civilis obsecutores titulos interpretatus fuisset, incredibili omnium studio Doctor est renunciatus voce Baronis (18). — Having publickly unravelled some knotty Points of the Civil-Law, to the inexpressible Satisfaction of the People, he was created Doctor by Baron.' Now he received it the twelfth of March, 1549 (19). Therefore he must have begun his Lectures from the foregoing Year; for he taught Civil-Law, at Bourges, for seven Years (20), and left that University in the Year 1555. This must be observed, in order to correct a Mistake concerning the time of Equinard Barons' Death. Some say that he died in 1556 (21). They are mistaken; for he lived but three Years after Baudouin was made his Colleague. If Spandanus has placed his Death aright, on the Twenty second of August, 1550 (22), we have fresh Reason to say, that Baudouin entered upon his Professorship, at Bourges, in 1548. If he entered upon it in the Month of January, there would be above two Years and a half between his first Lecture, and the Death of Barons, and this is enough to say they were Colleagues for three Years; for in such Books they are not very nice in their Calculations. It is certain that Barons died the Twenty second of September, 1550, at the Age of Fifty five Years (23).

[F] I shall mention some other Particulars which may serve for a Supplement to Moreri. Francis Duaren was the Son of John Duaren, who exercised an Office of Judicature in Bretagny. He succeeded him in that Employment, and discharged all the Functions of it for some

(9) Calvinus, Respons. ad Bald. pag. 368, Tract. Theol.

(10) It is at Page 231, of the second Volume of Beza's Works.

(11) Resp. ad Calvinum & Beza pro Francisco Balduino, folio 83. See other Proofs in the following Remarks.

(12) That it is say at Geneva.

(13) Respons. ad Calv. & Beza, fol. 84.

(14) Ibid. folio 84. verso.

(15) See his Article, Rem. [E].

(16) Respons. ad Calvin. & Beza, fol. 83, verso.

(17) Papyr. Massio, Elog. Tom. II. pag. 257.

(18) Id. ibid.

(19) Catherineot, Calvinisme de Berri, pag. 4.

(20) Balduin. Respons. ad Calv. & Beza, folio 86.

(21) Menage, Remarques sur la Vie de Pierre, Astruc, p. 157.

(22) Spandanus, ad. ann. 1550, num. 12.

(23) Mr Pinckon des Riolles, whom I had consulted, informs me of this.

in Folio [G], in which was inserted his Treatise of Plagiaries; it is a curious Piece; but too short for so large a Subject. It might be enriched with many other

- (24) Fran. Duarenus, Epist. ad Sebast. Alciatium, pag. m. 297, Part. II. Oper. It is dated Novemb. 24, 1550.
- (25) Goliem. Budæus, Epist. ad Jo. Duaren. It is in Duaren's Works, pag. 300, Part. II.
- (26) Annus jam agitur novus ex quo in hanc civitatem Juris docendi causa publice accitus sum. Duaren. Pref. Disput. anniv. dated from Bourges, in 1547.
- (27) Triennio post dilectum Alciati profertur Jus civile hic cap. Duarenus, in Orat. recitata in copatione Buguierii, pag. m. 305, Oper. Part. II. Note, He racks wrong; for Alciatus left Bourges, in 1534.
- (28) Id. ibid. pag. m. 297.
- (29) Studia jam biennium intermissa. Idem. pag. 294.
- (30) Idem. Epist. ad Sebast. Alciatium. pag. 297.
- (31) Id. ibid. pag. 298. See the Rem. [B], of the Article BAUDOUIN.
- (32) Id. ibid. pag. 298.
- (33) Duaren. Epist. Dedicator. Comment. in Titul. de Verborum Obligationibus. It is at the beginning of the 5th Volume of his Works.
- (34) Idem. Epist. ad Sebast. Alciatium. pag. 297.
- (35) In the Poem intitled, Le Siècle de Louis le Grand, pag. m. 175, of the 5th Tome of his Parallèle des Anciens & des Modernes.
- (36) Pope Blount, Cent. Author. pag. m. 466.

some time. 'Jurisdictioni ante annos quindecim in 'Celtica nostra Britannia non omnino infeliciter præ-
'fui, eoque magistratu in quo patri jam seni successer-
'am vixdum adolescentiæ annos ingressus ita functus
'sum ut, &c. (24). — Fifteen Years ago I had the 'Honour to fill a Chair of Judicature in Brittany,
'in which Office, though very young, I succeeded my
'aged Father, and discharged my Duty in such a man'ner, &c.' He read Lectures upon the Pandects at Paris, in the Year 1536, and among other Disciples he had the three Sons of the learned Budæus (25). He was invited to Bourges, in 1538 (26), to teach Civil-Law there, three Years after Alciatus had left them (27):
he laid down this Office in the Year 1548, and went to Paris to frequent the Bar, being desirous to join the Practice with the Theory of the Law. This is what he declares in a Letter to Francis Baudouin, who succeeded him. 'Cooptatum te in juris doctorum col-
'legium & unum ex omnibus electum cui nos velut
'emeriti lampadem cursu traderemus valde ita me
'Deus amet letor (28). — I am extremely rejoiced
'that you have been singled out of all the Candidates,
'and elected into the College of Civilians, to whom 'we, who are worn out in the Service, may resign our 'Office.' This Letter is dated the thirteenth of January, 1549; but it must be observed, that the Year began then at Easter, and thus by comparing this Date with that of the Letter he wrote to Sebastian de l'Aubespine, there will appear no Contradiction in his Calculations. He says, in his Letter to Francis Bau-douin, that he had frequented the Bar of the Parliament at Paris for two Years past (29). In the other Letter, dated the Twenty fourth of November, 1550, he affures us, that he had frequented it for three Years.
In Basilica Parisiensis ad tres annos libenter versatus sum (30). Both these Dates belong to the same Year 1550, if the Year is made to begin with the Month of January. He was soon tired with the Wranglings of the Court, and was very glad that the advantageous Conditions offered him by the Dukes of Berry, Sister to King Henry II, furnished him with a favourable Opportunity of retiring from the Bar, and resuming, in an honourable manner, the Employment he had had at Bourges. He returned to his Profession of the Civil-Law, in that Place, in 1551. No Professor of the Civil-Law, besides Alciatus, had ever so good a Salary settled upon him, in that University, as our Du-aren. 'Decretum mihi est ex ærario publico stipen'dium annuum ad vicena millia festeriorum num-
'mum, id est longe amplius & honorificentius (si u'num Alciatum excipias) quam Jurisconsultus adhuc
'ullus habuisse in ea civitate dicatur (31). — I had 'a yearly Salary assigned me, out of the public Treasury,
'of an hundred Pistoles, which is by far more considerable
'than any Professor (Alciatus only excepted) ever could 'boast to have received in this City.' Besides he was made Master of the Requests to the Dukes of Berry (32).
Note, that, in his Letter to Sebastian de l'Aubespine, dated the Twenty fourth of November, 1550, he mentions the Funeral of Eguinard Baron, which was an authentic Proof of the Respect the Students had for the Memory of the deceased. Note also, that, in 1554, he was much inclined to go to Valence, where he was offered a Professor's Chair in the Civil-Law. 'Dum
'entor, elaboro, contendo ut vobis morem geram
'cum bona heræ meæ venia interim
'vobis hunc quasi arrhabonem quandam propens mei
'in vos animi ac voluntatis mitto (33). — Whilst
'I labour to the utmost of my Power, by the good Per'mission of my Mistress, to show my Readiness to obey
'your Commands, I send you, in the mean time, this 'Pledge of my Gratitude and Respect.' Thus he speaks in the Dedication of a Work, in 1554, to the Curators of the University of Valence. — I only hinted at his Dislike to the Wranglings of the Court; but as he has given a very eloquent Description of it himself, I thought myself obliged to insert here part of his own Words (34). In Basilica Parisienfis ad tres annos libenter versatus sum: tameti (ut verum fatear) immodicos ac prope inexpli-cables litium amfractus, quibus illud forum præ cæ-teris abundat, magis quam lites ipsas ac judicia, quibus humanum genus carere non posse videtur, per-invitus nec absque ingenti fastidio illic viderim. Vix enim credibile est quanta ibi hominum eorumque gravissimorum & lectissimorum multitudo quam minutis ac pusillis in rebus quotidie occupata sit. Ac ut de amplissimo purpuratorum Patrum ordine & conventu loquar, num tibi videntur pleraque eorum judicia, quæ statis legitimisque diebus & ex æquodas palam eduntur, non dicam augusto illo confesso, sed infimo aliquo tribunali satis digna esse? Nam cum, &c. — I have three Years frequented the Parliament of Paris. Though I must confess it was not without great Uneasiness

I saw those extravagant, and, in a manner, inextricable Mazes of Controversy, rather than Judiciary Proceedings (which appear to be necessary amongst Mankind) which infect that Court to its Reproach more than any other. It is scarce credible what a multitude of People, and those of the most considerable and eminent Rank, we there find engaged in the most trivial and idle Affairs. And to speak of that most august Order and Assembly of the Senators; does not the Generality of their Determinations which are delivered on stated Days, with such romantic Solemnity, seem not only below the Dignity of that august Assembly, but even of the lowest Court of Justice? This Observation is very judicious.
Those august Assemblies, called Parliaments, have too much Grandeur for the trifling Causes they decide therein, and one cannot forbear pitying a fine Genius, who employs a great deal of time in preparing to argue a Cause there. What must he study and look into? the Phrases which a Notary makes use of in a Will, or a Contract of Marriage, to explain the Mind of some mean private Person. I have heard a Counsellor of the Parliament of Metz say, that this sort of Study is the more disagreeable as it does not improve the Mind, or give it any manner of Scope. Let us quote here Mr Perrault's Lines upon the Disadvantage our Lawyers lie under, compared with those of Antiquity (35).

Je la voy s'applaudir de ses grans Orateurs,
Je voy les Cicérons, je voy les Demosthènes, Ornemens éternels & de Rome & d'Athènes,
Dont le foudre éloquent me fait déjà trembler,
Et qui de leurs grands Noms viennent nous accabler.
Qu'ils viennent, je le veux, mais que sans avantage
Entre les combatans le terrain se partage;
Que dans nostre Barreau l'on voye occupez
A défendre d'un champ trois sillons usurpez;
Qu'instruits dans la Coutume, ils mettent leur effude
A prouver d'un egout la juste servitude;
Ou qu'en riche appareil la force de leur Art
Ecclatè à soutenir les droits de Jean Maillart.

I see Antiquity boasting of her great Orators, the Cicero's, the Demosthenes's, eternal Ornaments of Rome and Athens; whose thundering Eloquence makes me tremble, and who confound us with their great Names. Let them enter, but let the Lists be fairly divided between the Combatants. Let us see them at our Bari, employed in defending three Ridges of Land usurped by another, or proving the Right of a Drain, or let them display their wondrous Art in the Cause of every petty Client.

[G] There was an Edition of Duaren's Works at Frankfort, in 1592, in folio.] The Oxford Catalogue, Sir Thomas-Pope Blount (36), and many others take notice of no other Edition; but I add, that in Duaren's Life-time, there was a Collection of his Writings published at Lyons, in 1554, in folio, by Reuille; and that, after his Death, there was a larger Edition of his Works published in the same City by the same Bookfeller, in folio, in the Year 1579. Nicolas Cifner who had been his Disciple, and afterwards Professor of Civil-Law at Heidelberg, furnished the Bookfeller with several Pieces. This appears by the little Preface he prefixed to this Edition, which he composed at Spire, in the Year 1579. I call it little, to distinguish it from that he put before the second Part of Duaren's Works, which may pass for a just Dissertation, de modo & arte docendi atque discendi jura. He wrote other Thoughts [H]. I shall give some Extracts of a Letter he wrote against Baudouin [I].

it at Spire, in 1575. I have not seen the Edition mentioned in the Text of this Remark; but I know it was reprinted at Frankfurt, in the Year 1607. I make use of that of Geneva 1608, apud Petrum de la Roviére, and am sorry not to find in it Duaren's two Tracts against Baudouin (37).

[H] His Treatise of Plagiaries might be enriched with many other Thoughts. I shall furnish one. Those Persons are never mentioned, but they are compared to Esop's Jay (38). This Thought is found in these Verses of Horace.

Quid mihi Celsus agit? monitus, multumque monendus,

Privatas ut quærat opes, & tangere vitet Scripta, Patinus quæcunque recepit Apollo:
Ne, si forte suas repetitum venerit olim
Grex avium plumas, moveat cornicula risum, Furtivis nudata coloribus (39).

..... And how doth Celsus do?
Whom I still warn, as I have often done,
To get some Stock, some Riches of his own;
And not from others Labours, kept for Fame
In wise Apollo's Temple, steal a Name, Left all the Birds should come and claim their own,
And th' Cough be his, when her stol'n Plumes are gone.

CREECH.

Duaren made use of the same; for he boasts of being able easily to reduce his Plagiarism to the Condition of that Bird. * Corniculam Horatianam plane mihi deprehendisse videor, quam furtivis nudare coloribus nihilo mihi difficilior esse puto quam Aristophani illi poetarum Alexandrinorum furta detegere ac convincere (40). — I fancy I have got Horace's Daw into my Hands, and could as easily strip him of his stolen Plumes, as Aristophanes discover and expose the Plagiarism of the Alexandrian Bards. But I never met with any one yet who compared Plagiaries to Partridges. He that getteth Riches, and not by right, is as the Partridge, which sitteth upon Eggs she did not lay; he shall leave them in the midst of his Days, and at his end shall be a Fool (41). These are the Words of the Prophet Jeremiah, declaring that those, who enrich themselves with the Substance of other Men, do not preserve that ill gotten Wealth until their Death. Interpreters say that the Partridge steals the Eggs of other Birds, and sits upon them; but when the young ones are hatched, they do not own her for their Dam; but, leaving her, go in quest of the Bird which laid the Eggs (42). This is the common Fate of Plagiaries. They reap what they never sowed; they nourish the Children of another, and raise themselves up a surreptitious Family; but those stolen Children, like ill got Riches, male paria male dilabuntur, take wing, and fly to their true Father. An Author, when he is robbed, may reclaim his Goods, and if Death prevents him, a Son, a Relation, a Friend, may pursue his Right. Nay a Man, who was not a Friend to the Author, may do him this good Office, in order to have the Honour of the Discovery of the Theft, or that he may cover the Plagiarist with Confusion. Vanity, Malice, or a Desire of Revenge, may suggest what the Love of Justice would not inspire them with; and thus sooner or later stolen Productions abandon the Thief. Note, There are some Plagiaries, who do not altogether resemble the Partridge: they do not take the Pains to hatch, but take away Mens Words and Thoughts ready formed: it is true, sometimes they torment themselves to give them another turn, that the Theft may not be discovered so easily; and then they may more properly be compared to the Partridge. For the rest, I wonder the Name of this Bird has never been given to those Men, who bring up the Children another begets at their Houses. That Name would agree much better with them, than the Name of that Bird (43) who goes and lays in another Bird's Nest, and leaves it to hatch and breed up the Young. Perhaps they were not persuaded the Story of the Partridge was true. A learned Critic has long since insinuated that St Jerom falsely alleged the Testimony of three excellent Naturalists (44). Hieronymus testes citat hujus rei sanè luculentos, & quos, ut minus, idoneos rejicere nemo possit, Aristotelem videlicet, Theophrastum, & Plinium; sed an verè, fides penes ipsum esto: ego sanè apud illos autores nihil tale legere memini. Locus Hieronymi est in commentariis ad eum locum (45): Aliant, inquit, scriptores naturalis historiae tam bestiarum & volucrum, quam arborum herbarumque, quorum principes sunt apud Græcos Aristoteles & Theophrastus, apud nos Plinius secundus, hanc perdidit esse naturam, ut ova alterius perdidit, id est, aliena furetur, & eis incubet fovæque: cumque sætus adoleverit, avolare ab eo, & alienum parentem relinquere. — St Jerom calls in some substantial Witnesses, against whose Testimony no Person can except; namely, Aristotle, Theophrastus, and Pliny; but whether justly or no, must be left to Credit. For my part I do not remember to have met with any such thing in those Authors. The Passage of St Jerom is in his Commentaries on this Place. The Authors, says he, of the Natural History of Beasts and Birds, as well as Trees and Plants, the chief of whom, among the Greeks, are Aristotle and Theophrastus, and amongst ourselves, Pliny the Younger, say, that it is natural for a Partridge to steal the Eggs of another Partridge, to hatch and nurse them, and that when the young ones are grown up, they fly away from their Foster-Parents.

[I] I shall give some Extracts of a Letter he wrote against Baudouin. I found it among the Tracts joined to Calvin's Reply ad Balduini convicia (46). Duaren writ it after having seen an Oration that Baudouin had published in Germany, and which was very reflecting upon the Professors of Bourges. No body was named in it, but it was easy to know who the Orator intended, and that particularly Duaren was ill treated in it. If we believe this Letter of Duaren, those who were most favourable to Baudouin, those who loved and admired his Talents, praised him in such a manner, that there was commonly an unhappy but in their applauses; that is to say, but he is vain, ambitious, and dissembling; we are sorry such a spot appears upon so fine a Face. Ita eum laudant fere ut in ejus laudibus excipiant ἀλαζονείαν, fastum, ambitionem, φιλαυτίαν: præterea mirum simulandi dissimulandique artificium, & hoc veluti nævo decoram admodum speciosamque faciem nonnihil deformari doleant (47). Being at Paris in the Year 1548, or thereabouts (48), he paid Duaren a visit, and presented him a Book he had dedicated to him (49). He had a mind to succeed Duaren in the Professor's place, he had just quitted in the Academy of Bourges, and desired Recommendaory Letters from him. He obtained them, and found his account in them; for immediately the Magistrates of Bourges granted him a Pension, and soon after he was admitted Professor in Civil-Law, without any expence for the Ceremony of Admission. He was forced to surmount the opposition of Eguinarus Baron, and some other declared Enemies, and from that time he was always at Variance with that Colleague, and raised such disturbances against him, that it is thought he broke his Heart with Grief. Nec ulla fuit ex eo tempore tumultus inter eum & Baronem intermissio . . . adversus quem (Baronem) iste vindictæ cupiditate flagrans tantas excitavit tragædias, ut à plerisque creditur Baro ob mœrorem ex ea re conceptum decessisse (50). After Baron's Death Duaren returned to Bourges, where he found all kind of respectful usage from Baudouin, but was cautioned not to trust him as one, that, by many Artifices, had endeavoured to hinder him from coming back, or at least from recovering the Rank he had formerly had. The distrust they would have given him was easily removed by the Protections of sincerity Baudouin made him; but at length his Eyes were opened, and he openly expostulated with him, and from that time there was a real Enmity between them, though in appearance they carried it fair. Nihil amplius dissimulandum ratus cum homine expostulavi & de jure amicitiae necessitudinis violato conquestus sum paulo liberius ac flamachosius (51). — I thought it no longer proper to dissemble with the Man, but expostulated with him, and complained with somewhat more Freedom and Passion of his violation of Friendship: Nay, the very pretence

(37) Epistola de Francisco Balduino. Defensio adversus Balbini Sycophantæ maleficia.

(38) See Mr Dacier on the third Epistle of the first Book of Horace, pag. m. 207.

(39) Horat. Epist. III. lib. I. vers. 15.

(40) Duaren. Epist. de Plagiariis. pag. 296. Part. II. Operum.

(41) Jeremiah xvii, 11.

(42) See Drusus, Observation. lib. IV. cap. xxiv. pag. m. 99.

(43) The Cuckoo.

(44) That is to say, the 11th verse of the 17th chapter of Jeremiah.

(46) See Remark [H] of the Article BAUDOUIN, Citat. (66).

(47) Duaren. Epist. de Fr. Balduino, p. m. 58.

(48) Ibid. p. 6m.

(49) He had got it printed at Lyons.

(50) Duaren, Epist. de Fr. Balduino, pag. 61.

(51) Ibid. p. 63.

- of Friendship ceased upon three or four occasions, in which Baudouin flew out into a great Passion with Duaren. What gave Rise to the first Breach was this. Baudouin omitted going into the Chair, under a pretence that he could contribute more to the Benefit and Glory of the City and University by his Writings, than by his Lectures. He was reprimanded for it by the Magistrates, after Duaren had informed them of this neglect (52). Some time after there happened a sedition in the Schools of Civil-Law. Baudouin, being obliged to answer for it before the Magistrates, pleaded the Cause, and lost it shamefully. He believed Duaren had plaid him this trick. The cause of it was that Baudouin chose the time for his Lectures, according to his own Conveniency, and not according to the Hours assigned to each Professor. This raised disturbances; for Baudouin would not alter the Hour he had chosen, though it was that of another who would not relinquish it. 'Horum subinde mutabat arbitrio suo in aliorum possessionem non minus superbe & insolenter quam turbulentè & seditiosè invadebat. Qua ex re il motus atque tumultus excitati sunt ut, &c (53). Shortly after he broke out afresh against Duaren, when he found himself deprived of his Salary for some Months, during which he had omitted his Lectures; for it must be noted, that, about three Months before his leaving Bourges, he left off reading without saying a word to his Colleagues to excuse the Intermision. They attributed this to the Vexation he was under for the Sentence pronounced against him by the Judges. 'Qvod hominis factum plerique sic interpretabantur ut dolori acerbissimo & aegritudini ex recente illa damnatione judicioque sulceptæ, vulgo tribuerent (54). His anger for not receiving his Salary, during the time of his omission, made him fret and fume against his Colleagues, and two Days after he went out of Town without taking his leave of them (55): but he promised the Magistrates to return. Note, that, two Years before, he had made great Solicitations for the increase of his Pension, but to no purpose. He could never obtain half the Salary that Duaren enjoyed (56). The latter testifies (57), that after he found the Protestants gave ear to the calumniating Discourses of such a Deferter, he perceived the Passion diminish, which he had for going over to them. He alleges a Saying of Simonides, that those ought to be deemed Calumniators, who lightly give Credit to Calumny. 'Scitum est illud Simonidis, Non defines me auribus calumniari, cum ostendere vellet eos quoque calumniatores habendos esse qui aures calumniatoribus faciles præberent (58). His Letter is dated the fifteenth of July 1555. I must not forget that it is observed in it (59), that Baudouin, who retired from Bourges on account of the insupportable Morifications he suffered there, persuaded those of the Reformed Religion, that he had left that University only to obtain Liberty of Conscience. This is the way of Mankind: they give their Neighbours false Reasons for their Conduct, reserving the true ones to themselves. They all deserve, some more, some less, to have the Quibble applied to them, which was made upon the famous Astrologer of Provence:
- Nostra damus cum verba damus, nam fallere nostrum est,
Et cum verba damus nil nisi nostra damus.
- From our own stores we give the fabled Treat,
Our Art is Fiction, and our Trade to cheat.

DUELLIUS (a) (CAIUS) Consul in the Year of Rome 493, defeated the Carthaginian Fleet, and was the first of all the Romans who had a Naval Triumph decreed him (b). They erected a Column to him with a fine Inscription. It was one of those Columns called rostrata (c), on account of the Prows of Ships with which they were adorned. Part of this Column was dug up at Rome about the end of the XVth Century. The Learned endeavoured to decypher the Inscription (d). Some Authors say they granted Duellius, in acknowledgment for his Victory, the Privilege of being conducted to his house with the sound of Flutes, and by the light of Flambeaux, whenever he should sup abroad [A]; but others assure us, that he assumed this by his own Authority [B]. Which latter Opinion is more probable than the former [C]. He built a Temple to Janus in the Herb-Market (e). They tell one thing of him which seems to me more remarkable than all the Honours he enjoyed in the Commonwealth. It is pretended that his Wife lived to be old, without knowing that her

- (a) Others write it Duillius.
(b) Florus, lib. ii, cap. ii.
(c) Plinius, lib. xxxiv, cap. v.
(d) Peter Giescius wrote a Treatise upon it, which was printed at Rome in 1608.
(e) Tacit. Ann. lib. ii, cap. xlix.
- [A] Some Authors . . . say, they granted Duellius . . . the Privilege of being conducted to his House with the sound of Flutes, and by the light of Flambeaux, when he should sup abroad. Titus Livius is very particular in this (1): 'C. Duellius Consul adversus classem Pœnorum prospere pugnavit, primusque omnium Romanorum ducum navalis victoriæ duxit triumphum: ob quam causam ei perpetuus honos habitus est, revertenti à cœna tibicine canente funale præferretur. — C. Duellius, the Consul, obtained a Victory over the Carthaginian Fleet, and was the first of all the Roman Generals, who was honoured with a Triumph for success at Sea; for which reason he was distinguished with perpetual Honours, and was conducted from Supper with Music and Flambeaux; a Liberty his Reputation only could authorize.' After an evidence of this Importance, it is not necessary to produce Aurelius Victor, who has said, 'Duillio concessum est ut prælucente funali & præcinente tibicine à cœna publice rediret (2).' [B] Others assure us, that he assumed this by his own Authority. Cicero is also as express in this as he can be. 'C. Duillium M. filium qui Pœnos classe primus devicerat redeuntem à cœna senem sepe videbam puer, delectabatur crebro funali & tibicine quæ sibi nullo exemplo PRIVATUS sumperat; tantum LICENTIAE dabat gloria (3). — I have often seen C. Duillius, who gained the first Victory over the Carthaginian Fleet, returning home from Supper, preceded by Music and Flambeaux, with which the old Drunkenman was wonderfully pleased, an Honour which he, though a private Man, without a Precedent, had assumed to himself.' Florus is of the same Opinion. 'Duillius Imperator non contentus unius diei triumpho, per vitam omnem ubi à cœna rediret præluere funalia, præcinere sibi tibias JUSSIT, quasi quotidie triumpharet (4). — Duillius, the Admiral, not content with the Triumph of a single Day, ORDERED the Music to play, and Flambeaux to be carried before him, when he returned from Supper, as though he intended to triumph as long as he lived.'
- [C] This latter Opinion is more probable than the former. For it is more easy to imagine falsely, that there have been public Decrees upon certain things, than to be ignorant of a Decree actually published. Livy thought it was so likely, that the Senate or People should have decreed particular Honours to Duellius, that he might easily believe, that all the Privileges, Duellius enjoyed, were Concessions of his Country, and no doubt Duellius's Descendants would favour that erroneous Opinion: the Flutes and Torches were a greater Glory to them, if they were a public Gift, than if they were an Usurpation. An Historian then might be deceived in it two hundred Years after; but it would not have been so easy for him to have been in an Error, if there had been a public Decree for it: the Family would have kept with too much care the Titles of it. Cicero and so many other Writers could have pretended no plea for their Ignorance. However it be, I wonder that I have seen in no Commentator any Reflexions (5) upon the two ways in which they mention Duellius's nocturnal Honours. The difference does not turn upon trifles: it is of great concern for or against Duellius. Nevertheless this is not
- (1) T. Livius, in Epitome, lib. xvii.
(2) Aurel. Vict. de Viris illust.
(3) Cicero, de Senectute, c. 13.
(4) Florus, lib. ii, cap. ii. See also Valer. Max. lib. iii, cap. vi. num. 4.
(5) I do not pretend to have consulted these all.

her Husband, who had a stinking Breath, was different in that from other Men [D]. Her Name was Bilia: it was Justice that her Name should be preserved; and yet it would have been entirely unknown to us, if St Jerome had not inserted it in his Works. Coffar had no reason to cite Erasmus concerning that Woman's Answer [E].

not the Cause of my making this Remark; but it is to accustom young Readers to seek, among the Variations of Historians, for the ground of the greatest probabilities.

[D] His Wife lived to be old, without knowing that her Husband who had a stinking Breath, was in that different from other Men. Duellius complained one Day to his Wife that she had never told him of a defect he had been reproached with, which was that he had a stinking Breath. I thought, replied she, that all Men had been like you. St Jerome relates this more at large. Duellius qui primus Romæ navali certamine triumphavit Biliam virginem duxit uxorem tantæ pudicitie, ut illo quoque sæculo pro exemplo fuerit, quo impudicitia monitum erat, non vitium. Is jam senex & trementi corpore in quodam jurgio audivit exprobari sibi os fœtidum, & tristis se domum contulit. Cumque uxori questus esset quare nunquam se monuisset, ut huic vitio mederetur, fecit, inquit illa, nisi putassem omnibus viris se os olere (6). — Duellius, who was the first that had the Honour of a Triumph for a Naval Victory, married Bilia, a Virgin of such Virtue, that she was a Pattern to that Age, wherein Immodesty was a Prodigy, not a Vice. He, being now old and feeble, was upbraided in a Quarrel with having a stinking Breath, and went home very much concerned, and complained to his Wife that she had never told him, that he might have got some remedy for it. I would have told you, answered she, but that I thought that all Mens Breath had been like your's.

(6) Hieron. adv. Jov. lib. I.

DURANT (SAMUEL) Minister of Charenton, made himself considered and loved by his Flock for several good Qualities. He passed for a great Preacher. I think he died in 1526; his Place was filled up by Mr Dailé (a). Among his Friends were Mr Arnauld, Counsellor and Secretary to the King, and Comptroller-General of the Restes [A]. This we learn from the Epistle Dedictory of seven of his Sermons printed in 1627. Frederic Spanheim, his Kinsman (b), and Heir to his Books, printed those seven Sermons at Geneva, and wrote the Epistle Dedictory to them.

[A] Among his Friends was Mr Arnauld, Comptroller-General of the Restes. I observe this, in order to shew that there were several Persons of the Reformed Religion in the Family of Arnauld. He, I speak of, was very careful to come to Charenton, and to draw all his Relations thither, and he freely contributed both his Pains and Money to advance the Service of God.

Some of his Relations turning Papists, he openly testified his Displeasure at it. He and his Sisters particularly assisted Samuel Durant to the end (1). The Epistle Dedictory, I have cited, makes mention of Mr de Montfermeil his Nephew. This may be added to the latter part of the Remark [D] of the Article ANTHONY ARNAULD the Advocate.

(7) Coffar, Suite de la D-fense de Voiture, pag. 55.

(8) That Verse is Arida nec pluvio supplicat herba Jovi. Nix prays the thirsty Plant to rain, &c. See also Seneca, Quæst. Natur. lib. iv, cap. i.

(9) Girac, Republique, chap. xv. pag. m. 130.

(10) He mentions the Answer of Hure's Wife. Apophth. lib. v, pag. m. 241, and that of Duellius's Wife. Ibid. lib. viii, cap. 619.

(a) See Mr Dailé's Life, pag. 12.

(b) See Remark [B] of the Article SPANHEIM.

(1) Spanh Epître Dedic. de Sept Sermons de Durant.

DURER (ALBERT) descended from an Hungarian Family [A], and born at Nuremberg the Twentieth of May 1471 (a), was one of the best Engravers and most excellent Painters of his Time. (b) Having made a slight beginning with the Pencil in his Father's Shop, who was a Goldsmith, he associated himself with an ordinary Painter named Martin Hupse, who taught him to engrave on Copper-Plates, and manage Colours. ALBERT got himself also instructed in Arithmetic, Perspective, and Geometry; after which he ventured, at Twenty seven Years of Age (c), to publish some of his Works. The first Work of his Graver was the three Graces represented by three naked Women, perfectly shaped, having upon their heads a Globe, on which is engraved the date of the Year 1497. He engraved . . . several Pieces of

(c) He should have said at 26 for the Year 1497 is not the 27th of his Age, as Bullart supposes, who makes him born in 1470. Mr Felibien has committed the same Fault in his ath Extremum for his Pics & for his Ouvrages des Peintres, pag. 530, 531.

[A] He was descended from an Hungarian Family. His Father was born at Cula, a Village near Waradin. Thus I venture to translate these Words of Melchior Adam: 'Fuit ejus pater Albertus ex vico Cula prope Voradium civitatem Hungariæ, natus (1)'. I suspect that by an Error of the Press it is Voradium instead of Furadium in that Author's Book. This fault has been faithfully copied by Paul Preber: see page 1439 of his Theatre. Mr Moreri did not understand the following Words: 'Albertum Durerum è Pannonia oriundum accepimus, sed cujus majores in Germaniam commigrarint (2)'. He thought they meant that our Albert was the Son of an Hungarian whose Family however was originally of Germany. Nothing is more false. Vasari did not know Albert Durer's Country; he supposed him a Fleming, and makes him begin his Copper-Plates at Antwerp. 'E nel vero, says he (3)

se quest' uomo sì raro, sì diligente, e sì universale haveffe havuto per patria la Toscana, oom' egli HEBBE LA FIANDRA, e haveffe potuto studiare le cose di Roma, come habbiamo fatto noi, farebbe stato il miglior Pittore de' paesi nostri, sì come fu il più raro, e più celebrato, che habbiano mai havuto i FIAMMINGHI. — And certainly if this diligent and industrious Man had had Tusany for his Country, AS HE HAD FLANDERS, and if he could have studied as we have done at Rome, he would have been the best Painter in our Country, as he was the most celebrated the FLEMINGS ever had. He had said before in the foregoing page: 'Dopo questo Martino, cominciò Alberto Duro in Anversa, con più disegno, e miglior giudicio, e con più belle inventioni a dare opere alle medesime stampe. — After that Martin Albert Durer began at Antwerp, with more Design

(a) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Phil. German. pag. 66.

(b) Bullart, Academ. des Sciences, Tom. II. pag. 283, 284.

(1) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Phil. German. Philol. pag. 66.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) Giorgio Vasari, Vite de Pittori, terza parte, p. m. 301.

the Passion, which were in such Esteem, that Marc Antony of Bologna, an experienced Engraver at Venice, made bold to copy them [B], and put the Author's Mark to them to make them pass for Originals. As he did not work so much with the Pencil as the Graver, there are but few of his Pictures to be met with, unless in the Palaces of the Emperor, and some Sovereign Princes: they are done in so elegant a manner, that nothing can be finer or better expressed [C]. The particular Account of his Engravings, which we find in Vasari (d), is very curious; and the confession of that Italian Author, that the Prints of Albert Durer, being brought into Italy, excited the Painters of that Country to perfect that part of the Art, and served them for a fine Model, is no small Praise. He very much commends the Delicacy of this excellent Engraver, and the Fertility of his fine Imagination. It is certain Durer had an inexhaustible Fund of Designs; and as he could have no hopes of executing them all, while he worked in Copper, for every Work of that nature cost him a great deal of Time, he bethought himself of working in Wood (e). The two first things he finished in this kind, are a beheading of St John Baptist, and the head of the same Saint presented in a Charger to Herod. They were published in the Year 1510 (f). His St Eustachius is one of his best Pieces [D]. I know not whether it would be easy to reconcile

(d) Giorgio Vasari, Vite de Pittori Parte terza, pag. m. 300, & seq.

(e) Idem, ibid. pag. 301.

(f) Idem, ibid.

Design and a better Judgment, and a much finer Invention, to work upon the same Prints.

[B] His Pieces of the Passion were so much valued, that Marc Antony of Bologna made bold to copy them.]

Here Mr Bullart makes a gross Blunder: he confounds Marc Antony of Bologna, with another Marc Antony, who, for having been the Disciple of Francesco Francia, was surnamed Franci (4).

(4) Idem, ibid. pag. 532.

(5) Idem, ibid.

Marc Antony of Bologna was so far from counterfeiting this Work of Albert Durer, that he joined with him, both in the Impression and Sale of it (5). It was Marc Antony Franci, who played that knavish Trick which has been mentioned. Vasari speaks of it at large; but he does not say that Durer, who had brought an Action against this Copier, was forced to intercede for his Pardon. He says in plain terms, that the Plaintiff obtained no more than this, that Marc Antony should no longer put to his own Works the name and mark of Albert Durer.

(6) This is wrong. It should be AD. See Citation (12).

Havendo dunque contraffatto in rame d'intaglio grosso, come era il legno, che haveva intagliato Alberto, tutta detta Passione, e vita di Christo in 36 carte, e fattovi il segno, che Alberto faceva nelle sue opere, cioè questo AE (6), riuscì tanto simile di maniera, che non sapendo nessuno, ch'elle fossero fatte de

(7) Vasari, Parte III. pag. 301.

Marc Antonio, erano credute d'Alberto, e per opere di lui vendute, e comperate; La qual cosa essendo scritta in Fiandra ad Alberto, e mandatogli una di dette Passioni contraffatte da Marc Antonio, venne Alberto in tanta collera, che partitosi di Fiandra, se ne venne a Venezia, e ricorso alla Signoria, si querelò di Marc Antonio, ma però non ottenne altro se non che Marc Antonio non facesse più il nome, e ne il segno sopradetto d'Alberto nelle sue opere (7).

As he had counterfeited upon Copper-Plates, with coarse Graving, the whole Life and Passion of CHRIST in Thirty six Cuts, which Albert had cut in Wood, and having put the same mark that Albert put to his Works, viz. AE, these Cuts were so much like Albert's, that no body knowing they were Marc Antony's, they were generally taken for Albert's, and bought and sold as such; an Account of which being sent to Albert in Flanders, together with one of the Copies of the Passion counterfeited by Marc Antony, he was so exasperated that he came directly from Flanders to Venice, loudly complaining to the Government of the fraud of Marc Antony: but all the satisfaction he could obtain was, that for the future Marc Antony should not put Albert's Name or Mark to any of his own Works. See the Margin (8).

(8) Bullart, Académ. des Scienc. Tom. II. pag. 384, is mistaken then, for he says the Senate of Venice would have punished severely this Fraud, if Albert himself had not got his Pardon.

[C] His Paintings are done in so elegant a manner that nothing can be better expressed.] His Picture of Adam and Eve is one of the most considerable of his Pieces: it is in the Palace of Prague. Gaspard Vellius praised it very finely; for he made two Veres, in which he supposed that an Angel, admiring this Representation of Adam and Eve, cried out, you are more beautiful than when I drove you from the Garden of Eden.

Angelus hos cernens, miratus dixit: ab hoste Non ita formosus vos ego depuleram.

An Angel saw, and wond'ring cry'd, how fair From Eden's Bow'rs I drove you beautiful Pair.

(9) Bullart, ubi supra.

(10) Idem.

Mr Bullart, from whom I borrow this (9), adds (10). I. That 'there is still to be seen in the same

Palace, from Albert's Pencil, a CHRIST carrying his Cross, which the City of Nuremberg made a Present of to the Emperor; an Adoration of the Wife Men; and two Pieces of the Passion. II. That he drew an Assumption for a Monastery at Frankfort, the Beauty of which was a good Revenue to the Monks, by the liberality of those who came to see so fine a Piece. III. That the Inhabitants of Nuremberg carefully preserve, in the Senators Hall, his Pictures of Charlemain, and some Emperors of the House of Austria, with the twelve Apostles, whose Drapery is very agreeable. IV. That he sent his own Picture to Raphael, drawn by himself upon Canvas without any Colouring, or touch of the Pencil; only heightened with Shades and white, but with so much force and neatness, that Raphael beheld with Admiration this rare Piece, which coming afterwards into the Possession of Julius Romanus, has been placed among the Rarities of the Palace of Mantua.

[D] His St Eustachius is one of the best Pieces] Let us see what Vasari says of it. 'Et appresso un S. Eustachio inginocchiato dinanzi al Cervo, che hà il Crocifisso fra le corna, la qual carta è mirabile, e massimamente per la bellezza d'alcuni cani in varie attitudini; che non possono essere più belli (11).

— And also a St Eustace kneeling before a Stag, who has a Crucifix between his Horns; this is an admirable Piece, particularly for the beauty of the Dogs represented in various Postures, than which nothing can be finer.' John Valentine Andreu, Doctor of Divinity in the Duchy of Wurtemberg, sent that Piece to a Prince of the House of Branibour, with whom he had the Honour to keep a long Correspondence by Letters. Let us see the thanks that was given him for this Present. 'Beasti me iterum novo munere, sculptura magis quam æneâ, insignis illius pictoris Norici, quod litera A. D. ad Basin initiali incarceratione innotuit, cui facile nihil deesse crederem, nisi ut Zeuxis aut Parrhasius, aut alius aliquis, cui æquæ prona favet Minerva, colores adderet, & nativam formam (12). — You have again obliged me beyond Expression by your last present, a Plate which deserves a nobler Name than that of the Metal, whereof it consists: the mark A. D. shews it to have been of the famed Artist of Nuremberg; to which I will most readily confess that nothing is wanting, but that Zeuxis, Parrhasius, or some other equal favourite of Minerva, should give it the Colours, and form of Life.' Let us also recite the Praises, which the same Doctor of Divinity bestowed on Durer in his Answer to that Prince's Letter. 'Eustachium Dureri, si non à meâ, certe summi artificis manu non ingratus Tibi fore, facile divinare potui, in quo Viro illud mirandum est, quod ex rudi & barbaro seculo primus Germanorum, non tantum artis suæ perfectione, ad naturæ imitationem emerferit, sed nec secundum post se reliquerit, omnibus ejus partibus, sculptura, statuarum, architectonica, optica, symmetria, & similibus ita absolutis, ut nisi Mich. Angelum Bonarotum, Italum, coævum & æmulum suum, parem, non habuerit, iis operibus, (quorum maximam partem olim possedi) post se relictis, quæ unius hominis ætatem facile superent, & paupertate in frugali etiam vitâ, perpetua comite. Hunc Itali hodie plurimi faciunt, nobisque succensent, qui domestica nostra bona & ornamenta non

(11) Vasari, Vite de Pittori, Parte III. pag. 301.

(12) See the Book intitled Seleniana Augustiana Augustiana, printed at Ulm. What I take from it is at Page 201, in a Letter dated Nov. 10, 1645.

concile those, who say that Albert Durer was very unhappily married, with those who say that, in order to paint the Virgin Mary, he took his Wife's Face for his Original and Model [E]. The Emperor Maximilian had a very particular Affection and Esteem for him, and gave him good Pensions (g), and Letters of Nobility, and for a Coat of Arms three Escutcheons argent in a Field azure (b). Charles V., and Ferdinand King of Hungary, his Brother, imitated this Favour and Munificence of the Emperor Maximilian (i). And yet it is said this great Painter died very poor [F], and was buried at the public Charge. He was a Man of a charming Conversation (k); and a lover

(g) Melchior Adam, Vite Philof. German. pag. 67.

(i) Bollart. Acad. des Sciences, Tom. II, p. 385.

(b) See the Epitaph of Albert Durer, in Melchior Adam, Vite Philofoph. German. pag. 70.

(k) Ibid. pag. 66.

(13) Ibid. pag. 203.

(14) Ibid. pag. 308.

(15) Seleniana Augustalia, pag. 309.

agnoscamus (13). — I could easily imagine that Durer's Eustachius would not be unacceptable to you, from whatever hand a Piece of that imitable Artist was conveyed. In which great Man there is this surprising, that in a rude and artless Age he should be the first German, who not only brought the Art to perfection, and rose to the imitation of Nature, but left no Second in all its Parts, Etching, Engraving, Statuary, Architecture, Optics, Symmetry, &c. at all which he was so excellent, that, except Michael Angelo the Italian, his cotemporary and rival, he had no equal. He left Works, the greatest part of which was formerly in my Possession, that seem to have required more Years than he lived, and though he lived frugally, yet Poverty was his constant Companion. The Italians have the greatest esteem for him at this Day, and upbraid us with not paying a due regard to the Ornaments of our own Country. We must not forget the care the Emperor Rodolph II took to get the Plate of that St Eustachius gilded, and we shall see at the same time that Durer corrected a fault in it, which Pirckheimer had informed him of; viz. that the Horse's stirrups were too short. Dureriana manu Te apprimè delere. Etari crediderim, they are the Words of John Valentine Andrew (14), cum pro accurato judicio diligenter, quantum hic unus omnibus aliis artificio, diligentia, & naturæ emulatione antecellat. Ex omnibus verò ejus speciminibus Eustachium in Cæturâ primas tenere, à peritis rerum accepi, cujus cupream laminam cum Imperator RUDOLPHUS II fel. mem. magnorede-misset, inaurari voluit, ne amplius attereretur. Memini tamen legisse, à Bilibaldo Pirckheimero, Viro nobili, & in Repub. Noribergeri Triumviro clarissimo Dureri Mecenatè, & Nutricio propè unico, cum nihil haberet, quod in Eustachiana tabula im-probaret, tamen notasse, Stapedes breviores esse, quam ut Eustachius huic equo insidere commodè pos-sit, pœnamque artificio indixisse, ut equum instructum depingeret, ad equilonum institutum, quod ille egre-gie præstitit, quem sæpè cum voluptate vidi. — I did believe, that you would be highly taken with Durer's Draughts, since by the accuracy of your Judg-ment you can discern how far he excels all other Men in Art, Industry, and Nature. I am informed by Men of skill, that his Eustachius claims the first place among all his Plates, which Plate the Emperor Rodolph II, having procured at an immense expence, caused to be gilded, that it might be wore no longer. But I remember to have read in Bilibald Perckheimer, a Nobleman and Magistrate of Nuremberg, Durer's great Patron, and almost sole Benefactor, that having nothing to condemn in Durer's Plate, he had never-theless observed, that the stirrups were too short for Eustachius to sit agreeably on his Horse, that at a Pun-ishment he had enjoin'd him to draw a managed Horse according to the direction of a Jockey, which he performed nobly, which draught I have seen many a time with pleasure.

[E] I know not whether it is easy to reconcile those, who say that Albert Durer was very unhappily mar-ried, with those who say that, in order to paint the Vir-gin Mary, he took his Wife's Face for his Model.] I find the first of these two Particulars in a Letter of Prince Anthony Ulric of Brunswick (15): Quod addis, non solum memorabile, sed & admirabile fuisse, in-signem illum Pictorem Noricum, (quem meritò majus-cula literâ hic veneror) desperato etiam illo, aborti-voque tempore, ad tantam perfectionem, & artis suæ excellentiam pervenire potuisse, id non minus & me afficit, dum insuper illud memoriâ repeto, quod à Studiis nostrorum Ductore charissimo, non ita pridem mihi dictum, ipsum domi Xantippen habuisse pessimam, ac divinâ suâ mentis flagellatricem acerrimam. Sed uti Multos magnos Viros calamitas facit, ita non obstante hoc, fama de Dureri nostro apud exteros nihilominus adeo percrebuit, ut plurimi Italorum cumprimis, ductum ipsius artificiosissimum sequi, impari tamen conatu & successu, ausi fuerint, neque adhuc erubescant, aliorum picturas camino propius admovere, fumosa quadam caligine, ut vetustatem eò melius mentiantur, obducere, satque addito Dureri consueto signo non raro simplicioribus pro genuino ipsius artificio male vendere. — What you add, is not only uncommon, but surprising, that the excellent Painter of Nuremberg, (for whose name I retain a Veneration, even in Writing) should in so rude and unseasonable an Age, rise to such perfection and excellence in the Art. I am no less moved at the thought, especially when I call to mind what my bo-noured Tutor some time ago told me on this Subject, That he was plagued with a Xantippe, the Scourge of his divine Genius. But as Diitres is the Mother of many brave Men, so the same of our Durer in spite of this obstacle has forced it's way into Foreign Countries, that Multitudes, especially the Italians, have dared to proceed on his imitable Plans, but their endeavours proved abortive; nor are they hitherto ashamed of their attempt, but instead of the genuine Pictures of Durer impose on bad Judges those of other Men, which they place in Chimnies, that the Smoak may give them an air of Antiquity, and affix Durer's well known mark to facilitate the base cheat. You see here our Durer exposed to the same fate as Socrates, to the continual Persecution of his Wife, which did not hinder him from producing Works, which are to this Day the Admiration of the Italians. The other Particular is to be found in a Letter written by Doctor John Valentine Andrew to the same Prince. De morosiore ejus Coniuge, nihil mihi prius auditum, hoc verò accepi ab artificibus desiderari, quod in ef-fingenda Virgine Matre, cum puerulo Jesu, unam suam uxorem, quæ tamen minus elegantis & formæ & vultus fuerit, subinde expresse, cum ceterâ Symmetriæ humani corporis observantissimus fuerit. Ego tamen contrarium ipse possedi, & maximo do-lore meo in Calvenfi bullo peridi, faciem sc. Dei-paræ, vivis coloribus, jussu humani vultus magnitu-dine depictam, quâ elegantius, concinnius & formo-sius excogitari nihil potuit, & quam magno ære meo redemptam velim (16). — I had not been before acquainted with the report of his Wife's moroseness, though I had heard it was a common complaint amongst Artists, that in his Pictures of the Virgin Mother, and the Boy Jesus, he had frequently given only that of his Wife, who was far from being a Beauty, how-ever exact he otherwise was in the Symmetry of his Persons. I had one, the reverse of that, which to my great Grief is lost: it was the Face of the Virgin in lively Colours, and the most exact proportion of a hu-man Face, than which fancy could not have formed any thing more beautiful, regular, or exquisite, and which I would gladly recover at any rate. The Do-ctor does not confuse what he had undertaken to con-fute; for tho' there was a very fine Picture of the Virgin, done by Durer, it does not follow that some other Pi-ctures of the same Saint might not have the defects complained of, for which they gave this as a reason, that Albert Durer took a fancy to draw by his own Wife, who was far from being handsome.

VOL. II.

[F] It is said this great Painter died very poor.] Fioravanti has inferred this in one of his Books, and pretends that prodigality brought that Painter to this Misfortune. Our Doctor has confused him in the following manner (17): Sed & alia Viro egregio ex-probantur, quæ Noribergera constanter pernegat, ex quibus est, quod Fioravanti in memorabilibus re-fer, tam male frugis Oeconomum fuisse, ut tot operum confector, defunctus ex publico efferendus fuerit, cum

(17) Ibid. Note. He had confessed before, in Citat. (13), that Albert Durer, was always poor tho' he lived very frugally.

(1) Melchior Adam, in Vitis Philofoph. Germ. pag. 701 but according to Reusnerus in Diario, pag. 55, it was in 1527.

(m) In the second Entretien, pag. 224. See also pag. 383, and following.

lover of Mirth and Diversions, but in a way consistent with good manners. He was wife and virtuous, and never employed his Art in obscene Representations [G]. He composed some Books which were printed. That which he undertook to write, upon the Rules of Painting, is one of them; but as he was of an over-nice Taste, he proceeded so slowly in it that he did not live to see the Edition of that Book finished [H]. He died at Nuremberg the Sixth of April 1528 (l), and was buried in the Churchyard of St John's Church, where his good Friend Bilibaldus Pirckheimerus consecrated a very honourable monumental Inscription to him. Vasari calls him Duro. Mr Felibien, who calls him Durer in the place where he speaks of him fully, calls him Dure in other places (m). I only make this Remark, to prove by an Example what I shall say in the Remark [B] of the Article EPHORUS.

* cūm mihi probatis documentis sit ostensum, non contemnendam æris & suppellectilis sortem post se reliquisse. Quod si ex publico ipsi funus decretum, id virtutis potius precium, quàm infamiae notam Sen. populisque Noribergenſis prudentiff. haud dubio voluit. — There are other things which are laid to this great Man's charge, which Nuremberg as positively denies. Such is the Assertion of Fioravanti, that he was so bad an Oeconomist, that, notwithstanding he had completed so many Pieces, he was buried at the public expence; though I am convinced by undeniable Proofs, that he left no inconsiderable Sum, both in Money and Effects: And if the expence of his Funeral was defrayed by the Public, it was rather a reward of his worth, than a mark of his shame, and as such was meant by the prudent Senate of Nuremberg.

[G] He never employed his Art in obscene Representations. This was a liberty which too many Painters took at that time; but he never conformed to their ill example. Cui autem obsecrum est non paucas laudem & admirationem vulgi quaesivisse obsecumate pingendi, dum quæ non nisi occultè fieri honestè nequeant, imò quæ ne occulte quidem facta, nefario scelere & probro vacent; tabulis expressa publicarunt: hos ne pudicos quisquam credet, quorum mens & dextera talia fuerit molita . . . (18). Hoc igitur loco optimo jure admirabimur Durerum sanctimoniam & pudoris diligentissimum custodem . . . (19). Nulla spurcitia, nullum dedecus, in ipsius operibus extat, reſugientibus scilicet talia omnia castissimi animi cogitationibus. — None can be ignorant that many Painters have gained the Applause and Admiration of the Vulgar by their obscene Performances, exposing not only those Actions which cannot bear the Day, but even those which the Night cannot defend. Can Men who exercise their Head and Hands in such Practices be accounted modest? . . . We have therefore the greatest reason to admire Durer, who always kept a strict guard over his Innocence and Modesty. . . . No looseness, no immodest touch, appears in his Works, his honest Heart being utterly averse to all such things.

[H] His Book upon the Rules of Painting was printed; but as he was of too nice a Taste, he did not live to see the Edition of that Work finished. Let us continue to quote Joachim Camerarius; for it is from him that Melchior Adam borrows all he says concerning Albert Durer. Priusquam abſolvere omnia & correcta edere, ut cupierat, posset, morte est ereptus, placida illa quidem & optabili, sed profecto multorum judicio præmatura. Erat autem si quid omnium in illo viro quod vitii simile videretur, unica infinita diligentia & in se quoque inquisitrix sæpe parum æqua. Hunc igitur mors ab incepta editione operis fustulit, quam tamen consummarunt amici ex illius præscriptione (20). — He was cut off before he had published, or even put the last hand to his Work, as he wished to have done. His Death was mild and desirable, but thought by many too early. If any thing in him bore the Appearance of a Crime, it must be his excessive Application, and severity in judging of himself. Though the Edition of his Works was interrupted by his Death, it was afterwards perfected by his Friends according to his own Directions. The Edition was finished after his Death. Note, that Durer was no Scholar, and that he wrote in German, and whatever we have of his in Latin is a Translation by other hands. The Book I have just mentioned was put into Latin by Joachim Camerarius, and is intituled, De Symmetria Partium in reſiſ formis humanorum corporum. It was printed at Nuremberg, in folio, in 1532, and at Paris in 1557 (21). An Italian Translation of it was printed at Venice in 1591. Albert Durer's other Books are Institutiones Geometricæ, at Paris by Wechell 1532 (22). De urbibus, arcibus, castellisque condendis & muniendis, at Paris by the same 1531 (23). De varietate figurarum & flexuris partium ac gestibus imaginum, at Nuremberg 1534 (24). They stole a Treatise from him, which he had wrote on the Symmetry of the parts of a Horse. He knew very well who had done him the injury, but he chose rather to bear his loss and trouble secretly, than depart from his usual moderation and mildness, as he must have done, if he had proceeded against those Thieves (25).

(20) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Philof. Germ. pag. 70. ex Præfat. Joach. Camerarii in Libro de Symmetria Partium.

(21) Epit. Bibl. Gelfneri, pag. 19.

(22) Gelfner. in Biblioth. fol. 17, verso.

(23) Idem, ibid.

(24) Epit. Bibl. Gelfneri, pag. 19.

(25) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Philof. Germ. pag. 70.

(18) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Philof. Germ. pag. 67.

(19) Idem, p. 69.

(a) See the Prodromus Tractatum Irenicorum Joh. Durei, pag. 122.

(b) See the Article BEDELL, Remark [D].

(c) Prodromus, Tract. Irenicorum, pag. 111.

DURY (JOHN), in Latin DURÆUS, a Protestant Divine, a Scot by Nation, in the XVIIth Century, laboured with great Zeal to re-unite the Lutherans and the Calvinists. His strong Inclination to be employed in this Great Work, and the hopes of succeeding in it, engaged him to let his Superiors know that he could use his Talents to more advantage by travelling abroad in the World, than by being confined to the Care of one single Flock. They agreed to his Proposals, and permitted him to go from place to place, to negotiate an Accommodation between the Protestant Churches. He even obtained the Approbation and Recommendation of the Archbishop of Canterbury (a). I have said in another place (b), that he was assisted by the Bishop of Kilmore, and also by Joseph Hall Bishop of Exeter, as he acknowledges in the Preface of his Prodromus. He began by publishing his Projects of a Re-union [A], and he appeared in the famous Assembly of the Evangelics of Germany at Frankfort, in the Year 1634 (c). The Churches of Transylvania sent to him, in the same Year, their Advice

[A] He began by communicating to the Public his Project of a Re-union. I find in the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library his Aliquot Theologorum Gallie & trium Ecclesiarum Anglicanarum Episcoporum (Sc. Davenantii, Mortoni, & Halli) Sententia de pacis rationibus inter Evangelicos usurpandis, printed in the Year 1634. I say nothing of the Treatises which followed this, as Hypomnemata de studio pacis Ecclesiasticæ at Amsterdam 1636. Informatio de eis quæ in studio Ecclesiasticæ concordie inter Evangelicos prosequendo, agitare instituit Duræus erga Ecclesiarum Danicarum Theologos.

[B] He

Advice and Counsel (d). He treated afterwards with the Divines of Sweden and Denmark; he left no stone unturned, he consulted the Universities, and communicated their Answers, nor was he discouraged by all the fruitless pains he had taken, even in the Year 1661 [B]: but at last, in the Year 1674, he was out of heart, and as he had no more hopes of doing the Church service by the Methods he had hitherto attempted, he raised new Batteries, he had recourse to another Expedient, which was to labour at a new Explication of the Apocalypse [C], as a sure Means to re-unite all Christians. He enjoyed at that time a very agreeable retreat in the Country of Hesse [D]. I know not in what Year he died. Some have confounded him with the Jesuit JOHN DURÆUS [E]. It was thought the Lutherans would look upon him with a less favourable eye, when they were informed that the Episcopal Party began to decline in England [F]. We shall see his Journey to Metz, and some other Particulars, in the Article FERRI (e).

The

[B] He was not discouraged by all the fruitless Pains he had taken, even in the Year 1661. See the Book he published at Amsterdam that Year, which is intitled, Jobannis Duræi Irenicorum Tractatum Prodrum, in quo præliminaries continentur Tractatus de I. Pacis Ecclesiasticæ remoris & medio tollendis. II. Concordiæ Evangelicæ fundamentis sufficienter jactis. II. Reconciliationis Religiosæ procurandæ argumentis & mediis. IV. Methodo investigatoria ad controversias omnes, sine contradicendi studio & præjudicio pacifice decidendas. Qui præmittuntur collectorum inter Protestantes conciliorum pacificorum harmoniæ, propædium Deo permitte adornandæ & in lucem edendæ. The Preface to this Book is dated Amsterdam, 1. October 1661. He gives an account therein of the Books he had promised the Public, and proposes the expedients which he thought the most proper to make his design successful. He assures his Readers, that the first Article agreed upon in the Preliminaries of the future Peace, was, that the affair should not be managed by a Scholastical Disputation. It was of great consequence to agree upon this; for that way of Disputation could only serve to foment the obstinacy of the Parties, and render the Conclusion farther off. Dury, at that time, appeared as full of hopes as ever of succeeding, and when he set out for Germany he desired of the Divines of Utrecht an authentic Testimonial of their good Intentions, after having communicated to them the state he had left the affair in with the King of Great-Britain, and the Elector of Brandenburg; and what had passed at the Court of Hesse, and the measures they had actually taken at Geneva, Heidelberg, and Metz. He desired to have this Testimonial of the Divines of Utrecht to shew it to the Germans: which he obtained accordingly, and published at the end of his Prodrum.

[C] He had recourse to another Expedient, which was to labour upon a new explication of the Apocalypse. He published, in the Year 1674, a little Book in French, intitled Concerning understanding the Apocalypse by the Apocalypse itself. How the holy Scripture ought to be reasonably understood. He declares in the Epistle Dedicatory (1), that he has nothing to reproach himself with, though he gives up the pacifice Negotiation which had been continued so many Years with the Lutheran Ministers: He plainly insinuates that he was forced to relinquish it, that is to say, because they would no longer hearken to him, or have any Correspondence with him upon this Matter. Having finished, says he (2), all the Labour that can be expected from me, with the Parties concerned, as a Solicitor of the Evangelic Councils; I have no more to do with the particular heads on that side, since they seem to have taken a Resolution to be silent to me, though they continue to foment the usual animosity of the vulgar. . . . But since now I find myself obliged to put an end to these proceedings, because they will hold no farther Correspondence with me, concerning the Propositions which have been regularly offered to all, and are without any Exception whatsoever: Since, I say, for these reasons I am forced to desist from my undertaking (for I ought to press nothing with importunity; what is not done voluntarily, and out of a principle of Confidence, is not of God); I have taken a more general Resolution (3). It will not be amiss to see his Confession concerning the ill success of his Travels and Fatigues. 'Now being come to this point, I thought it proper to consider what Fruit the public, or even myself have reaped after so much pains. When I contemplate the public, I see God does not permit the Fruit of this Seed to grow or be gathered before the time of the Harvest be come; and when I reflect upon myself, the chief Fruit I have had of all my Toil, both within and without, is this: That, without, I see the Misery of Christians is much greater than that of the Pagans, and other Nations; I see the Cause of that Misery, I see the want of a Remedy, and I see the Cause of that want: This is the Summary of what I have got by my labours without. And, within, I have no other benefit, than the Testimony of my own Conscience, which is my Consolation (4). You must not imagine that, after such a Confession, he took a Resolution to be quiet; for on the contrary, he engaged in a much greater Enterprize. He could not reconcile the Reformed and the Lutherans, and yet undertakes to reunite all the Sects of Christians: My new Enterprize, says he (5), differs in nothing from the former as to the Substance of the Evangelical Work, but only as to the extent of my Labour, and the Method of insinuating into the Consciences of those I address myself to; for I will no longer confine my Application to Protestants alone, but my Aim is to comprehend all Christians divided into Factions against the design of the heavenly Vocation; which is proposed to us in the Gospel, and attested by holy Writ. But is the Method he intends to take capable of promising such great Success? Nothing less than this, and yet he promises himself wonders from it (6). But we shall speak of this in another place (7).

[D] He enjoyed a very agreeable retreat in the Country of Hesse. Hedwige Sophia the Landgrave's Consort, who had the Regency of the Country, had assigned Dury a very commodious Quarter, and maintenance for a well furnished Table, and granted him free Passage for his Packets. He thanks her for this in the Epistle Dedicatory of the Book I have mentioned.

[E] Some have confounded him with the Jesuit JOHN DURÆUS. That Jesuit was a Scotchman, and wrote a Book against Whitaker's Answer to Campian's ten Reasons. This Book was printed at Paris in 1581, and at Ingolstadt in 1585 (8). The Oxford Catalogue ascribes it to Dury the Pacificator. Mr Baillet thought that Duræus, Whitaker's Adversary, was a Protestant (9).

[F] It was thought the Lutherans would look upon him with a less favourable Eye, when they were informed that the Episcopal Party declined in England. This was what Vossius wrote to Grotius in the Month of January 1641. 'Joannes Duræus jam quasi hebdomas est, quod à Germania huc venit, à suis in Britanniam revocatus. Quid promoverit, ex literis ejus intelliges, quas ad te ut mitterem jussit. Plurimum autem metuo, ne in irritum cadant, quæcumque hætenus inter Lutheranos egit. Jam decennio, antequam ille hanc provinciam fulciperet, nihil æque objectabant Lutheranæ, quam pacificatores omnes agere hanc causam malo dolo. . . . Quamquam vero adventu D. Duræi, non omnino suam opinionem mutarant Lutheranæ: plerique tamen aliquanto meliorem de eo sententiam conceperunt, eo quod missus foret à Clero Anglicano (10). — It is now about a Week since John Duræus came hither from Germany being recalled by his Friends in England. m. 167. See You will learn his success by his Letters, which also Epist. 405. be

(1) This Book is dedicated to the Princess of Hesse.

(2) Dury, Epistle Dedicat. p. 3, 4.

(3) Ibid. p. 7, 8.

(4) Ibid. pag. 50, & seq.

(5) In the Remarks [E] and [F].

(4) Ibid. p. 4, 5.

(5) Idem, Prefat. pag. 16.

(6) Quodlibet impotens sperare. Horat. Od. 37. lib. 1.

(7) In Remark [F] of the Article FERRI.

(8) Alegambe, Biblioth. Scæ. Jesu, pag. 237.

(9) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, Tom. III, pag. 136.

(10) Vossius, E. pist. 401. pag. 167. See also Epist. 405.

The Letter he wrote to Peter du Moulin, concerning the State of the English, Scotch, and Irish Churches under Cromwell, was printed with some other Pieces at London, in the Year 1658, in 12°, by the Care of Lewis du Moulin. It is a curious Tract, and discovers that he was no Enemy to the Independants.

' be ordered me to send you. But I am much afraid, ' finister end Though the Lutherans did not alto-
' that what he has hitherto done amongst the Lutherans ' gether change their sentiments on his arrival, yet they
' will come to nothing. Ten Years ago, before he under- ' in general conceived a better Opinion of him, as being
' took this Pacific Office, the Lutherans objected no- ' deputed by the Clergy of England. The rest is in
' thing so much as that all such Mediators had some the Margin (11).

(11) Sed quid animi nunc, ad ineundum cum Ecclesiis Gallicis, & Belgicis, fore putabimus, ubi cognorint, hoc agi in Britannia, ut accusatis, damnatis, ejectis omnibus, quos non longe à se abire, & omnino modestie, & pacis amantiores credebant, triumphantem, quos ipsi Calvinianos, in Anglia autem Puritanos nuncupant? — But what Inclination shall we think they will now have to unite with the Churches of France and Holland, when they shall be informed, that in England, all those whom they believed to be ready to join hands, and to be inclined to Moderation and Peace, are accused, condemned, and oppressed, that those may triumph whom they call Calvinists, and who in England are known by the Name of Puritans. Idem, Ibid.

E B E D

E.

BED-JESU. Look for HEBEDJESU.

ECHELLENSIS (ABRAHAM) a learned Maronite, whom Mr le Jay employed upon his Polygot Bible (a). Gabriel Sionita, his Countryman (b), had drawn him to Paris, to make him his Fellow-labourer in the Edition of that Bible [A]. They quarrelled to such a degree that their contention made a scandalous noise: Gabriel Sionita carried his Complaints into Parliament, and threw cruel Aspersions upon his Companion (c). Mr Claude took the advantage of this diffamation, to discredit the Testimony of Ecchellenfis alledged by Mr Arnauld [B]. Those who replied to Mr Claude did not vindicate the aspersed Maronite [C]. The Congregation de propaganda fide added him, about the year 1636, to those who were translating the Scriptures into Arabic (d). They recalled him out of France, and he was upon that Version at Rome, in the year 1652. He published something in that City, and died there in the Month of July 1664 (e). See the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary (f), where you will find a curious Article concerning this Man.

Whilst he was at Rome Professor of the Oriental Languages, he was chosen by the Grand Duke Ferdinand II, to translate out of Arabic into Latin the fifth, sixth, and seventh

[A] Gabriel Sionita had drawn him to Paris, to make him his Fellow-Labourer in the Edition of Mr le Jay's Polygot Bible.] This does not agree with what is delivered in the Supplement to Moreri: I cannot help it; I have a good Authority; for I do but follow Mr Simon, and I have the more Reason to depend upon his Testimony, as it was designed to preserve the Honour of our Ecchellenfis, in an Affair that made a great Noise. All the World knows that the dispute between Mr Arnauld and Mr Claude passed for a very considerable Matter. Mr Simon became a Party in it to encounter Mr Claude upon the Opinion of the Greeks; it was for the Interest of his Cause, that Ecchellenfis should be an honest Man, and Sionita a Calumniator. Now this is one of his Proofs as to the latter: Gabriel brought Ecchellenfis to Paris, and acknowledged him for his Companion; therefore he did not acknowledge him for the Author of all the Knave-ries he charged him with afterwards. 'Si impostor erat Abraham, cur Gabriel ante quam lis inter eos mota fuisset eum fratris nomine compellavit? Si hæc vera sunt quæ de Abrahamo Gabriel affirmavit, hunc impostorem potius esse existimaverim: cum ille ipse rogatus et accersitus Parisios venerit (1). — If Abraham was an Impostor, why did Gabriel, before their Quarrel commenced, call him Brother. If these things, which Gabriel affirmed of Abraham, are true I should sooner imagine Gabriel to have been the Impostor, since he came to Paris, solely at his Request and Invitation.' Every Body sees that Mr Simon would not have alledged an uncertain Fact, when he was to draw so great an Advantage from this Allegation against Mr Claude; could he imagine that Mr Claude would put up with a doubtful Story? therefore I have Reason to believe what he delivers is preferable to these Words of Moreri's Continuator: 'Mr le Jay, who was compiling the great Bible, having quarrelled with Gabriel Sionita the Maronite, sent for Abraham Ecchellenfis from Rome.' This intimates that those two Maronites were not Fellow-Labourers in the Edition of Mr le Jay's Polygot Bible, though Mr Simon assures us of the contrary. 'Gabriel Sionita adversus Abrahamum Ecchellensem supremæ curiæ Parisiensis libellum quendam supplicem obtulerat, in quo gravissimè de Abrahamo, qui ei Socius in editione Bibliorum Parisiensium adjunctus fuerat, conqueritur (2). — Gabriel Sionita presented an Address to the Parliament of Paris, wherein he makes heavy complaint against Abraham Ecchellenfis, who had been appointed, his Goadjutor, in publishing the Polygot.' Mr Nicelle affirms the same as we shall see hereafter.

(1) Richardus Simon, in Fide Ecclesiæ Orient. pag. 198.

(2) Id. ibid.

[B] Mr Claude took the Advantage of this Diffamation, to discredit the Testimony of Ecchellenfis alledged by Mr Arnauld.] What Mr Arnauld had alledged concerning the belief of the Melchites, was taken from the Notes of our Ecchellenfis, made by Hebedjesu, on the Catalogue of the Chaldean Books. To this he replied. 'The Testimony of Abraham Ecchellenfis, deserves no Credit, and I refer my self to Gabriel Sionita, his Countryman, for this, who has represented him as an ignorant pragmatist Fellow, a Knave, a Liar, an Impostor, and a Cheat. These two Men had both studied in the Seminary of the Maronites at Rome, and were both absolutely attached to the Interests of the Romish Church; but quarrelling about the Edition of the Bible in Syriac, Gabriel thought himself obliged to set out Abraham in his true light to the World; for this purpose he addresses a Writing to him, called, Commonitorium Apologeticum, in which he describes him in the manner I have just mentioned: he accuses him of having divided the whole Seminary at Rome, of betraying the Patriarch of the Maronites, of deceiving Prince Fachraddin, of cheating the Duke of Florence, of having been banished from his own Country, and imprisoned at Florence for his Crimes, and in short he threatens him, for his utter Confusion, to print some Letters he had received from Mount Libanus, Rome, and Florence, concerning his Life. In my Opinion this is sufficient to make a Man's Sincerity be called in question (3).'

[C] Those who replied to Mr Claude, did not vindicate the aspersed Maronite.] Mr Simon agrees that Sionita and Ecchellenfis quarrelled by having an Eye too much on Mr le Jay's Purse. 'Ita fit ut dum quique nummis D. le Jay, cujus sumptibus Polyglotta illa Biblia in vulgus edita sunt, inhiet, illi pacem diu tenere non poterint.' This is not a very good Introduction to an Apology for a Man. One Cut-Purse may draw another to a place, where he observes there is a good Harvest, but afterwards he may desire to be alone, if he finds himself incommoded by the Division of the Booty. So that the Proof, which I mentioned in the preceding Remark, is of no Force; for since Mr Simon confesses that these two Maronites were Sharpers, Sionita might very well bring the other to Paris, though he knew him to be a Knave. So that, instead of justifying Ecchellenfis, they do but blacken his Comrade. The good Character, which Father Morin gave Ecchellenfis, proves nothing against Mr Claude; for Father Morin does not warrant the time that Sionita speaks of; he only says that Ecchellenfis appeared to be an honest and

(a) This Hebedjesu, that he lived in the XVIIth Century.

(b) Mr de Breves, Ambassador at the Porte, brought him into France, in 1614. Galland, in Vita Petrefkii, lib. 3, pag. m. 281.

(c) See Remark [A], Citat. (2).

(d) The Abba Nazari, in his Giornale de Letterati, of the 20th of January, 1672.

(e) Nazari, ibid.

(f) Under Abraham Ecchellen, pag. m. 30, of the second Tome, in 8vo.

(3) Claude, Response à la Perpetuité de la Foi défendus, lib. 2.

(2) Translated also out of the Arabic into Latin
by Eccellenfis.

seventh Books of Apollonius's Conics. He was assisted in this Translation by John Alfonso Borelli [D], a famous Mathematician, who added a Commentary to it. The whole was printed at Florence under Archimedes's Book de Assumptis (g), in the year 1661, in Folio. The Preface contains some Particulars [E], which would be the best part of this Article, if I could deliver them with their chief Circumstances. I shall speak of the Quarrel between Mr de Flavigny and Abraham Eccellenfis, in which may be seen an Instance of the Confusion which may be caused by Errors of the Press, and of the insufferable Vexation they give to an Author [F].

(4) Richardus
Simon, in Fide Eccellenfis Orient.
pag. 198.

very laborious Man, during his stay at Paris; but it is not in that Period of Time, the Accuser fixed the Rogueries of his Companion. 'Multa silentio præterire visum est, quæ in commendationem Abrahami proferri possent, atque imprimis Epistolam, quæ doctissimus Joannes Morinus amplissimum Cardinalem Franciscum Barberinum, de illius probitate vigilis assiduis, & labore indefesso quandiu Parisiis commoratus est, certiorum facit (4). — I have chose to pass over in silence, what might be produced in favour of Eccellenfis, but particularly the letter, where, in the learned Morinus informs Cardinal Barberini of his Integrity, Industry, and unwearied Application, during his stay at Paris.' Let us see whether another of Mr Claude's Antagonists has made a better defence for the Party accused.

These are his Words. 'There is no good Sense in the Contempt, Mr Claude has shewn of the Passages cited by Eccellenfis, under pretence that Gabriel Sinita, his Partner in the Correction of the Polyglot Bible, printed at Paris, falling out with him, has laid several Reflexions upon him, which have no Relation to the Falsification of the Passages. It does not become Mr Claude to make himself a judge of the difference between these two Maronites, and yet less to declare himself a Party against Eccellenfis, upon the single Testimony of his Adversary: but let it be how it will, all those personal Reproaches do not give him any right to reject the Passages which are cited in the Books of that Author, because they do not make it credible, that citing as he does the Books, from which he has taken his Passages, the greatest part of which are in the Vatican Library, he should have the boldness to forge them (5). Nothing can be more loose than such a Justification as this, and since he does not refer the Reader to Eccellenfis's Replies, but is contented to say that we ought to stand neuter in this Quarrel; it is very probable this Man answered nothing, or answered very ill. What the Jansenist Writer takes for his last Shift, is better than all the rest; for after all there are some Circumstances in which we may believe that a Rogue durst not commit a Forgery.

(5) Réponse générale au nouveau Livre de Mr Claude, l.v. 1, cap. 13, pag. 214. This Answer is ascribed to Mr Nicolas.

[D] He was assisted, in the Translation of Apollonius, by John Alfonso Borelli.] This was very necessary; for he, that was to translate, did not understand the Mathematics, and therefore, how skillful soever he might be in the Arabic Language, he would have stumbled at every step. 'Verabatur (difficultas) circa disciplinæ vocabulorum intelligentiam & notionum quarum ignari eramus, & penitus jejuni (6). — The difficulty lay in understanding the Terms of Art, and the Subject, whereof we were intirely ignorant.

(6) Eccellenfis, Pref. ad Apoll. Conica.

(7) Licet Arabici idiomatis sumptuosus ignarus. Jo. Alfonso Borelli, Pref. ad Apoll.

On the other hand, Borelli was utterly ignorant of that Language (7); but he understood the Subject of the Manuscript, and by means of the Geometrical Figures he guessed the true meaning of Apollonius, upon the Translator's explaining to him, never so little, a few Words. 'Porro quod hac in re magis mirandum est, (this is the Testimony Eccellenfis gives of the great Genius of Borelli) nec silentio prætereundum, ex e rat Viro illi doctissimo singularis ingenii perspicacitas, ut sæpe in abstrusis quibusdam locis, non ex integris, inquam, præmissis, sed ex unica dictione totam illationem inde colligeret, non sensu, sed totidem pene verbis, ac si Arabica legeret verba, & linguæ veteranus esset professor (8). — What is more surprizing, and which ought not to be passed over in silence, (says Eccellenfis, in the Testimony, which he gives of Borelli's great Genius) was his uncommon quickness of Conception, by which that learned Man could deduce the whole Inference, I do not mean from the Premises, but from a single Word, and would give not only the full sense of the Author, but almost in the same Words, as if he had understood the Language, and had been an old Professor of it.'

(8) Eccellenfis, Pref. ad Apoll. Conica.

[E] His Prefate contains some Particulars.] He informs us that he received a Thousand Favours from the Grand Duke Ferdinand II, not only when, in full Prosperity, he resided at his Court with the Title of Deputy of the Emir Fachraddin, but also after the ruin of his Affairs. Let us see how he expresses himself. 'Memini profecto, nec ex animo meo exciderit, imo clavo fixum trabali manet, quanta in me contulit Magnus Ferdinandus Secundus ornamenta, quanta in me usus est liberalitate, & beneficentia, non tantum dum fortuna mihi ardebat, non solum dum res succedebat prosperè, non modo dum ad illum ab Amiro Fachraddino missus singulari felicitate fruebar, sed etiam in naufragio, & jactura illa barbarica, in Carrellina conjuratione & proditione, in adversissima fortuna (9) — I remember indeed, and it is fastened too strongly on my Memory ever to forget, what Favours the Great Ferdinand II heaped upon me, with what marks of Esteem, with what Generosity he received me, not only whilst Fortune smiled, whilst my Affairs were in a happy Situation, not only whilst I was honoured with a Commission at his Court from Amiro Fachraddin; but even in the wreck of my Fortune, after a most melancholy Misfortune, in the Carrelline Conspiracy and Defection, in the most miserable Circumstances.'

(9) Idem.

[F] An instance of the Confusion which may be caused by Errors of the Press, and of the Trouble . . . they give to an Author.] It is known that Mr de Flavigny writ two letters against that magnificent Work of the Bible, in seven Languages, by Mr le Jay. A learned Maronite, Professor Royal of the Syriac and Arabic Languages, named Abraham Eccellenfis, who came from Rome to Paris, had a hand in that Bible. It was he who furnished the Arabic and Syriac Text of the Book of Ruth, with the Latin Version. Mr de Flavigny wrote, in the Year 1647, his third letter against Eccellenfis and his Book of Ruth, pretending it was full of faults. In the middle of the second Page of the first Leaf, he puts these Passages which are taken from the seventh Chapter of St Matthew, Verse 3. 'Quid vidis festucam in oculo fratris tui, & trabem in oculo tuo non vides: And verse 5. Ejice primum trabem de oculo tuo, & tunc videbis ejicere festucam de oculo fratris tui. — Why seest thou a Moat in thy Brother's Eye, and beholdest not a Beam in thine own Eye. And verse 5, Pull out the Beam out of thine own Eye, and then thou shalt see clearly to cast out the Moat out of thy Brother's Eye. He designed by these Words to let Eccellenfis understand, that having committed many Faults in the Book of Ruth, he wrongfully reproached his Brother Maronite Gabriel Sinita, Professor Royal as well as himself, for having made some mistakes in the Arabic and Syriac Books, he had published in Mr le Jay's Bible. The Maronite, seeing himself under a necessity of answering, began by charging the Doctor with committing an enormous Crime upon the Passage he had cited; in pretending, by an unparalleled Impiety, to correct the sacred Text of the Evangelist, retrenching a modest Word, and substituting another, which is not so, in it's room. He aggravated this pretended Crime in a stinging and outrageous Style: see how he expresses himself in his first Letter, which he calls Epistola Apologetica prima, printed in 8vo, in the Year 1647, p. 11. Ad primum quod attinet, tua Judaica modestia ac pietas, humanissime Flavignane, summo perè elucescit, ut alia cætera loca omittam, ex iis verbis quæ in me retulisti ex cap. 7. divi Matthæi ver. 3. & ver. 5. quomodo autem sacro-sancti Evangelii verba depravasti, & illustrasti in hoc loco, ac sacra immiscuisti profanis, ne expectes à me ut illa secundum sacrilegam emendationem tuam hic referam, solum enim meminisse animus horret, luctuque refugit. Quamobrem non in meis, sed in tuis scriptis id legatur, & accerrimum Hebrææ veritatis veritatis propugnatores! Hebraicus Textus, ubi verbum aliquod inhonestum occurrit, honestis velat verbis: Tu vero Hebraice Linguae Professor, illiusque Textus importune ad stomachum uique defensor ac rabula, Sacro-sancti Evangelii Sacrosancta verba impietate inaudita turpas, fœdas, & spurcè illis abuteris. Ex quo liquidò apparet, quos mirabiles progressus in pietate & Lectione sacrarum Scripturarum, quas crepas semper, feceris. Ex verbis tuis, Flavignane, quissimam sis optimè cognoscimus, quia qualis homo est talis etiam ejus erit oratio, orationi autem facta simillima, factis vita, ut ex Socrate refert Cicero lib. 5. Quæst. Tuscul. — As to the first, most humane Flavigny, your Jewish modesty and piety displays itself in very lively colours in those Words, not to mention any others, which you apply to me, out of the seventh Chapter of St Matthew, v. 3, and 5. But how have you corrupted the reading of the Holy Gospel, played upon the Passage, and confounded things sacred with profane: do not expect that I should quote it according to your impious Emendation; my mind starts back with horror and grief at the bare Thought. Wherefore let it not be read in my Writings; but your own. O redoubted Champion of the Hebrew Truth! when any loose Expression occurs, the Hebrew Text veils it with a modest Phrase. But you, a Professor of the Hebrew Language, and a noisy pedantic Stickler for the Text, by an unheard of Impiety, profane, deprave, and obscenely abuse the holy Words of the Holy Gospel. From whence it is manifest, what progress you have made in Religion, from your boasted reading of the sacred Scriptures. From your own Words, Flavigny, we learn who you are; for, as Cicero relates from Socrates, Such as the Man is, such are his Words; such as the Words, such the Actions; such as the Actions, such is the Life. Thus he goes on for six pages. Here are high Words. Here is a heinous Charge. Here is a great noise made, and a Doctor vehemently aspersed. He is accused of Impiety, and Sacrilege, and his Morals suspected. Who would imagine that all these bitter Reproaches have no other Foundation than an Error of the Press (10)? Mr Chevallier, who furnishes me with this long Passage, explains what this Error consisted in, and how it was committed by the Printer after Mr de Flavigny had revised the last Proof. The mischief came from the first Letter of the Word. Oculò dropping accidentally out of the Form, as the Compositor rectified an ill set Line. Mr de Flavigny, being informed what Abraham Ecchellenfis had reproached him with, could not find the Error in his printed Copy, nor would acknowledge it, till his Friend, Mr de Auvergne, Professor Royal of Arabic, shewed it him with his Finger. Immediately he wrote his fourth Letter . . . he publicly swore his Innocence in Terms of Scripture . . . (11): he said, that certainly a Fever had made the Printer lose his Senses, and that he must be mad when he printed the word with that Error (12). His anger was hardly appeased (13), thirty Years after the Impression of his Letter.

(10) Chevallier Origine de l'imprimerie de Paris, Part. II. cap. 5, pag. 169, & seq.

(11) Ibid. pag. 174.

(12) Ibid. pag. 172.

(13) Ibid.

EDWARD IV, King of England, was called Earl of March before he ascended the Throne in the year 1461. He was the Son of a Duke of York, who had attempted to dethrone Henry VI, and would have succeeded in it, if by too great a nicety in dissembling his Ambition he had not prevented the effects of it (a). His Son observing no such Nicety was more fortunate [A]: he did not amuse himself with ob-

(a) See Remark [A].

[A] Edward observing no such Nicety was more fortunate.] A modern Historian, having brought down his Narration to the battle in which the Earl of Pembroke, who sided with Henry VI, was defeated (1), makes this Reflexion. 'It was observed upon this Occasion, amidst abundance of Qualities, in which the Earl of March resembled the late Duke his Father, that he had a different Genius from him. The Duke, like those who endeavour in vain to untie the Gordian Knot, had been long attempting a thing he could never attain. The Earl, like Alexander, cut asunder, at one blow, the fatal Knot, arriving directly at Sovereignty. He was no sooner come to London, than he called together the Bishops, the Nobility, and the principal Citizens, representing them, in a lively Manner, the ancient Pretensions of his Family, the Agreement made in the last Parliament between the Duke his Father and Henry, which the latter had violated: and therefore he maintained that the Crown was devolved in full Right to the Heir of the former. He pushed this Affair so warmly, that he was immediately declared King, by the name of Edward IV, upon the third of March, one thousand four hundred and sixty one (2). The Reader will better understand this Passage, if I relate what the Author had said of the Duke of York's cautious management. The Duke resolved to supplant Henry VI; but observed 'all the necessary Precautions in such an Enterprize. He appeared late in it, and when he did appear it was with the common Protestation of all Rebels, that his design was not against the King, but to remove evil Ministers who governed the Kingdom very ill (3). His Party was named the white Rose, and the other the red Rose: they entered into open War (4) with one another, in the Year 1454 (5): the two Armies were in view of each other within ten Miles of London, when the King sent to the Duke, to know his Pretensions, and why he was in Arms. The Duke, whose Interest it was to conceal his Designs from his Army, answered that his Intention was not to attack the King, but to drive from his Presence a wicked Minister who abused his Authority (6); and to shew the truth of what he said, he promised to disband his Army, provided that evil Minister (7) was committed to Prison. He was taken at his Word, to his great Mortification; for he durst not go back from it. Some time after he took the advantage of the King's Sickness;

to seize the Duke of Somerſet in the Queen's own Apartments: but the fear he was under, lest they should penetrate too far into his Designs, probably hindered him from shortening, by one violent blow, the tedious Formalities he was to observe in destroying his Adversary, in a Parliamentary Way, and by this means he was once more the Dupe of his own Politics (8). The King recovered, and speaking like a King by the Queen's Direction, the Duke of Somerſet was set at Liberty. The Duke of York retired from the Court, and levying forces marched with them to London, still protelling his design was not against the King, but only against his Minister (9). The Royal Army was routed, and the King made a Prisoner. He was still the same, and acting upon his first Scheme . . . affected more than ever a respectful carriage towards the unfortunate Monarch . . . he made him make his entry into London, which to outward Appearance looked like a Triumph, but if it is considered in its Consequences was a real Captivity (10). They obliged him to call a Parliament, who appointed him three Guardians, of whom the Duke of York was the first, under the Title of Protector of the Kingdom. . . . So that there only remained to Henry the empty Name of King, the Duke being possessed of the real Power: he had but one step to make to be Master of the whole, but he waited for the Voice of the People to move him to that decisive step, desiring together with the Crown to have the Glory of being forced to accept it. He found himself exceedingly out in his Account (11): for the Queen formed a great Party who got it declared in a new Parliament, That the King being of mature Age, and found Understanding, the Kingdom had no need of a Protector: therefore the Parliament thought proper to discharge the Duke of York from an unnecessary care, and which was injurious to the Abilities of the King, into whose hands the great Seal should be immediately restored, that he might trust it with what Subject he should judge most capable of it (12). After divers Events a battle was fought near Northampton (13), in which the King was made a Prisoner: the Duke of York, hearing of this good Success in Ireland, immediately returned to England: he shewed so plainly, that he aspired to the Crown, that no body doubted of it. Nay, he even demanded it of the Parliament in exprefs and positive Terms (14); but the whole house keeping a sullen Silence

(1) He was Brother to Henry by his Mother.

(2) D'Orleans Histoire des Re-volutions d'Angleterre, lib. 6, pag. 284, of the second Tome, at the Year 1461. I use the Edition of Paris, 1693, in 4to.

(3) Ibid. pag. 259.

(4) Ibid. pag. 257.

(5) Moreci, in the Article of Edward IV, makes this War begin in 1461. He is mistaken.

(6) D'Orleans, ubi supra, pag. 261.

(7) It was the Duke of Somerſet.

(8) D'Orleans, ubi supra, pag. 264.

(9) Ibid. pag. 265, at the Year 1456.

(10) Ibid. pag. 266.

(11) Ibid. pag. 267.

(12) Ibid. pag. 267, at the Year 1457.

(13) Ibid. pag. 268.

(14) Ibid. pag. 268.

(15) Ibid. pag. 268.

(16) Ibid. pag. 268.

(17) Ibid. pag. 268.

(18) Ibid. pag. 268.

(19) Ibid. pag. 268.

(20) Ibid. pag. 268.

(21) Ibid. pag. 268.

(22) Ibid. pag. 268.

(23) Ibid. pag. 268.

(24) Ibid. pag. 268.

(25) Ibid. pag. 268.

(26) Ibid. pag. 268.

(27) Ibid. pag. 268.

(28) Ibid. pag. 268.

(29) Ibid. pag. 268.

(30) Ibid. pag. 268.

(31) Ibid. pag. 268.

(32) Ibid. pag. 268.

taining the Title of Protector, he advanced directly to the Crown, and carried it briskly though Henry VI was yet alive. Presently after he marched against that Prince, and obtaining a signal Victory over him near York, forced him to fly into Scotland with Margaret of Anjou his Wife, a Princess of a great Spirit, and more capable of raising the Courage of the vanquished Party than her Husband (b). She went over into France to solicit Assistance from thence, but she obtained no great matter. Nevertheless, as soon as she returned to Berwick, she assembled a sufficient number of Soldiers to form a small Army, and entering with her Husband the County of Northumberland, she advanced towards Durham. Here she was joined by considerable Reinforcements; but all her Forces were defeated by Edward's Troops in the year 1463 (c). Both she and her Husband were once more obliged to retire into Scotland (d), whilst the chief Men of their Party either died in the Battle, or perished by the Hands of the Executioner. In the City of York alone, five and twenty of them died upon the Scaffold (e). The Desolation of this Party was still much greater [B], when King Henry, who had ventured to return into England under a Disguise, was taken and brought up to London with his Legs tied under the horse's belly (f). He was committed to the Tower. Some time after Edward's good Fortune failed him: he had disoblige the Earl of Warwick many ways, who had been the chief Instrument in deposing Henry VI [C]. He lence after he had ended his Speech, he saw clearly that his Affairs would not issue according to his Mind. He desired to be King, but he would wear the Crown with the good Will of his Subjects (15). An Expedient was found out to satisfy both Parties. It was agreed that the King should keep the Crown, during his Life, and at his Death it should descend to the Duke of York and his Children. The Queen would not consent to a Treaty so injurious to the Prince of Wales her Son, and therefore took Arms with the utmost diligence in the defence of his Right. The Duke marched against her, but was killed in a Battle that was fought some days after (16).

Thus his Ambition confounded him by being too refined. He could not be content with the Title of King without the Glory of being courted to reign. He durst not use violent Methods to get himself chosen, fearing it would fully his Reputation: but expecting that at length the Crown would be set upon his Head in the most solemn Manner, he died without reaching it. If he had acted as his Son did, his Reign might have been long; but he lost the Fruits of his Labour by not putting out all his strength. Moderation in such cases is commonly destructive. Fortune loves to have her Favours snatched from her (17); she succours the bold, but rejects the timorous (18).

Res est profecto stulta nequitiae modus (19).

For Men to hesitate, when once engaged In Villainy, is foolish.

I remember a Reflexion of Mezeray, which is not an ill one: As there are as few great Crimes, says he, (20), as heroic Virtues, carried to the utmost length, these Men (21), having begun one without Necessity, had not Power to commit a second, which was necessary to cover the first. Thus God hinders the progress of Wickedness, by not permitting it to be carried to an Extremity, and he generally disposes of Things in such a manner that those, who have an unbounded Boldness, have narrow Understandings; and those, who have a Genius to contrive a design, have no Courage to put it in Execution. Thus oppressed Innocence has time to breathe, and is oftentimes even delivered. Hoc uno modo, Judices, saepe multorum improbitate depressa veritas emergit, & innocentiae defensio interclusa respirat: quod aut ii, qui ad fraudem callidi sunt, non tantum audent quantum excogitant: aut illi, quorum eminet audacia atque projecta est, à consiliis malitiae deferuntur: quod si aut confidens astutia, aut callida esset audacia, vix ullo obfisti modo posset (22). — By this only means, Truth, crushed by the Oppression of Multitudes, often lifts its head afresh, and the cause of injured Innocence, that was ready to expire, receives new Breath; because either those, who are expert in cunning, have not the courage to execute what they contrive, or that they, who dare even to Madrest, are destitute of cunning, whereas it would be scarce possible to withstand the united force of courage and cunning. Extream Boldness, joined to ingenious and inventive Malice, would be an irresistible Torrent (23); a Thunderbolt that would crush whatsoever it should strike. No Throne could be supported against a Faction armed with these two Talents. For Crimes are only maintained by Crimes (24). I could cite abundance of other Sayings upon this Common-Place, but these are sufficient for the present. Let us conclude with observing, that the Text of this Remark required I should give a short account of the Duke of York's Conduct, not so much to explain the better the Subject of this Article, as to prove that his Son excelled him in the Art of bringing about a Revolution.

[B] The Deposition of Henry VI's Party was much greater. As soon as it was known that Henry VI was in Prison, all those, who remained of the Adherents to the House of Lancaster, dispersed into the Neighbouring Countries. The Queen carried her Son into France. The Earl of Pembroke wandered up and down England in disguise. Edmund the new Duke of Somerset retired into Flanders with John his younger Brother, and Henry Holland, Duke of Exeter. Though the Duchess of Burgundy was Infanta of Portugal, a Grand-daughter to one of the House of Lancaster, and well affected to them; yet every Body was so much suspected by those Princes, that they durst not declare themselves till they had continued a long time concealed in the retinue of that Court, where they had the greatest difficulty to subsist. Philip de Comines says, he saw one of them walking bare footed, begging his Bread, and in a miserable Condition, till at last being known, they allowed him a small pension, as also to the two Somerset, when they discovered themselves (25).

[C] He disoblige the Earl of Warwick many ways, who had been the chief Instrument in deposing Henry VI. The Services, which Kings cannot acknowledge, commonly make them ungrateful. A Man, to whom they are much indebted, seems to have a Right to demand much of them; and whoever has a Right to demand all becomes troublesome, even when he demands nothing. Edward owed his Crown to the Earl of Warwick: this was a Service beyond all Recompence, and which, being accompanied, besides, with other glorious Actions, had gained that Lord very much the Applauses of the People. Thereupon the King grew jealous of him, and imagining they made the same Comparison between him and the Earl of Warwick: as between Saul and David, was afraid they should say in England, as heretofore they did in Israel: Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands (26). This was the first Cause of disgust. The Earl was not rewarded according to his Merit (27), and he perceived that Edward looked upon him with a jealous Eye. This includes abundance of disagreeable things: for it is impossible that a King, who envies the Glory of one of his Subjects, should not disoblige him on several accounts.

The second Discontent arose from the Earl's being sent Ambassador to treat of his Master's Marriage with Bona of Savoy, Sister to the Queen of France. This Marriage was concluded, and they waited only for the return of an Ambassador whom the King of France had dispatched to Edward to get the Treaty signed (28), when News was brought, that the new King of England had married a Knight's Widow (29). All England

(24) Da frenas & omnem pronam nequitiam incitata. Per scelera semper sceliteribus tutum est iter. Let Rage and Malice loose into the World, Who hope to thrive in Guilt must perforce. Seneca, in Agamemnon. Act. II. Scen. I. ver. 1144.

(25) D'Orléans, ubi supra, pag. 296, 297, at the Year 1454.

(26) Ibid. lib. 7, pag. 300.

(27) And yet Edward had increased his Estate by Eighty thousand Crowns a Year. Matthieu, Hist. de Louis XI. liv. 5, cap. 6, pag. 239.

(28) D'Orléans, ubi supra, pag. 302.

(29) Ibid. pag. 305.

(b) D'Orléans, Revolutions d'Angleterre, Tom. II, pag. 285, Edit. de Paris, 1693.

(c) Ibid. pag. 292.

(d) Ibid. pag. 294.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Ibid. pag. 296.

(15) Ibid. pag. 279.

(16) Ibid. pag. 281, at the Year 1460.

(17) See the Article CHARLES V, Rem. [K].

(18) Fortuna fortuna metuit, ignavos premit. Seneca in Medea Act. II, ver. 159.

(19) Seneca in Agamemnon, Act. II, Scen. I, ver. 150.

(20) Mezerai Abregé Chronol. Tom. VI, pag. 66, at the Year 1591.

(21) That is the sixteen, who put to death the President Brisson.

(22) Cicero, Orat. pro Cluentio, cap. 65.

(23) Vis & nequitia quicquid oppugnant, ruit. When Force and Cunning join They bear all down before them. Plautus, Fab. 7, lib. 2.

He married much below his Rank [D], and made himself hated by the English for that under-match. The Earl of Warwick, having drawn over the Duke of Clarence, Edward's Brother, into his Faction, gave him his Daughter in Marriage, and projected with him to restore Henry VI to the Throne. They were very near putting their Design in Execution, having seized Edward in his Camp (g): but as he found Means to make his Escape from the place where they had confined him, they could make no advantage

(g) D'Orleans, ubi supra, p. 312, ad Ann. 1470.

'looked upon this Match with great Indignation: but no Man was so uneasy at it as the Earl of Warwick, who made no doubt but the King had done it on purpose to make him ridiculous all over Europe, by sending him to demand a great Princess, whilst he married a Gentlewoman. . . . Edward's Conduct to the Earl upon his return to London served to provoke him to the utmost. He hoped his Master would at least endeavour to mitigate his Grief, either by good Words or lame Excuses; but instead of that he was treated with Contempt and Haughtiness, which a Man of less Pride than the Earl of Warwick could hardly have born. And that nothing might be wanting to aggravate the Affront, he was informed, the debauched Monarch had attempted the Chastity of his Niece, others say his Sister, being desirous to have a Mistress in his Family (30) while he took a Wife out of another.'

Warwick, full of Revenge, resolved to set Henry on the Throne again, and happily effected his Project; thus he played with the Crown at his Pleasure: first he took it from Henry VI, and gave it to Edward; afterwards he deprived Edward of it, and restored it to Henry VI: an evident Proof that he was governed by his own Passions and Interest without any regard to Law or Justice. He had Credit enough to have mounted the Throne himself, but he thought it was more glorious to create Kings than to be one (31). His Ambition did not prompt him to reign, but to govern those who reigned (32). Moreover, it is seldom seen, that those who raise an Usurper to the Throne do long enjoy his Favours. This does not always arise from the Maxim, People love the Traitor, but hate the Traitor; nor always because they imagine, that those Men, who have dethroned their first Master, will make no scruple to dethrone a second: but the principal Cause is, those Men never think their Services sufficiently rewarded, but that a Prince, who owes his Crown to them, has no right to deny them whatever they ask (33). He neither can, nor ought, to grant this. Whereupon they are disgusted, break out into Expostulations, and are disgraced. Let us comment a little upon these Words: The Services which Kings cannot acknowledge commonly make them ungrateful, &c. (34).

The first Passage I shall cite is from the Memoirs of the Duke of Richelieu (35). 'It was very difficult for the Queen to shew a Gratitude proportioned to the great Services the Prince had done for her, and for the Prince to behave with becoming Modesty, after such great Services; for as Obligations of this nature can never be paid, they commonly produce Hatred in the Heart of the Sovereign, whilst they inspire the Subject with the Thoughts of Ambition.' Mr de la Châtre furnishes me with a second Observation. 'After we are under extraordinary Obligations to any, we seem to dread their Preference, as if it continually urged us to Acknowledgment, and blamed our Ingratitude in the least Delay (36).' Philip de Comines has preserved a very good Thought of Lewis XI, which he relates on account of some great Men, who did not find their Account in having overrated the Services they had done their Masters. He names, among others, the Earl of Warwick. 'It often happens that this Presumption arises from great Services done. They think their Merit such, that they cannot do without them, and ought to bear any thing from them. But, on the contrary, Princes are persuaded that Men are bound to serve them, and often express as much, and are very desirous to get rid of such troublesome People. Upon this Occasion I must mention the King, my Master, who once told me, speaking of those who had done good Service, and naming also his Author from whom he had it, that sometimes Men are ruined by their Services, that the greatest Services are commonly rewarded with great Ingratitude: but that it often happens, through the Fault of those who have performed such Services, who boast of, and use, their good Fortune with too much

VOL. II. No. LIV.

Arrogance, both towards their Masters and others, as well as through their Masters Unthankfulness. He told me farther, that, in his Opinion, he that would rise at Court is much happier to receive Favours from the Prince he serves, without great Desert, whereby he stands obliged to his Prince, than if he had done great Services, by which the Prince was much indebted to him, it being more natural for a Prince to love those who are obliged to him, than those to whom he is beholden (37). Let us see the Judgment of Montagne upon this: 'When, many Years ago, says he (38), I read Philip de Comines, a very good Author without doubt, I observed this for no vulgar Saying, That a Man must take care not to do his Master so much Service, that he cannot find a Reward equal to it. I ought to commend the Invention, but not Comines, for I have met with the same in Tacitus long ago: Beneficia eo usque læta sunt, dum videntur exolveri posse, ubi multum antecere, pro gratia odium redditur. And Seneca says strongly: Nam qui putat esse turpe non reddere, non vult esse cui reddat. — He that thinks it base not to make Satisfaction for a Benefit done him, wishes there was none to receive it. Cicero says more faintly: Qui se non putat satisfacere posse, amicus esse nullo modo potest. — Whoever thinks he can never make Satisfaction to another, cannot be his Friend.'

I with Montagne had not curtailed Seneca's Passage: he has taken away the beginning and the end, which were most to the purpose. See the Margin (39), and consider this: it is the Sequel of Montagne's Quotation: 'Tibi habeo quod accepisti, non repeto, non exigo. Profuisse tutum fit: nullum est odium perniciosius quam ex beneficii violati pudore.' — Enjoy what you have received, I seek not to revoke it. May it be safe to have obliged. No Enmity is more dangerous than that which proceeds from Ingratitude. I might cite also Seneca's nineteenth Letter, wherein we find that Benefits produce Hatred. 'Nullum habet majus malum occupatus homo, & bonis suis obfusus, quam quod amicos sibi putat, quibus ipse non est: quod beneficia sua efficacia judicat ad conciliandos amicos, cum quidam, quo plus debent, magis oderint. Leve æs alienum debitorem facit; grave inimicum (40). — A Man of Business and Substance can have no greater Misfortune than to take those for his Friends, who really are not, and to imagine that the conferring Favours is a sufficient Tie of Affection, since some Persons hate the more, the more they are indebted. A small Obligation gains a Friend, but a greater makes him an Enemy.' Pliny the Younger, who was admirably well versed in all the Common-Places of Panegyric, does not forget to observe, that his Hero did not resemble other Princes: they hardly ever think themselves obliged to any body, and if they think they are, they do not love that Person. 'Utriusque cura, utriusque vigilantia obstrictus es Cæsar. Sed in principis rarum ac prope insolitum est ut se putet obligatum, aut si putet amet. Debes ergo Cæsar, & solvis (41). [D] He married much below his Rank.' He was of a Constitution susceptible of all sorts of amorous Passions. His Love was sometimes fixed, sometimes wandering, frolicsome, or grave, attempting all Women thro' a loose Inclination; and now and then attached to others with a steady Passion. Such was his Love for Elizabeth Woodville, the Daughter of Baron Rivers and Jacqueline of Luxemburg, who was married to that Lord after the death of the Duke of Bedford. The King being a hunting near Grafton, a Seat of the Baron's, he went to pay a Visit to his Lady. . . . She had her Daughter with her, who, being the Widow of Sir John Gray, that was killed at the second Battle of St Albans, in the Service of Henry VI, had lost part of her Estate by the Forfeiture of her Husband's Estate. The young Widow, laying hold of this favourable Opportunity to recover what she had lost, took an occasion, during (41) Plin. in Paneg. cap. 61.

g A

(30) Polydore Virgil's Words are: Nec abhorret à veritate Edouardum tentasse, ut aiunt, asicio quid in domo Comitissæ quod ab honestate omnino abesse, cum homo esset qui facile puellas oculis alliceret easque deperiret. — It is also true that Edward made some Attempts at the Earl's, which were far from honourable, being a Man that was a great Favourite as well as an Admirer of the Fair Sex.

(31) D'Orleans, ubi supra, p. 306. He cites Sir Thomas More.

(32) Ibid. 338.

(33) See, above, the Remark [F] of the Article COLOMNA (POMPEY).

(34) Which I have mentioned in the beginning of this Remark.

OBSERVATIONS upon Ingratitude. (35) Rochefoucault, Maximes de l'Homme.

(36) La Châtre Memoirs.

(37) Philippe de Comines, lib. 3, cap. ult. pag. m. 191, 192.

(38) Montagne, Essais, lib. 3, cap. 8, pag. m. 280.

† Tacit. Annal. IV, cap. 18.

† Seneca, Epist. 81.

† Cicero, in Epist.

(39) Eo productus est furor ut periculossissima res sit beneficia in aliquem magna conferre, nam qui putat, &c. — Ingratitude is arrived to that Pitch, that it is of the most dangerous Consequence to lay a Person under any considerable Obligation. Seneca, Epist. 81.

(40) Idem, Epist. 19, pag. m. 200.

advantage of having been Masters of his Person. The General of their Forces was defeated by Edward, who ordered that he should be beheaded. This Misfortune forced them to go over to France, to solicit the Succours they promised themselves from Lewis XI (b). They met with a good Reception at the French Court, Margaret of Anjou, Wife to the imprisoned King, joining her Solicitations with theirs. The Prince of Wales, her Son, married the Earl's second Daughter. This Match was contrived by Lewis XI, as a considerable means to strengthen their Faction: on the other hand, her Strength began to encrease in England, where the Earl's Friends made great Preparations to dethrone Edward, who, far from being upon his guard, as the Duke of Burgundy, his Brother-in-law, advised him, would not lose one day hunting, nor one Party of Pleasure which he often made with the Ladies (i). The Earl landed safely at Dartmouth, with the Troops the King of France had lent him, and was immediately joined by great Numbers of the English. Edward marched against him with a fine Army, and was drawing it up in order of Battle, when he was informed the Marquis of Mountague, in whom he had confided till then, was the first to cry out God save King Henry, and that others answering the same, the Mischief had spread into all Quarters, the general Cry being God save King Henry (k). In this Conjunction he advised with his Friends what course to take: all things appeared so desperate, that they concluded it was his best way to cross the Sea, and seek Assistance from foreign Parts, while the King's Party at home should endeavour to facilitate his Return (l). Accordingly he embarked, and set sail for Flanders, but was attacked by some Pyrates (m), declared Enemies to the English, and pursued as far as Alcmar (n), where he landed (o). In the mean time the Earl of Warwick marched with his Army to London, and replaced King Henry upon the Throne (p). A Parliament was assembled, in which Edward was declared a Traitor and Usurper of the Crown, his Estate was confiscated, and all Acts signed by him were declared null and void (q). Edward privately obtained from the Duke of Burgundy a small Supply of Men, and ventured to return into England, depending upon the Friends he had there, and the Letters he received from thence, but much more upon the natural Inclination of the English to change (r). He landed, and advanced into the Country without any Opposition, being joined by the Duke of Clarence, who, having gained as many of the Soldiers as he could, openly abandoned Henry's Party. In a word, though Henry was in London with a considerable number of Lords of his Faction, and tho' the Earl of Warwick wrote to them (s) to hold out but three days, assuring them of Relief by that time, yet Edward no sooner appeared, than he found all the Gates opened to him (t). The Women were of great Service to him [E]. He sent Henry again to the Tower, no body opposing it, though he was a good Prince [F]; and marched directly to give the Earl Battle. The Earl of (42) D'Orleans, ubi supra, pag. 302, ad ann. 1465. 'the Visit, to beg this Favour of the King (42).' She obtained her Request, but would not grant the King the Favours he asked of her. I have not so good an Opinion of myself, said she, as to hope to be a Queen, but I have too good a one to submit to be your Mistress. I can love none but a Husband: since you cannot be such to me, be pleased to be contented that I honour you, as my King, with all the Gratitude that is due to a Benefactor. She inflamed his Passion to the utmost, by persuading him to suppress it, when she saw he was not in a Condition to hearken to Reason. She led him so far by this Artifice, that he resolved to marry her, notwithstanding the Engagements he was under elsewhere, and though the Dukes of York, his Mother, did her utmost to divert him from it, who, finding her strongest Reasons ineffectual, did not scruple to solicit one of the King's Mistresses, named Elizabeth Lucy, to declare that the inconstant Prince was engaged to her by a Promise of Marriage, without which she would never have submitted to his Embraces. The Dukes retarded the King's Son's Marriage for some Days, by the Report of this Engagement, and the notice she herself gave of it to the Bishop; but the matter of fact being fully examined, it appeared by the Evidence of the Person concerned, that she had suffered herself to be seduced by the Hopes, but not the Promise, of Marriage. This Obstacle being removed, and nothing being able to oppose Edward's Will, he married the Lady Gray, with all the Solemnity and Pomp of a Royal Wedding (43).

Warwick

(43) Ibid. pag. 304. He cites Sir Thomas More. One cannot tell what would have happened if Edward had had a Wife when he made his Addresses to the young Widow. Perhaps he would not have met with so much Resistance, and perhaps she did express so much Disdain at the Name of Mistress, only because she knew he was at liberty to chuse a Wife. Sir Thomas More insinuates, that the Lady managed with great Artifice; she preached when her Auditor could not be edified by her. Indeed a Woman of Quality, who has Wit, always answers as the Lady

Gray did. It may be of service, and can do no harm, for there are always ways enough to remove the Inconvenience of the first Repulse, and a Man is easily drawn on, how great soever he be, if he is deeply in Love, and a Bachelor, and given to understand, that nothing is to be obtained but in the way of Marriage. We have seen, in another Place (44), that a Mistress of Henry VIII, by a like Contrivance, pushed him on to divorce his Wife.

[E] The Women were of great Service to him. Philip de Comines says, that three things did facilitate the King's Entrance into that great City. The first was the number of his Friends who were fled into the Churches, which in those Days were still looked upon as inviolable Sanctuaries. The second was the great Debts Edward had contracted in London, every one being glad to see their Debtor in a Condition to pay. The third, the Citizens Wives, who had shared in his good Graces, who gained their Husbands to his Party (45). Philip de Comines's Words upon this last Head are these (46): 'Many Women of Fortune, and rich Citizens Wives, with whom formerly he had been very intimate, persuaded their Husbands and Relations to side with him.' This was a singular Happines. Other Kings, especially in other Countries, would have lost their Crown for having been too fond of their Subjects Wives, but here is one who recovers his Crown by this very Method. Let us describe his voluptuous Life: 'He had indulged himself in Ease and Pleasure for twelve or thirteen Years, more than any Prince of his time, abandoning himself unreasonably to Women, Hunting and Feasting. When in the Season he went a hunting, he had Pavillions carried with him for the Ladies; entertaining them in a splendid manner: and indeed he was the properest Person for this of any Prince I ever saw; for he was young, and handsome as any Man of his time, I mean in his Adversity, for afterwards he grew very fat (47).'

[F] He sent Henry VI again to the Tower without any body opposing it, though he was a very good Prince.

* I have

(44) In the Text of the Article BOLEYN, between the Citations (d) and (e).

(45) D'Orleans, ubi supra, pag. 335, at the Year 1471.

(46) Comines, lib. 3, cap. 7, pag. 164.

(47) Ibid. sup. 5, pag. 456, at the Year 1470.

Warwick was entirely defeated (u), and slain; and not long after Edward gained a like Victory over Queen Margaret. He put to death a great many Persons; among whom was the Captive King; but the Queen was spared, and after some time of Imprisonment was set at liberty (x). The Duke of Clarence having fallen out with the Court was also put to Death [G]. So many bloody Executions ought naturally to have made Edward IV. abhorred: nevertheless he reigned peaceably, and was admired by his Subjects. He entered into a League with the Duke of Burgundy against Lewis XI, and perhaps never was a fairer opportunity for him to have conquered all France; but he chose rather to make a Peace, that he might indulge his Pleasures. This Peace, so shameful to France in some respects, is excusable, when we consider the state of Affairs at that time [H]. The two Kings had an Interview at Pequigni in Picardy, and mutually (u) The fourteenth of April, 1471.

(x) D'O'Orléans, ubi supra, pag. 346.

(48) In the Remark of the Article AMPHARES.

(49) D'O'Orléans, ubi supra, lib. 6, pag. 234.

(50) Ibid. lib. 7, pag. 343, 344.

I have made an Observation somewhere, which I ought to be allowed to confirm by Examples as I meet with them. Every Author has a right to justify his Opinions; and in order to that, to take all Advantages that his reading furnishes him with. I have said (48), that the Weakness, or too great Easiness, of Princes was often the Cause of their being dethroned than their great Wickedness. Henry VI, the Sport of Fortune, frequently a Prisoner, and at last massacred in Prison, was the best Man that could be. He had all the Virtues that constitute an honest Man, but few of the Qualities that form a great King, whom he had not the Art so much as to personate in outward Appearance. So that no sooner was he arrived at the Age wherein a Man begins to shew what he is, when he cannot dissemble what he is not, than he was acknowledged to be good, pleasant, temperate, just, a true Christian; but soft, easy, slothful, weak, doing nothing but as he was put forward by others, which impelled he habitually received from those who had once got the Ascendant over him (49). He was very near being ranked in the Catalogue of the Saints that are prayed to. Read what follows: 'A Prince of few Talents and great Virtues; most unhappy as to the World, most happy according to the Gospel. He was contemned by Men, who looked upon him as of a weak Mind, imprudent, injudicious, and even stupid: thus Comines speaks of him, unjust, contrary to his usual way, to the Memory of this pious King; but Heaven has asserted his Glory by Miracles wrought at his Tomb, which have caused him to be revered as a Saint. Henry VII demanded his Canonization, and it is not known what hindered him from pursuing or obtaining it. Some think, that that Prince, naturally a good Husband, was afraid of the Charges of the Ceremony; a thing not credible of so great a King. Others say, he was told from Rome that there was a Difference to be made between an honest Man and a Saint. A Reason still less probable, since the Church knows no Holiness more sublime than that of a Man, who maintains the Purity of his Life in the Corruptions of a Court, and a constant Patience in the midst of long Adversity. What others write is much more likely, that Henry VII died before they had got the necessary Informations for the Canonization, and his Successor had neither Leisure nor Inclination to concern himself about it (50). If instead of so many Christian Virtues Henry VI had possessed the Qualities of a warlike King, and a good Politician, who knows how to make himself feared by every Step he takes, it would not have been so easy to have alienated his Subjects from him. Had he been as ill a Man as the Head of the Rebels, he had reduced them to their Duty, and died upon his Throne. He was abandoned by all the World in his Capital City: wherefore? Could any complain of his Violences? not in the least. Why then? Because he had no other Defence than his Virtue, sola majestate armatus. A weak Resource in a Civil War to have only, on his side, the Testimony of his Conscience, and his just Right. It requires a Storm or Hurricane to overthrow a Monarch, who knows how to make himself dreaded per fas & nefas: but a Breath of Wind is sufficient to blow down a weak and ferulous Prince.

[G] The Duke of Clarence . . . was put to Death.] It was for speaking too freely when he knew that the Queen's Brother aspired to marry the Heiress of Burgundy. Jealousy, Indignation, and Rage made him speak with the more Indiscretion upon this Occasion, because he aimed himself at this Match, and was secretly intriguing for it with the Dukes of Burgundy, his Sister. His Anger broke out against the King himself, speaking indecently of him, and among other things injurious of that Prince, saying, that he was not the Duke of York's Son, that he had treacherously usurped the Throne from Henry, who by a solemn Treaty, ratified by Parliament, ought to have enjoyed the Crown during his Life. The Queen and her Relations did not fail to take notice of all these Words, and to put such a Construction upon them as they thought proper . . . (51). Edward was so sensibly touched with this, that he got his Brother impeached, and tried in Parliament. It is pretended he mitigated his Punishment in changing the kind of Death, to which he was condemned, into that of being drowned in a Tun of Greek Wine. An odd Mitigation! and whatever Chancellor More may say of it, who would make this Action pass for an Effect of the King's Clemency, there is something in it so barbarous, that it shocks Humanity more than the most cruel Punishment (52). See the Margin (53).

[H] This Peace, shameful to France . . . is excusable, when we consider the State of Affairs at that Time.] The Author that I cite reckons it the Master-piece of Lewis XI (54). 'But, adds he, it was glorious for Edward, that those, of the French, who did not penetrate so far as their King did into the solid Part, were ashamed of it, and had much rather have run a greater Hazard than been secured by such a Peace. And indeed the King of England made himself be courted in such a manner, as the Majesty of the French Monarchy could hardly bear in the greatest Necessity. A Pension of Fifty thousand Crowns, payable, for ten Years together, to this Prince, for the Charge of his Expedition, was the most mortifying Part of the Treaty to France, and the most honourable to Edward, who returned home, loaded with the Spoils of a Prince, he had made a Treaty of Friendship with.' See one of the Remarks of the Article LEWIS XI (55): in which I have alleged a long Passage out of a French Author, who observes, that this Prince was charged with Cowardice on this Occasion. Father Orlean was in the right to say, that the Pension, payable for ten Years together, was the most shameful Part of the Treaty; for you must know, it is upon this Foundation, that the English boast of having made the French Monarchy tributary to their Crown. I leave Politicians to examine whether this is a solid Foundation: in my Opinion it is not, and that in order to boast with Reason, that a Nation is tributary to another, there ought to be this Term in the Treaty, and that they were forced to agree to call the Money to be paid a Tribute. Now there is not a Word of this in the Article of the Treaty concluded between Lewis XI, and Edward IV; and it is certain that the French and English always gave different Names to the Sums paid, the former calling them a Pension (56), and the latter a Tribute. Nay more, Philip de Comines assures us, that it was neither the one nor the other (57). But after all, would it have been such a matter to boast of, if he had forced Lewis XI to promise a Tribute of ten Years to England, he, who had his Kingdom full of Malcontents, who knew he was betrayed by the Constable, and that dangerous Conspiracies would break out in the Heart of his Kingdom as soon as the united Forces of England and the House of Burgundy, should invade the Frontiers. If Edward taking the Advantage of this critical Conjunction, and assisted by so many Allies, within and without, should have reduced his Enemy to promise him a Tribute, Comines, lib. 5, would that be a solid Proof of his Superiority? Where is the Nation brave and powerful enough not to be distressed (51) D'O'Orléans, Revol. d'Angleterre, Tom. II, lib. 7, pag. 347, at the Year 1476.

(52) Ibid. pag. 348.

(53) George Duke of Clarence, Brother to the King of England, chose to die in a Batt of Malinsey; non sine quadam voluptate quam adferre solet levis diffolutio animi, says Seneca, Or to make himself drunk, and divert the Horror and Thought of Death. Matthieu Hist. de Louis XI, lib. 10, pag. 550.

(54) D'O'Orléans, ubi supra, pag. 350.

(55) Rem. [G].

(56) See Philip de Comines, lib. 6, cap. 9, pag. 390, 391.

(57) And then the Pension was suppressed, which he (Edward) received of us, and called it Tribute, but it was neither the one nor the other, as I have shewn before. Comines, lib. 5, cap. ult. pag. 343.

tually expressed great Friendship. Lewis invited Edward to come to Paris, and divert himself with the Ladies, but would have been very sorry to have been taken at his Word [I]. He was very much afraid that the English would repent of the Treaty [K]. The Declaration of War contained one remarkable thing; Edward declared that he would be King of France, in order to do good to the Nation [L]. He died the 13th of April 1483, in the Forty first Year of his Age. Some say he died of grief by being disappointed stressed if all her Neighbours conspire against her, at the same time that Discord reigns in her own Bowels? I do not think France would have had reason to have boasted or insulted Holland, if after the taking of Utrecht, in the Year 1672, she had granted her Peace on Condition of a Tribute to be paid for some Years. France was seconded by England and two Princes of the Empire, and attacked a Country full of Divisions, and succoured by no Power whatsoever.

As for the rest, we must not wonder that Edward the Fourth's Conduct has been condemned: for, in all probability, if he had pushed his Point, he would have conquered some of the Provinces, and perhaps have divided the whole Kingdom of France between the Duke of Burgundy and himself. Philip de Comines assures us, that Lewis XI was afraid the English would repent of their losing so fair an Opportunity. Let us hear what he says. 'A Gentleman of Gafoign, named Lewis de Bretailles, a Servant of the King of England, was very much dissatisfied at this Peace, and because I was his old Acquaintance, he talked with me privately, and said, we should laugh heartily at the King of England. I asked him how many Battles the King of England had won. He told me nine, where he was personally present. I asked him how many he had lost: He answered he had never lost but one, which was that we had made him lose, and that he received a greater Dishonour by returning home in this manner, than he had gained Reputation in winning the other nine Battles. I gave the King an Account of this Discourse, who said he was a dangerous Fellow, and his Mouth must be stopped; whereupon he sent for him, and he made him dine at his own Table. The King made him very great Offers if he would stay in France: but when he could not prevail with him, he presented him with a thousand Crowns, and promised to provide for his Brothers in France: and I whispered him in the Ear to endeavour to keep up the Friendship which was begun between the two Kings. There was nothing the King dreaded more than that some Word should escape him, by which the English should think he had deluded them (58).'

(58) Philip de Comines, lib. 4, cap. 10, pag. 238, 239.

(59) Idem, lib. 6, cap. 2.

COMPARISON between France and the Porte, in 1672.

You will see, in the Remark [K], a like Passage out of this Author. It is certain that this Peace would have been of no long Duration if Lewis XI had not corrupted, by Presents and Pensions, the Ministers and Favourites of the King of England (59). Note, There are Circumstances in which each of the Princes, that conclude a Peace, incur a general Blame. This we have mentioned was disagreeable both to the French and English: to the former, because they thought it dishonourable; to the latter, because it had robbed them of an infallible Opportunity of making useful and glorious Conquests. But as the most flattering Appearances are sometimes deceitful, it might have happened perhaps that a War would not have procured them greater Advantages than they obtained by the Peace. If France, after the taking of Utrecht, in the Year 1672, had been contented with the Conditions that the United Provinces, who begged for Peace, would have accepted, how many State Critics would have censured Lewis XIV for not improving his Advantages, and neglecting this fair Opportunity of subduing the whole Country? It was with this View, say they, that the Minister, who had the Management of the Military Affairs, caused all the Reasons of Mr de Pomponne, who advised the Peace, to be rejected. Before the end of the next Campaign they had reason to repent their not following this Advice; and they assure us, that the King, being forced to abandon all his Conquests, said aloud, Pomponne was in the Right. We may admire at the Oddness of Events. France suffered for refusing Peace to an Enemy almost subdued, and the Turk, at the same time, suffered for granting it to an Enemy, reduced to strange Confusions. The Porte was dazzled by the advantageous Terms the Poles offered her after the taking of Kaminitz: she was content with them, and did not disturb them; but after the Sultan's Retreat they took Courage, and kept none of their Promises, laughing at the Turk: so that, at the same time, the Conduct of these two Princes deserve to be condemned, one for not granting a Peace, and the other for granting it. Who knows but Edward IV would also have been blamed if he had rejected the Offers of Lewis XI.

[I] The King of France invited him to come and divert himself with the Ladies at Paris, but would have been sorry to have been taken at his Word.] I cannot do better than make use of Philip de Comines's own Words. 'After they had both sworn, our King, who had Words at command, began to talk pleasantly to the King of England, inviting him to Paris to divert himself with the Ladies, telling him he would give him the Cardinal of Bourbon for a Confessor, who would readily give him Absolution for that Sin, if any were committed. The King of England was pleased with this; and answered, with a merry Countenance: for he knew the Cardinal to be a good Companion . . . (60). When the King returned from this Interview, he discoursed with me on the Road upon two Points. He found the King of England so willing to come to Paris that he was not pleased at it, and said: He is a goodly Prince, and a Lover of Women: he may perhaps find, at Paris, some dainty Lady that may wheedle him, with such fine Words, as may make him desirous of coming again: and that his Predecessors had been too much in Paris and Normandy: that his Company on this side the Sea was not to his liking: but beyond the Sea he desired to have him for his good Brother and Friend (61).'

(60) Comines, lib. 4, cap. 10, pag. 238.

(61) Idem, pag. 237.

[K] Lewis XI was afraid the English would repent of the Treaty.] This appears by the Passage I have already cited (62) out of Philippe de Comines, and by what I am going to cite: 'One of those Englishmen (63) began to repent of the Agreement, and told me, at a Window, that if they had seen great numbers of such Men with the Duke of Burgundy, perhaps they would never have concluded the Peace. My Lord of Narbonne, who is now Lord of Fouez, hearing this, said to him: Were you so simple as to think, that the Duke of Burgundy had not a great number of such Men? He only sent them away to refresh themselves: but you were so fond of returning home, that Six hundred Pipes of Wine, and a Pension the King gave you, soon sent you back to England. The Englishman grew angry, and said: This is what every body told us, that you would laugh at us. Do you call the Money the King gives us a Pension? It is a Tribute, and, by St. George, you may say so much that you may make us soon return. I broke off the Conversation, turning it to a Jest: but the Englishman was not satisfied, and spoke a Word to the King of it, who was wonderfully incensed against the Lord of Narbonne (64). He was justly angry at the Indiscretion of such Raillery, which might have been very prejudicial (65). But he had not been discreet enough himself, having dropt a Jest about the Wines and Presents he had sent to the English Army (66). He presently saw the Consequences of it, and did his utmost to prevent it (67).

(62) Citat. (58).

(63) That is the English which Edward had left as Hostages with Lewis XI, and which Lewis XI brought with him when he had an Interview with the Duke of Burgundy's Embassadors.

(64) Comines, lib. 4, cap. 12, pag. 244.

(65) See Matthieu, Hist. de Louis XI, lib. 6, cap. ult. pag. 332.

(66) Comines, lib. 4, cap. 10, pag. 239.

(67) Ibid. See also Matthieu, Hist. de Louis XI, lib. 6, cap. ult. pag. 329.

(68) Comines, lib. 4, cap. 5, pag. 213.

(69) Ibid. lib. 5, cap. 2, pag. 253.

[L] Edward declared he would be King of France, in order to do good to the Nation.] The Herald brought King Lewis XI a Letter of Challenge from the King of England, in a fine Language and Style. . . . He required the King to restore to him the Kingdom of France, which belonged to him, that he might establish the Church, Nobility, and People in their ancient Liberties, and ease them from the great Burthens and Hardships they were under; and in case of a Refusal he threatened what Miseries would ensue (68). What a fine Pretence is here! which is nevertheless so gross a Snare, that People are seldom taken in it. For when they consider a little of the Consequences of a foreign Government, founded upon a Right of Conquest, they desire no such Deliverers. They would laugh now-a-days at such a Manifesto.

[M] He

disappointed in his hopes of marrying his Daughter to the Dauphin of France [M]. All the Precautions he took to secure the Crown to his Son Edward V, were to no purpose; for that very Person, whom he charged on his death-bed to fix it upon his head, ravished it from him (y). This was the Duke of Gloucester, Edward's Brother. He put to death Edward V, and the other Son of Edward IV, and caused their two Sisters to be declared illegitimate [N]. But he also had a Competitor who killed him in Battle, and seized the Crown. This was Henry VII. Never were more frequent or more bloody Revolutions. Since my remembrance, says Philip de Comines (z), there died in these Divisions of England above eighty Persons of the Royal Blood, some of whom I knew myself, and had an account of the others from the English residing with the Duke of Burgundy while I was there. And indeed England never produced more great Men than at this time, capable to contrive and execute any important Enterprize, brave, active, and politic to the highest degree. It is commonly fatal to a State to be fruitful in this way, and probably Revolutions would have been no less frequent in this Country, the next Century, if those great Men had left Successors in it [O]. But they are ignorant of History who affirm

(y) D'Orleans, ubi supra, pag. 352.

(z) Philip de Comines, lib. 1, cap. 7, pag. m. 41. See also lib. 3, cap. 4.

[M] He saw himself disappointed in his Hopes of marrying his Daughter with the Dauphin. This Marriage had been agreed upon by the Treaty of Pequigni, in the Year 1475. 'Where it was sworn and promised, that, within the Year, the King of England's Daughter should be sent for, and she was already called the Dauphiness (69).' Lewis XI always took care to elude the pressing Instances that were made to him to execute this Article. 'He never intended to accomplish this Marriage, there being an Inequality between the Ages of the two Parties; for the Princess *, the present Queen of England, was much too old for the Dauphin, our present King. So that by this Dissimulation a Month or two was gained in coming and going, by which means he deprived his Enemy of an Opportunity to hurt him. For, without doubt, if it had not been for the Hopes of this Marriage, the King of England would never have suffered him to take Towns so near him, without concerning himself for their Defence (70).' At last the Dauphin married Margaret of Austria (71), which highly displeased the King of England; 'for he looked upon it as a Dishonour to be thus deluded. . . . And feared the Contempt it would bring on him would be very great in England, and excite a Rebellion against him; especially because he would not hearken to good Counsel. He also saw the King near him with a great Army. Upon receiving of this News he was struck with so great Grief, that he fell sick and died soon after; some say of a Catarrh. Whatever his Disposition was, it was said, that Grief for this Marriage was the cause of his dying in a few Days (72).'

(69) Ibid. lib. vi, cap. ii. pag. 353.

* Her Name was Elizabeth: she was married to Henry VII, King of England Father of Henry VIII.

(70) Comines, lib. vi. cap. ii. at the Year 1477, pag. 354.

(71) Daughter of Maximilian of Austria, and Mary Heirets of Burgundy.

(72) Comines, lib. ii. cap. ix, pag. 390, 391. See also pag. 288.

(73) Idem, pag. 391.

(74) That is, to cause to be put to death the young King, and Edward's other son.

[N] The Duke of Gloucester caused Edward the Fifth's two Sisters to be declared illegitimate. Let us make use of Philip de Comines's own Words (73). 'After the Death of Edward, the said Duke of Gloucester did Homage to his Nephew, as to his King and Sovereign Lord, and yet immediately after he committed this Fact (74), and in full Parliament got the two Daughters of the said Edward degraded, and declared Bastards, under Pretence of a certain Matter, which he proved by the Bishop of Bath, who formerly had been in great Credit with King Edward; but afterwards he was disgraced, and committed to Prison, from whence he was discharged by paying a Fine to the King. The said Bishop alleged, that King Edward had promised Marriage to an English Lady, whom he named, whom he was in love with, in order to enjoy her, that he made the Promise in Presence of the said Bishop, and thereupon lay with her, but did it only to delude her. Nevertheless, such Passimes are dangerous when such Proofs are to be had. I have known some Courtiers, who in such a Case would not have lost a good Adventure, that pleased them, for want of promising. This wicked Bishop kept this Revenge in his Heart for twenty Years.'

[O] Revolutions would not have been less frequent, if those great Men had left Successors. That is to say if, after their Death, there had been, in England, any Lords as ambitious, as brave, and as capable to carry on a Plot as they had been. For these are the Principles and Springs of Revolutions. We are not to seek for them in the inconstancy of the People: As mutable as they are, they will remain quiet, if not agitated by some external Force, if their Tribunes or Demagogues, or Great Lords, do not stimulate them by the Activity of their ambitious intrigues, &c. They are like the Waters of the Sea, which are commonly calm, if the Wind does not blow. 'Ex quo intelligi potuit id quod saepe dictum est, ut mare quod sua natura tranquillum sit, ventorum vi agitari atque turbari, sic & populum Romanum sua sponte esse pacatum, hominum seditionum vocibus ut violentissimis tempestatibus concitari (75).' And if, after the Example of some parts of the Sea, where, without the help of Winds, the Fermentation of subterraneous Matter sometimes produces a sort of Tempest, the People mutiny of themselves, it is but like a blaze of Straw, when no persons of Figure appear at their Head. Our Edward IV was well acquainted with this. He told Philip de Comines, 'that in all the Battles he had won, as soon as the Victory was secure, he mounted on Horseback, and cried out to save the People and kill the Lords; few or none of whom escaped (76). By this means at last he came to reign peaceably: if he had spared the Duke of Clarence, his Brother, he would have been exposed to new Troubles. He only put in Execution the old Maxim of Perian-der (77), and Tarquin the Proud. 'Ibi inambulans tacitus summa papaverum capita dicitur baculo decussisse, &c. (78). Walking therein, and observing a strict silence, he is reported to have struck off with his Came the tops of the biggest Poppies.' I do not deny but another Cause contributed to maintain the lineal Succession to the Crown of England in the XVth Century, which had been so frequently broke thro' in the XVth. The cause was the Superiority of Genius and Courage in those who reigned, or in their Ministers. Take away these two Causes, and you will easily conceive that those Interruptions would have been more frequent in the XVth than in the XVth Century; for these sorts of Revolutions are like false Miracles, where the first gets ground with more difficulty than the following ones: as soon as People are prevailed upon to believe one miraculous Fable, another goes down with less difficulty. The first Miracle makes way for a second, and the two first for a third; and so of the others, not ad infinitum, but to certain Limits, which depend upon Times and Places. 'Prodi- gia eo anno multa nunciata sunt, quae quo magis credebantur simplices ac religiosi homines, eo etiam plura nunciabantur (79). Various Prodigies were trump up that Year, and the more they gained credit among the Vulgar, and superstitious, the more they were multiplied.' We may say the same of the Infractions of the legal Succession to a Crown. The first Precedent is more difficult to be established than the following ones; but when it is once done, a Breach is opened, which is not soon closed, and if proper measures are taken, the Breach is found wide open for a second Infraction to enter, which makes it still wider than before; so that a third Usurper passes with more Ease than the two others, and so of the rest. When you have read in the Roman History, that the Senate were once or twice constrained to acknowledge for Emperors, those that were created by the Army, wonder no more to see so few Emperors succeed one another legally. You may rather wonder to see three or four Reigns lineally succeed one another in the same Family; for a General of an Army, who has got himself raised by the Soldiers into the Place of

(75) Cicero, in Orat. pro Cluentio, cap. xlix.

(76) Comines, lib. iii. cap. v, pag. 155.

(77) See Aristot. Polit. lib. iii, cap. xi. & lib. v, cap. x. Herodotus, lib. v, cap. xcii. pag. m. 324. & Diog. Laert. lib. i. n. 100. say that Thralybulus gave this Advice to Periander.

(78) Livius, lib. 1, cap. lii.

(79) Livius, lib. xxiv, cap. x.

affirm, that the same things have not happened in other Countries [P]. Note that the Fleet was in no good Condition in the Reign of Edward IV [Q].

the Emperor, whom he has put to Death, has no Reason to pretend that the General of his Army should be contented with his Post. Why, will such a one say, should I obey a Man, who, when he was in my place, would not obey his Sovereign? He killed him, and made himself proclaimed Emperor by his Soldiers. Can not I do the same? have not I as much Right as he had to raise my self from General, to be Master of the whole Empire? Thus you see how naturally one Revolution brings on another, and the more frequent they are in one Age, the more they ought to be in the next. And indeed so they would be, if the divine Providence did not prevent it, either by the scarcity of Men capable of carrying on an Intrigue of this Nature, or by the superior Vigour of those who reign.

Note, nothing contributed more to the Troubles in Henry VIth's Reign, than the pretence they went upon, that That Prince was the son of an Usurper; for since the fundamental Laws had been violated in Favour of his Father, it was not strange a Duke of York should attempt to exclude him. Could not the Duke of Gloucester, who seized the Crown in Prejudice of Edward IVth's Son, maintain that he only set aside the Son of an Usurper? for Edward IV ascended the Throne in the Life-time of Henry VI, though by an Act of Parliament Henry ought to have reigned during his Life. By the same Act the legitimate Son of Henry VI was excluded the Throne. All which authorized the Duke of Gloucester to have no manner of Regard for Edward the fourth's Children, and to require the Parliament to make such Acts for him as they had made for his Brother against Henry the sixth's Son.

[P] Those who say the same things are not done in other Countries, are ignorant of History.] The reading Justin only will inform us of greater disorders in Syria under the Seleucida, and in Egypt under the Ptolemies; and these were not equal to the frequent Revolutions in Macedonia after the Death of Alexander. The same Historian relates them with an Exclamation. 'Tanta vel mobilitas militum vel fortunæ varietas erat, ut vicissim reges nunc exules nunc reges viderentur' (80). — So extravagant was the Caprice of the Army, or such the instability of Fortune, that by turns they saw their Kings on Thrones, and in Exile.

[Q] The Navy was in no good Condition in Edward the fourth's Reign.] When in the Year 1470, the Earl of Warwick came over into England with Succours that Lewis XI had lent him, he had nothing to fear but the Duke of Burgundy's Fleet. There is no mention made of King Edward's Ships. This Fleet would have hindered the Earl's Passage with his Troops, if it had not been dispersed by a Storm (81). Five Years after the same Duke of Burgundy was forced to send Edward five hundred Vessels of Holland and Zealand, to transport the English Army from Dover to Calais (82).

(80) Justin. lib. xxvi. cap. 8.

(81) See Comines, lib. iii. cap. v.

(82) Ibid. lib. iv. cap. v.

EGIALEA, Daughter of Adrastus King of Argos, and Wife of Diomedes [A], was so lascivious, that one of Ovid's Curses, against the Man he mortally hated, was to wish him such a Wife [B]. It is said (a) that Venus, to be revenged of Diomedes [C], who had wounded her in the Arm before Troy, inspired his Wife with such insatiable Lust [D], that she run after all the young men; but was particularly attached to one whom she found in her way, and who was always at hand: his Name was Cometes, the Son of

(a) Schol. Homeri Iliad. lib. v. ver. 412.

(1) Thus Apollodorus names her, pag. 49. Others, as Statius, call her Deiphila.

(2) Ovid. Fastor. lib. vi. ver. 433. See Merzine upon Penelope's Letter, pag. 77.

(3) Idem, in Ibin, ver. 349.

(4) Citation (16) of the Article CAIN.

(5) "Αλλοι δ' ἄλλοις μισοῦν. Uxorē vero alii misceant. Homeri Iliad. lib. iii. ver. 301.

(6) Menagiana, pag. 341, Edit. of Holland.

(7) Ibid. p. 142. it should be εἰς αὐτόν.

(8) Barnab. Brissotius ad Leg. Juliam de Adult. pag. 135. Edit. Lugdun. 1558.

Seu gener Adraſti, seu furſus aptus Ulyſſes, Seu pius Æneas eripuiſſe ferunt (2).

Or Diomedē, or Ulyſſes prone to Theſt,
Or good Æneas bore it hence away.

[B] One of Ovid's curses against the Man he mortally hated, was to wish him such a Wife.] His Words are:

Nec tibi contingat matrona pudicior illa
Qua potuit Tydeus erubiſſe nuru (3).

Nor mayſt thou find thy Wife, if e're thou wed,
More chaſt than ſhe that ſcam'd Tydides' Bed.

I have said elsewhere (4), that they use to wish the Wives of ill Men might dishonour their Husbands. Since which I am told by the learned Mr Drelincourt, that this is confirmed in the Iliad. And indeed, Homer informs us that those who swore to a Treaty of Peace, among other Punishments, wished Cuckoldom to those that should violate it (5).

The same Mr Drelincourt has directed me to the 11th verse of the twelfth Chapter of the second Book of Samuel. I have read in the Menagiana, that the Lacedæmonians wished three or four things to those against whom they bore a grudge: they wished them the loss of building, to have fine Cloaths, Horses, and Gallants to their Wives (6). Adrian Valeſius wrote to Mr Menage, that the form of this Imprecation was to be found in three Places in Suidas. . . . at the word ἀμφοτερος, that of δακνόμενος, and the word οἰκονομῆν (7): Brissotius cites but two places out of Suidas, one of which differs from these three. His words are (8): 'Lacedæmonios quidem cum acerbissima execratione adverſus eos quos vehementer odiſſent, uti vel lent, inter cætera domus exitiis, hoc impetrari ſolit, ut eorum uxores adulteris delectarentur. — It is ſaid that the Lacedæmonians, in their imprecations againſt their moſt inveterate Enemies, among other Calumnies, were wont to pray, that their Wives might become fond of other Mens Embraces.'

[C] Venus to be revenged of Diomedes. . . .] A strange sort of Revenge, which makes it appear that the Pagan Poets prostituted the Glory of God to all sorts of Abominations; for what could be more unjust than to punish a Man's Sin by impelling his Wife to Sin? they attribute a hundred of these feats to Venus, as when they say she warmed the Heart of Clio to such a degree, that the poor Muse suffered herself to be got with Child. This was what she got by her wife Remonstrances; for all Clio's Fault was only representing to Venus the Injury she did herself in loving Adonis. Κλειώ δὲ Πήρη τῷ Μάρτυρῳ ἠρώσθη κατὰ μῦθον Ἀποδιδύς. οὐκ εἰδὶς γὰρ αὐτὴ τὸν τῷ Ἀδωνίδῳ ἐρωσά. συνελθούσα δὲ ἰγνύνασεν ἐξ αὐτοῦ παῖδα Τάκυνον. Clio Pierum Magnetis filium Veneris ira, quod ei Adonidis amorem exprobraſſet, deprævit, ejus compreſſu Hyacinthum filium concepit (9). Do they not say (10), that Tyndarus, the Father of Helen, had the misfortune to have his Daughters have two or three Husbands apiece, and to run away from their Husbands, only because he forgot Venus in a Sacrifice he made to all the Gods? If they had been content to ascribe such pranks to this Goddess alone, it would have been no strange thing: but they also make them practised by the Goddesses of Arts and Sciences, as chaſt as they represent her. See in Parthenius in what manner Minerva chaſtified Alcinoῦ for a Fault (11). I shall make an Article of it by itself.

[D] Inspired his Wife with so insatiable a Lust.] The Terms the Greek Authors use are much stronger than these. Lycophron describes Egialea in this manner.

Ὅταν θρασεῖα θυρὰς οἰρήσῃ κῶλον Πρὸς λείπτρα.
Quando audax loſſiva canis ſtimulabitur
Ad concubitus (12).

* Soli. in verbo δακνόμενος & in verbo ἰσχυρός.

(9) Apollod. lib. 1.

(10) Stesich. apud Schol. Euripid. in Orest.

(11) Parthen. cap. xlvii.

(12) Lycophr. in Cypriod. ver. 612.

His

of Sthenelus. Diomedes had committed to him the Care of his House, and Government of his Kingdom during his Absence. It is uncertain whether he discharged his Trust faithfully: but for that part which was not committed to him, I mean the Office of a Husband, he acted in it with the more care as he was led to it by inclination; for Venus had made him in love with Egialea. This Woman was not satisfied with dishonouring her Husband, but made an Attempt upon his Life when he returned to Argos [E], and he had much ado to avoid being murdered, by taking Sanctuary in the Temple of Juno. Afterwards he retired into Italy. Some say he went thither directly (b), without returning home, having heard of his Wife's ill Conduct.

Ennodius supposes, 1. That he resolved to re-embark as soon as he heard of his Wife's Unfaithfulness to him, and never to come to a Country where he could not live without Infamy. 2. That in lamenting his Fate he made a Panegyric upon his Wife's former Behaviour [F].

His Scholiast borrows the Explication of this Riddle from Minnermus, and paraphrases it thus: "Ὅταν ἡ Διομήδεια θυρῶς καὶ ἡ ὀρμητικὴ κῆλον ἦτοί ἡ γυνὴ Διομήδους Αἰγιάλεια οἰστροῖσιν καὶ μαρναῖος ὀρμῆσιν πρὸς τὰ λήκτρα καὶ τὰς μίξεις. The Scholiast upon Homer (13), without regarding the Encomium that his Text gives Egialea as a Woman, who exceedingly grieved for the loss of her Husband, (14), says she was mad with Lust: 'Ἐκμῆναι περὶ πορνείαν ὡς περὶ πᾶσαν τὴν τῶν νέων ἡλικίαν συγχωρεῖν ἀεὶ γένευσαν. See Eustathius upon the 486 verse of Dionysius Periegetes, where he has taken one name for another (15); Μαχθῆναι, says he, Σθενέλου τῷ τῷ Κομήτῃ: he should have said Κομήτῃ τῷ τῷ Σθενέλου.

[E] She attempted the Life of her Husband, when he returned to Argos.] If we had the Catalogue of all the Women who have followed her Example; I mean who, after they have proved unfaithful to their Husbands Beds, have also endeavoured to destroy them, it would swell to a large Volume. We have already seen (16), that Domitian's Wife would deserve a place in such a List. But how great soever the number of these Women may be, yet it is much less than that of Women, who proceed no farther than Adultery, and who, in all other Respects, are easy and obliging to their Husbands, provided they are quiet; for if you observe, you will find that almost all the Women of Gallantry, who make away, or attempt to make away with their Husbands, are only provoked to that Wickedness, because their Husbands are jealous, and will restrain the liberty which their Wives desire to have to divert themselves. Banish from the Hearts of Husbands that restless Jealousy, which prompts them to cross their Wives Amours, and you will secure their Lives from Assassination or Poison: and if the Lacedæmonians had imagined that Men would have had the patience, which abundance of Husbands furnish themselves with betimes in some Climates, and sometimes by a principle of Prudence, they would not have had so dreadful a notion of the Imprecation I mentioned before; but supposing no doubt that the intrigues of the Wife would torment the Husband, and cause Contention and Uneasiness, which the Party aggrieved would endeavour by all means to be freed from, they thought it was a terrible Curse. Tell me not that the Gazettes, and particularly in the Article of France, often speak of the proceedings against Women, for killing or attempting to kill their Husbands: for what is this, I beseech you, in comparison of so many others who live peaceably till a natural Death delivers them from the Adulteresses? Nor must you urge me with the good and tame Mr Tiquet, who sued for his Wife's pardon, when she was convicted of attempting to assassinate him, and so fully convicted, that she died for it upon the Scaffold (17), after having confessed the Crime: for this does not prove that he indulged his Wife in all the liberty she desired. In a word, if the Maxim of Cato the Censor (18), that those Women, who commit Adultery, are also Poisoners, was true at that time, when the Romans did but begin to be infected with the Disorders of Luxury, it was not so in the Age of extream Corruption; and it is not so at this present time; for in Proportion as Corruption increases, Men grow familiar with Cuckoldom; it is reckoned a small matter, and they bear it patiently, and by this means the Adulteress is disarmed and not forced to have recourse either to the Arm of her Gallant or to Poison.

[F] Ennodius supposes . . . that Diomedes made an Encomium upon his Wife's former Behaviour. There is among the Works of Ennodius, a small Treatise intitled, Verba Diomedis cum uxoris adulteria cognovisset (19). — The speech of Diomedes when he had discovered his Wife's wantonness. Diomedes acknowledges there, that his Wife had been a pattern of Chastity: Nature and Education concurred to render her chaste; so that under the Protection of these two Ramparts, he did not believe her capable of an impure Action. Ut gemino defensa propugnaculo nullatenus facinoræ credere: ut iisibus subjacere, nec dura castimonie obsecratis evaseratione mollesce (20). She was not fond of dressing herself in Gold and Pearls, and had always behaved herself like a Woman of Honour. He concludes, * In summa, talis perlit, quales solent à maritis lacrymas impetrare. Circæo, ut ajunt, poculo à se translata est, & in votum migravit adulter (21). — In short, concludes he, she fell like those whose loss commands tears from their Husbands. She was drawn aside, as they say, by the force of Witcraft, and gave way to the Power of Temptation. These words are an Honour to Diomedes: they are prudent, and have nothing of that unjust rage, which an infinite number of Husbands would express in their discourses on the like Occasion. They would at such a time forget all the good Qualities of their Wives, and call their former prudence, all counterfeit Modesty, Hypocrisy, and Treason. This little Tract of Ennodius carries also a dangerous Moral with it. It may make the most contented Husbands distrustful; for if a Woman of so exquisite Virtue as Diomedes's Wife, be not proof in the absence of her Husband, how shall we be sure of the Virtue of those who love to dress, and are not sufficiently guarded, either by Nature or Education; but it is true, there are few Husbands, who are so long absent from home, as Diomedes; and if the Grecian Generals, who were ten Years at the Siege of Troy, found at their return, that their Wives had not been able to live without Gallants, it was partly their own fault; why did they leave them alone for so many Years? They should have given them, at their departure, the same advice that was given to a Prelate by his Mistress. * The Bishop of . . . going one day to take his leave of the Countess of . . . whom he loved, expressed his grief, that he must be absent from her, though but for so little a while; after abundance of tender things said on both sides, the Bishop rose up to go, and the Countess, accompanying him to the Door, told him, well Sir, make your Journey as short as you can, and remember that a Mistress is a Benefice that obliges to Residence (22).

(b) Servius in Æneid. lib. viii. ver. 9.

(19) It is in the 24th among those that are called Disticha. It is at pag. 331 of the 15th Tome of the Bibliotheca Patrum, Edit. Paris. 1644.

(20) Ennodius, ibid.

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) Meningiana, pag. 112, of the first Dutch Edition.

(a) Vossius, de Histor. Latin. pag. 302.

(b) Count Hermann, de Nuenar.

(c) See Father Labbe, de Script. Eccles. Tom. I. pag. 273.

(d) Siebert, de Viris illust. cap. lxxxiv. & ex eo Vossius & Labbe, ubi supra.

it only proves he was better acquainted with Affairs. For might not the remembrance of the Honours he had received from that Prince be an inducement to Flattery? A modern Author charges him with extream Partiality [A]. I know not how far we are to believe his Adventure with one of the Daughters of Charlemagne [B].

[A] A modern Author charges him with extreme Partiality. He goes much farther, and attributes to him infamous Impostures (1). He says what he has mentioned of the Inactivity of the Kings of the first Race are impertinent Fables: 'Those Kings having been unable to support their Dignity only by their want of Age, and That ridiculous Shew of their Persons upon a Carr drawn by Oxen, being an impudent lye of the Impostor Eginard, without Truth or Foundation (2).' He adds, that Eginard is the Inventor of the Fable related by so many Writers as a certain Truth, that Pope Zachary approved of the deposition of King Cbilderic, and Pepin's Usurpation. By confuting Eginard, says he (3), we confute all those who have writ upon his Credit. Let us see how he confutes him.

(1) See a Book intitled L'Esprit de Gerson, chap. xxxv, pag. 204. It was printed in 1691, in 12mo.

(2) Chap. xxxvi, pag. 206.

(3) Ibid. chap. xxxvii, p. 217.

Eginard was the Chaplain and Creature of Charles the Great, whose Life he wrote. His whole endeavour was, by inventing an infinite number of Stories, to depreciate the Kings of the Merovingian Race, whom he has maliciously represented as mean spirited and slothful, in order to colour and excuse as much as possible the criminal Usurpation of Pepin. It is with that view, that thro' a ridiculous ignorance he gives a beard to Children of eight Years old, and Children to those who were not yet in Being, and loads with Reproaches young Princes, whose only Fault was a Life too short to exert their Virtues: It is by the same principle of Malice, that he invented that ridiculous Procession of the Kings in a Carr drawn by Oxen the first Day of May, and their obscure Retirement into the Castle of Mamaca which never existed; since at the same time that he shuts the Kings up in that imaginary Solitude, it appears by cotemporary Authors that they were at the head of their Armies, or otherwise employed according as their Age would permit. This Malice of Eginard is very visible throughout his whole Work; but when he is to speak of Cbilderic's Abdication, he thought he should entirely excuse Pepin, by making the Pope an Accomplice in his wickedness, and he has done it with so little Circumspection, and with an Anachronism so full of ignorance, that he says Cbilderic was degraded by order of Pope Stephen: Iussu Stephani Pontificis exautoratus; and yet Pepin was proclaimed King before Stephen was made Pope, since he was not chosen Pope in Rome, before the end of March 752, and Pepin was proclaimed the first of March. He is even so bad a Chronologer, though he lived almost at that time, that he says Pepin reigned fifteen Years after Cbilderic was shaved (4). Now Pepin died in September 768, and was proclaimed in March 752, which make sixteen Years and a half: so that we see what little Credit this fabulous Author deserves; and how should he say any thing certain of the Reigns of Cbilderic and Pepin; he, who confesses himself so ignorant, and so little conversant in Books, that, having undertook to write a History of Charles the Great, he professes he shall say nothing of his Infancy, or Youth, because, at the time he is writing, there is no body alive who could give him any Information. Nec quisquam modo superesse invenitur, qui horum se dicat habere notitiam. — None, says he, are found that can say, that they have any Knowledge of them. From whence we may judge from what fine Memoirs he has compiled his History, and spoke of former things (5).

(4) This Censure is ill grounded, since Eginhart uses the Phrase fifteen Years or more, cum per 15 annos aut eo amplius Franci imperaret. In Vita Caroli Mag.

(5) This Censure falls to the ground by reading the whole Passage in Eginhart, where are these words: Quia neque scriptum usquam aliquando declaratum est; quibus supponit he consulted either Writings or Persons. He might find both upon other things, tho' not upon Charles's Infancy.

(6) Chronicon Laurishemensis Cenobii, published by Freher among Rei Germanicæ Scriptores.

I have not time to examine whether all these Reproaches are just: I shall only observe that the Author seems to me to be too much better founded, when he confutes what is said concerning the demands of the French to the Pope, and the Pope's Answer. The Request has no Shadow of common Sense, and the Answer is a ridiculous injustice.

[B] I know not how far we are to believe his Adventure with one of the Daughters of Charles the Great. Marquard Freher has published a Chronicle (6), in which it is said that our Eginhart insinuated himself in such a manner, into the good Graces of Imma, Daughter to Charles the Great, that he obtained of her whatever he desired. Charles the Great having discovered this little Mystery did not do as the Emperor Augustus (7); for he married the two Lovers, and gave them a fine Estate. Freher gives no Credit to this Story. See Letter CIV of the Collection of Letters written to Goldast, and published in 1688. He is the Author of this Letter, and he observes therein that Vincencius Bellovacensis relates a like History of the Emperor Henry III. I am sure most of my Readers would find fault with me, if I did not tell them how Charles the Great discovered Eginhart's Intrigue, but will be glad to see here this Relation. These reasons oblige me to insert an Abstract of this Story.

Eginhart, Chaplain and Secretary to Charles the Great, behaved himself so well in his Post, that he was universally beloved. Imma, the Emperor's Daughter, fell desperately in love with him, nor had he less Passion for her. The fear of what might be the Consequence, hindered them from marrying, but could not prevent their mutual Affection from increasing every Day. At length, being unable to overcome the Violence of his Passion, he resolved to take a bold step. He stole by Night into the Princess's Apartment, and knocking softly at the Door, was admitted into her Chamber, under pretence of business from the Emperor: but his business was of another Nature, and he appeased his Passion in the most agreeable manner in the World. Denique cum idem vir egregius inremediabiliter amando æstaret, aureque virginis per internuncium appellare nec præsumeret, novissime sumpta de semet ipso fiducia nocturno tempore latentem ad puellæ tendebat habitaculum. Ibidemque pulsans clanculum & intrare permixtus tanquam aliocturus juvenculam de regali mandato, statim verâ vice solus cum sola secretis usus alloquiis & datis amplexibus cupito satisfacit amori (8). His Design was to have retired before Day break; but he found that whilst he had been diverting himself with Imma, a great Snow had fallen. He was apprehensive of being discovered by the print of his Feet upon the Snow, and acquainted the Princess with his Fear. They consulted how to get clear of this Difficulty, and the Princess found out an Expedient, by offering to take up her Lover upon her Shoulders, and carry him beyond the Snow. Cumque nimia sollicitudine fluctuantes quid facto opus esset deliberarent, tandem elegantissima juvencula, quam audacem faciebat amor, consilium dedit ut ipsa quidem super se insidentem inclinata exciperet, eumque usque ad locum illius hospitio contiguum ante lucanum deportaret, ibique eo deposito rursum per eadem vestigia cautius observata rediret (9). The Emperor could not sleep that whole Night, which was thought to be a particular effect of Providence (10). He rose betimes in the Morning, and looking out at the Window, saw his Daughter staggering under the burden she carried, which she laid down, and returned immediately. Intuitus est filiam suam sub præfato onere nutanti gressu vix incedere, & ad conditum locum deposita quam gestabat sarcina celeri repedare cursu (11). He was moved with wonder and grief; but believing there was something Divine in all this, he resolved to dissemble the matter. Quibus multo intuitu perspectis, Imp. partim admiratione partim dolore permotus, non tamen absque divina dispositione id fieri reputans, sese continuit, & visa interim silentio suppressit. In the mean time Eginhart, concluding this Action could not be concealed long, determined to retire, and fell at his Master's Feet to ask his leave: pretending his long Services had not been rewarded. The Emperor answered, he would consider of it, and appointed him a Day when he would let him know his Pleasure. That Day he called a Council, and declared his Secretary's Crime: he related exactly what he had seen, and asked their advice upon an affair so dishonourable to his Family. Imperatoriam iniquis majestatem nimis injuriatam esse & despectatam in indigna filiae suæ notariique sui copulatione, & exinde non mediocri sese agitari perturbatione. Quibus nimio stupore percussis, & de rei novitate & magnitudine quibusdam adhuc ambigentibus, Rex innuit eis evidenter, referens eis a primordio quid per se metipsum

(7) It is thought he banished Ovid, because he believed him too much in Julia's Favour.

(8) Chronicon Laurishemensis, pag. 62.

(9) Ibidem.

(10) Eam noctem Imperator divino (ut creditur) intuitu infonem duxit. Ibid.

(11) Ibidem.

(12) Ibidem,
pag. 63.

(13) Ibidem.
ibid. M. (11)

(14) Juri vestro
nuptum tradam meam filiam, vestrum scilicet portriciem, quæ quandocumque alte soccincta vestre subvectioni satis
se morigeram exhibuit. Ibid.

(15) Ibidem.

(16) Some say he role to observe the Start. See Commencement in his Treatise of Comets, pag. 238.

(17) Plinius, lib.
ii, esp. vii.

(18) Horat. Sat. v.
lib. i, ver. 97.

(19) In his Remarks upon these words of Horace.

metipsum oculata fide cognoverit, consiliumque eorum aque sententiam expostulans super hoc (12).
The Council were divided in their Opinions: some advised to a severe Punishment, others having well weighed the matter, advised the Emperor to decide it himself, as his divine Discretion should direct. He decided it in this manner. He declared, that by chastising Eginbart, he should rather increase than lessen the Disgrace of his Family, and therefore he thought it better to hide the Ignominy under the veil of Marriage.
Tam tristis facti à notario meo non exigam pœnas per quas infamia filiae meae magis videbitur augeri quam minui. Unde dignius & laudabilius imperii nostri gloriæ arbitramur congruere, ut data adolescentiæ venia legitimo eos matrimonio conjungam, & rei probrofæ honestatis colorem superducam (13). The Gallant was called in, and informed, that the Emperor had resolved to give him his Daughter in reward for his long Services, which he had complained were not considered: I will give you my Daughter, said Charles the Great, that Portress who so kindly carried you upon her back (14). Immediately he sent for the Princess, and gave her to Eginbart, with a Fortune suitable to the Dignity of so great a Prince. Protinus ad Regis edictum cum multo comitatu adducta est ejus filia, quæ roseo vultum perfusa rubore tradita est per manus patris in manus prædicti Eginhardi, cum dote plu-rima prædiorum quoque nonnullorum, cum innumeris aureis, argenteisque donariis, aliisque pretiosis suppellectilibus (15).

This is the Substance of the Adventure: there is not a Tale in Boccaccio's Decameron, or the Heptameron of the Queen of Navarre, to be compared to this, if it was well embellished: and I am confident, in the hands of Mr de la Fontaine, it would be one of the pleasantest Tales that could be read. A Print would furnish a Parallel of a new Invention, between the Effects of Love and Friendship, between Æneas carrying his Father Anchises on his Shoulders, and Imma carrying her Lover. Charles the Great (16) beholding afar off this Portress would be none of the least Ornaments of the Piece, if the Engraver represented to the Life the Re-flexions of that good Father. Imma is here like the Ephesian Matron in Petronius, she who finds out Expedients; but this spares not her own Body to help her Gallant at a dead lift (a).

[(17) a] Mr Bayle did not know, or did not remember in this place, that Jacob Cats, Grand Pensionary of Holland, has put this Story or Tale into Flemish Verse. It is among his Works printed at Amsterdam in 1658, in folio. There must have been a prior Edition, as the Year of the Impression of the following Book sufficiently makes appear. There are three prints in this; one represents Eginbart teaching Imma with Books, and afterwards kissing one another; the second shows Imma carrying Eginbart upon her Shoulders.

Charles the Great sees them through a Window of his Palace, and two of the Guards seize them by his order;
the third represents Imma and Eginbart before Charles the Great, who decides their Fate. Gaspar Barleus has also turned this Story into Latin Hexameter Verse, by translating Cats's Book under this Title: Virgo Av-desophora, sive Emma Caroli Magni filia Eginardum scriptorem Amasium suum bumeris portantis fata & nup-tiae. This pretty Poem is in page 161 &c. of the following Book: Faestes Augustæ, sive Poëmatia, quibus illustriores Nuptiæ à nobili & illustri viro D. Jacobo Catsio, Eg. & Præpot. Holl. ac Frisicæ occidentalis Ord.
Syndico, antebac Belgicis versibus conscriptæ, jam à Caspare Barleæ & Cornelio Boyo Latino Carmine cele-brantur. Ad Serenissimam Principem Elisabetham Fred.
Regis Bohemæ & Electoris Palatini filiam, Dordraci.
1643, in 8vo. There are but two Cuts in this Book, page 175 and 179, which are the two last, mentioned above. In the same Book, page 642 and following, there is a Poem, but without Cuts, intitled: Casparis Barleæ Antwerpiani Poëmata, editio quarta, altera plus parte auctior, Pars prima Heroicorum, Amst. 1645.
in 12mo.

Mr John Herman Schmincke, in a Latin Dissertation inserted in this Book, viz. Eginhartus de Vita & Gestis Caroli Magni &c. which he published in 1711.
Trajecti ad Rhenum, ex Officina Gulielmi vande Water, in 4to, proves that Imma was not Charles the Great's Daughter: And the Journalists of Trevoux, speaking of this Book, page 656, December 1711, intimate that they are of the same Opinion. They continue in the same Sentiment, page 640, April 1715, in mentioning a Poem, and another Work of Father John Weinckens, inserted in a Book intitled, Naurchia Seligensdiana &c. Francf. ad Mœnum, apud Joan.
Philip. Andream 1714 in fol. This Father in his Poem calls Imma the Daughter of Charles the Great, but says the contrary, in the second Chapter of his other Book, where he relates and rejects the Story of a criminal Conversation, followed by a Marriage between Eginbart and Imma, the Daughter of Charles the Great. REM. CRIT.]

EGNATIA, a City of Italy, in the Country of the Salentines, between Bari and Brindisi (a), was only considerable for the miraculous Stone which they boasted to have [A]. If all the World had been of Horace's Humour, this Stone would have contributed more to the Shame than the Glory of the Inhabitants of Egnatia. He laughs at their pretended Miracle, and refers the Belief of it to the Jews [B]. There were formerly other Places that boasted of such like Prodigies [C], and even more extraordinary

[A] It was only considerable for the miraculous Stone they boasted to have. The Wood, that was put upon this Stone, immediately took Fire. Reperitur apud auctores . . . in Salentino oppido Egnatia, imposito ligno in saxum quoddam ibi sacrum, protinus flammam existeret (1). We shall see by and by, that this Stone was at the entrance of the Temple, and that it set the Frankincense on Fire.

[B] Horace laughs at their pretended Miracle, and refers the belief of it to the Jews. His Words are:

dehinc Gnatia lymphis
Iratis exstructa dedit risusque jocosque,
Dum flamma sine, thura liquefcere limine sacro Persuadere cupit. Credat Judæus Apella, Non ego (2).

At credulous Narri we had cause to smile,
With Superstition seeking to beguile.
Their Priests declare, that in the sacred Quire
Sweet Incense burns without the help of Fire.
The Jew, Apella, may this Tale believe;
Not I.

Mr Dacier (3) declares for those who think Horace insults the Jewish Nation here, because he knew what was said of Elijah's Sacrifice, that Fire from Heaven consumed the Oblation. I see nothing amiss in this Thought of Mr Dacier's: I shall only observe that Horace might as well have referred them to the Persians, as to the Jews to believe those things: Ferunt si justum est credi etiam ignem cœlitus lapsum apud se sempiternis foculis custodire, cujus portionem exiguam ut sacram præfisse quondam Asiaticis regibus dicunt. Thus Ammianus Marcellinus expresses himself, speaking of the Persian Magi in the sixth Chapter of the twenty third Book.

[C] There were other places that boasted of such like Prodigies. Solinus makes mention of a Hill much more miraculous than the Temple of Egnatia. It was in Sicily near Agrigentum. They had no need to bring Fire to the Altar: it was enough to lay the Vine Branches upon it, and though they were never so green they would kindle of themselves, provided the Sacrifice was agreeable to the God to whom it was offered. In that Case the Flame not only arose of it self, but also spread it self on both sides, as if it would seize those that eat of the Sacrifice, but did not the least harm to any that touched it. And this was a sign the Ceremonies of the Day were fully performed. Nec longè inde collis Vulcanius, in quo qui divine rei operantur, ligna vitæ super aras struunt, nec ignis adponitur in hanc congeriem: cum proficias intulerunt, si adest Deus, si sacrum probatur, sar-menta licet viridia sponte concipiunt, & nullo infla-gante

(a) These two Cities were calle Barium and Brundisium.

dinary ones [D]. The Managers of religious Matters were encouraged by the Credulity of the People to out-do one another in Miracles.

(4) Solinus, cap. v, pag. m. 20. grante halitu, ab ipso numine fit accendium. Ibi epulantes adludit flamma, quæ flexuosis excessibus vagabunda, quem contigerit non adurit: nec aliud est quam imago nuncia perfecti ritæ voti (4). This is more conformable to the events in Scripture, and much more singular than the Miracle of Egnatia. A celestial Fire, descending upon the Victims, has sometimes been an evidence to the Jews that God accepted of their worship (5); and it is a more direct sign of a particular Providence, to see the Fire then only kindle of itself, when the hearts of the worshippers are well disposed, than to see it at all times do so. In the latter case Men will be apt to suspect a natural Cause, or a Cheat: whereas in the former there is no Ground, or at least less ground for suspicions. Servius assures us, that in ancient Times they kindled no Fire upon the Altar, but drew down Fire from Heaven by Prayer and Supplication. 'Apud majores aræ non incendebantur, sed ignem divinum precibus eliciebant qui incendebat altaria (6).' Pausanias gives an account of a surprising thing he was an Eye-witness to. There were two Cities in Lydia, that practised what I am going to mention. Each of these two Cities had a Temple, in which was a Chapel designed for the Ceremony I am speaking of. Athes of a particular Colour were seen upon the Altar in this Chapel. A Magician came in, and having laid dry Wood upon the Hearth, and having a Tiara upon his Head, he repeated certain Prayers out of a Book; as soon as this was done, immediately a very bright Flame was seen to rise out of the Hearth, without any bodies putting Fire to the Wood. 'Ανευ δὲ δὴ πυρὸς ἀνάγκη παῖσα ἀρβύλαι τὰ ἔϋλα, καὶ πειραγῶν φλόγα ἐξ αὐτῶν ἐκλάμψαι. Sponte sua d'ignis nullo igne admoto purissima emicat flamma (7).' This Man was bolder than the Greek Priests, who make the People believe that, every Year at Easter, they gather in a Chapel of the holy Sepulchre a celestial Fire sent from God in a miraculous manner. They durst do nothing publicly, the Ceremony in all performed in secret. As the Latin Priests have not adopted this Cheat, they are the first to ridicule it, and they boldly tell the Greeks, when they are going to shut themselves up in the Chapel for this pretended Miracle, You would be strangely disappointed if your Steel should not prove good.

(5) See Remark [H] of the Article ABE L.

(6) Servius, in Æneid. lib. xii, ver. 200.

(7) Pausan. lib. v, sub finem pag. m. 176.

(8) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. xiv. Dion relates the same thing, lib. 54, at the year 734, pag. 603.

(9) Appianus, in Syriac. pag. 82.

(10) Servius, in Virgil. Ecl. viii, ver. 106.

I say nothing of particular occasions when Fire has kindled upon the Altar of itself for a happy Omen to some Persons. This was one of the Prefaces of Tiberius's Greatness. 'Ingresso primam expeditionem ac per Macedoniam ducente exercitum in Syriam accidit, ut apud Philippos sacratæ olim victicium legio- num aræ sponte subitis colluere ignibus (8).' As he led his Army, in his first Expedition, through Macedonia into Syria, the Altars, which the victorious Legions had consecrated at Philippi, caught Fire of themselves, and burst forth into a sudden blaze. Suetonius knew his future advancement by the like sign (9). Cicero's Consulship was preceded with the like Omen: this he learned from his Wife, and inserted it in a Poem. He might easily have known that there was nothing supernatural in it: if Wine is thrown upon hot Athes, among which there are almost always some live Coals, it is not uncommon for the Spirit of the Wine to take Fire; this was all the prodigy that Cicero's Wife informed her Husband of. 'Hoc uxori Ciceronis dicitur contigisse, cum peracto sacrificio libare vellet in cinerem; ex ipso cinere flamma eodem anno Consulatum futurum ostendit ejus maritum, sicut Cicero in suo testatur poemate (10).' It is said that the Wife of Cicero, after the performing of a Sacrifice, pouring out some Wine on the Athes, saw a Flame issue from them, a prognostication that he should be Consul that Year, as Cicero himself testifies in his Poem. Others say this Prodigy appeared to the Ladies, who were celebrating the Feast of the good Goddesses. The Fire upon the Altar seemed to be extinguished, and yet all of a sudden a great Flame blazed out from the midst of the Fire-Brands and Athes (11). This might be very natural: We see every day the remainder of a Faggot, when the Flame is out, kindle again of itself. The Ladies were alarmed, but the Vestal Virgins ordered Cicero's Wife to go directly and tell her Husband, that he should put his Designs in Execution for the good of his Country, the Goddesses having promised him good success. They were at that time deliberating what to do with Catiline's Accomplices who were kept in Prison. Cicero's Wife immediately executed the Vestals order, and encouraged her Husband (12). This has the air of one Story, embellished with another. They have perhaps changed the Circumstances of the Fact with which Cicero's Poem is adorned, and so for one Prodigy have given us two. However that be, it was not a Maxim, that Fire, kindling of itself, was always a good Preface; for we see in Virgil, upon a like occasion, they with it might be a good Omen:

Aspicit corripuit tremulis altaria flammis
Sponte sua, dum ferre moror, cinis ipse. Bonum fit (13).

*Behold the Athes, while I thus delay
To bear them hence, now lick the Altar round With trembling Flames, spontaneous: may it prove Auspicious.*

TRAPP.

Servius's Remark, which may be seen in the Margin, was the proof Mr Selden ought to have made use of; for his own is good for nothing. 'Licet & factum nonnunquam fit, says he (14), ut ignes illi non tantum boni sed & insauti quicquam præsignificarent. — Since those Fires, says he, have portended sometimes, not only good, but also ill success.' Upon which he cites Lavinia's Adventure, mentioned by Virgil in the seventh Æneid. But there the Prodigy does not consist in the Fire's catching of itself upon the Altar, but in its taking hold of Lavinia's long Hair, and burning all her Head-dress: while the flood by her Father at the Altar.

castis ADOLET dum altaria TAEDIS
Et juxta genitorem adstat Lavinia virgo
Vifa (nefas) longis comprehendere crinibus ignem, Atque omnem ornatum flamma crepitante cremari (15).

*— as chaste Lavinia, Royal Maid, Stood by her Father, and with holy Brands
Kindled the Altars; with her flowing Hair (Wonderous!) she seem'd to catch the Flame, and all Her Head Attire to crackle in the blaze.*

TRAPP.

Read also what Titus Livius relates of the Flame, which was seen about the head of Servius Tullius (16).

[D] . . . and even more extraordinary ones.] The Temple of Venus, upon the Mountain Eryce in Sicily, was one of the most celebrated among the ancient Pagans. It was distinguished by a thousand things: though I shall mention but one of them. The great Altar was always exposed without Covering in the open Air, sub dio: and yet the Flame was preserved alive, Night and Day, without Coals, Cinders, or Fire Brands, in the midst of the Dew, and the Grass which grew up every Night about it (17).

(11) Plutarchus, in Cicero, pag. 870.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Virg. Ecl. viii, ver. 105. Upon which Servius observes: Opus est ut hoc signum bonum sit quia ignis medius est, & qui possit etiam nocere. Sic quisque the Omen might be lucky, because the Fire had been the Power of a Mediator and an Enemy.

(14) Selden. Ot. Theolog. pag. 336.

(15) Virgil. Æneid. lib. vii, ver. 71.

(16) Livius, Dec. I. lib. i, cap. 33.

(17) Elian. Hist. Animal. lib. 7, cap. 54.

EGNATIUS (JOHN BAPTIST) a learned Man of the XVIth Century, taught polite Learning at Venice, his native City, with great Reputation. He made himself so useful to the Youth, that when he grew old and requested to be declared emeritus, he could not obtain it [A], because they judged it would be prejudicial to the Students.

At

[A] He made himself so useful to the Youth, that when he grew old, and requested to be declared Emeritus, he could

At last, in his extream old Age, he got leave to be dismissed, as he desired, and also received from the Republic of Venice a glorious and profitable Testimony of the Esteem they had for him [B]. The Works which he published [C] give but an imperfect Character of his Merit; for he spoke much better than he wrote, and discovered an excellent Memory, and a comprehensive Knowledge, much more in his Lectures and Conversation, than in his Books [D]. He was not less celebrated for his

Virtue

could not obtain it.] This is what one of his Scholars has published to the World. 'Nos qui juvenes eramus, says he (1), illum cujus ætas jam senescebat, ut jam tum cessaret, imprudenter fortasse quidem, sed tamen amice monebamus, illud usurpantes:

Solve senescentem mature sanus equum, ne
Peccet ad extremum ridendus, & illa ducat.

Ille vero, qui vir prudentissimus esset, & optime, qui sit orbis in rebus humanis, nosset, ut in otium solitudinemque se conferre cupiebat, sic etiam sæpe tentavit, sed, quod cupiebat, à Senatu Veneto, qui juventutem talis & tanti viri consuetudine fructuque privari volebat, id nunquam, nisi senex admodum, potuit impetrare. — We who were young gave him the imprudent perhaps, but friendly Advice, to retire from fatigue in his old Age, using that Argument of Horace:

While yet 'tis well release thy aged Horse,
Least when he runs, but with unequal Force,
And stretches hard to win, he break his Wind,
And hiss'd and distanc'd lamely lag behind.

And he who was a Man of uncommon Prudence, and perfectly acquainted with the Instability of human Affairs, longed to enjoy the sweets of a retired Life, and often solicited his discharge, but was not able to prevail with the Senate of Venice to comply with his Request. For they were unwilling their Town should be deprived of the Advantage of so experienced a Director. It was not therefore till he was extremely old that he succeeded.

[B] He received from the Republic of Venice a glorious and profitable Testimony of the Esteem they had for him.] He received this favour from the Senate, that though he taught no longer, he should have the same annual Allowance as when he did, and by a Decree of the Council of Ten, his Estate was exempted from all kinds of Taxes. This is the Translation Mr de Ryer has given of Thuanus's Latin. 'Eas (bonas literas) non mediocri studio illustravit, & scriptis & publica XL annorum professione cum summa totius Italie admiratione; ob id ab illustrissimo Senatu eam gratiam consecutus, ut quanguam publico munere defunctus, eodem stipendio, quod profutendo meruerat, quotannis donaretur, & ejus bona ex xivralis Consilii decreto publico censu eximeretur (2). Gbiliini does not altogether confirm this: he says, Egnatius's Salary was 300 Crowns a Year during his office, and 200 Crowns after his dismission from it (3). The short Elogy of Egnatius, which is at the beginning of his Posthumous Treatise of Exemplis illustrium Virorum, does not enter into these Particulars; but there it is said: 'Vir & scientia & religione insignis . . . adeo universæ Venetæ civitati ob singularem eruditionem ac morum probitatem charus, ut ex Senatus decreto ducentis aureis nummis quotannis jam publico munere defunctus ac plane emeritus quoad vixerit donaretur. — A Man eminent for his Knowledge and Piety . . . so endeared to the whole City of Venice for his extraordinary Learning, and the Integrity of his Morals, that after he had retired from public Business, and was worn out, he had an Annuity of Two hundred Ducats assigned by the Senate for Life.'

[C] The Works he published.] Gesner has given us this List of them, De Romanis Principibus vel Cæsari-bus libri tres (4). This Book contains an Abridgment of the Life of the Emperors from Cæsar to Constantine Paleologus, and from Charlemagne to Maximilian I. It was translated into French by Geofry Tory of Bourges, and printed at Paris in 1529 (5). The Abbot de Marolles made another French Translation of it in 1664. Gbiliini has made two Books of this (6); for he gives us de Cæsari-bus libri tres, as a distinct Work from de Romanis Principibus. After this manner Catalogue-makers absurdly multiply the Works of Authors upon a thousand occasions. But to go on copying Gesner. Item Annotationes in Vitas Cæsarum apud Suetonium, nempe Eliani, Spartiani, Julii Capitolini, Lampridii, Flavii Vopisei, Trebellii Pollionis, Vulcatii Gallicani. These words have been faithfully copied by Gesner's Abridgers: Yet it is easy to perceive they are full of Faults. There was no need of a Comma after Eliani, and instead of Eliani, it ought to be read Elii. The worst is, supposing they are correct, you must of necessity suppose also, that Elian, that Spartianus, that Julius Capitolinus, that Lampridius, that Flavius Vopiscus, that Trebellius Pollio, and Vulcatius Gallicanus, are Roman Emperors, whose Lives Suetonius has writ. Now this Supposition is so absurd, and so monstrous, that a School-Boy would laugh at it. How then has it passed for true in the Judgment of Josias Simler, and John James Fritius, who have made an Abridgment of, and a Supplement to, Gesner? They are more inexcusable than Gesner: for if he saw the Proofs from the Press, he might not take notice of the Printer's Omissions. It happens too often, when we correct the Proofs, that the head is so full of what we put into the Copy, that we read it by heart, and without perceiving where the Printers have mislead. Egnatius's other Books cited by Gesner are, de Origine Turcarum: Observationes in Ovidium: Interpretamenta in familiæ Epistolas Ciceronis: Panegyricus in Francorum Regem (7): Recitationes quæ obscuriores aliquot Autorum locos interpretantur (8): Exemplorum libri novem. Gbiliini assures us, that the Notes of this Author in Dioscoridem ab Hermolao Barbaro translatus, and his Harangue ad Metretices, and seventy other Harangues, have all been published. The Abbot de Marolles observes (9) that the little Treatise of the Origin of the Turks, composed by our Egnatius, is printed in the Collection of Works concerning the History of the Government of Turkey, and the Ottoman Empire, by John Oporin in 1556. Note, the nine Books of Examples were printed after his Death. He composed this Book, in his old Age, upon the Model of Valerius Maximus, but he did not live long enough to put a finishing hand to it. He recommended it in his last Will to the Noble Marco Molino, Procurator of St Mark, who ordered his Son to publish it. The Son immediately discharged this Commission. The Epistle Dedicatory at the beginning of the Book is dated the thirtieth of April 1554: It contains in few words a very good Elogy on Egnatius, whose Death is there placed, July the second 1553 (10). The Edition I make use of is of Paris, apud Bernardum Turisianum via Jacobæa sub Aldina Bibliotheca, 1554 in 16mo. The Title of this Book is: Joannis Baptistæ Egnatii viri doctissimi, de Exemplis illustrium virorum Venetæ civitatis atque aliarum Gentium.

[D] He spoke better than he wrote, and discovered . . . more knowledge in his Lectures . . . than in his Books.] Corradus observes that those, who charged Egnatius with ignorance, could better be confuted by the Evidence of those Persons, who had heard that Professor, than by his Books. Quamvis ipsius scriptis, quæ jam multa leguntur, facile refutare possemus: quia tamen ille multo melius, ut Ser. Galoa, ut Q. Hortensius, ut alii, dixit, quam scripsit, facilius eos testibus, qui sunt adhuc innumerabiles, confutari posse, si res poscat, arbitramur (11). He relates a curious Fact. Egnatius pronouncing an Harangue, which he had learnt by heart, was just upon the point of concluding, when he saw the Pope's Nuncio come in. He resumed his Discourse from the beginning, and repeated in other terms all he had said, but with more Eloquence than the first time, so that his Friends advised him to write no more. Nos certe, quod omnes, qui tunc Venetiis erant, audire potuerunt, affirmare non dubitamus; illum, quom Pontificis olim Legatus Orationi, quam memoriter jam penè totam dixerat, intervenisset, illud idem, quod pronuntiabat, diversis verbis à principio repetitum, multo melius

(1) Sebastianus Corradus, in Questura, init.

(2) Thuanus, lib. 12, pag. 253, col. 1. ad ann. 1553.

(3) Gbiliini, Teatro, Parte I. pag. 96, 97.

(4) Gesner, in Biblioth. p. 387.

(5) See the Abbot de Marolles, in his Augmentation of the Roman History, Tom. II, pag. 287.

(6) Gbiliini, ubi supra.

(7) Gesner's Epitome says it was printed at Venice in 1540.

(8) Gruterus has inserted them in the first Volume of the Thesaurus Criticus.

(9) Augment. de l'Hist. Romaine, Tom. II, p. 287.

(10) I l'élève ne ought to prefer this Date to the IV Non. Quintil. of Thuanus.

(11) Corradus, in Questura, pag. 2.

(a) Thuan. lib.
xii, pag. 253. See below, Citation (10).

Virtue than for his Learning [E]; and it is said his exemplary Life was an Honour to the Ecclesiastical Order to which he had devoted himself (a). He died the Fourth of July 1553, at the age of eighty Years (b), and left his Estate and his fine Library (b) idem, ibid. to three illustrious Families of Venice [F]. Soon after his death, a Letter was published,

(12) Id. ibid.

' melius elegantiusque dixisse. Quare, quum descen-
' diffet, sic nos illi diximus: Tu vero posthac nihil
' unquam scribito (12). To know the extent of his Learning, and the strength of his Memory, read what follows, by which it appears, that the Senators of Venice went often to consult him. ' Habuit vir ille,
' quod de L. Lucullo dicitur, divinam quandam me-
' moriam rerum: quas quidem res penè omnes ut
' legerat, vel audierat, sic iis, qui scire volebant,
' memoriter, jucundeque narrabat. Res vero tam mul-
' tas ille legerat, vel audierat, ut omnium maxime
' studiosus, atque etiam plane curiosus fuit, ut de
' omni re, quæcumque in disceptationem, quæstionem-
' que vocaretur, copiosissime, tanquam Gorgias, posset,
' & soleret etiam sæpe disputare. Nam de jure civili
' caute, de totius orbis, & cæli regionibus, ac gen-
' tium moribus perite, de poetica divinitus, de phi-
' losophia sapienter, atque de religione pie responde-
' bat. Quod si quis eum, ut de rebus ad Historiam,
' vel ad Rhetoricam pertinentibus loqueretur, rogasset,
' id ille sic libenter, sic humaniter, sic ornate, sic
' copiose faciebat, ut vere Lydius, quod ajunt, in cam-
' pum videretur esse provocatus. Quare, præter stu-
' diosios adolescentes, quorum maxima frequentia sem-
' per Egnatii janua, & vestibulum frequentari solebant,
' multi nobilissimi & optimi senatores, ut magnis de
' rebus deliberarent, ad eum penè quotidie veniebant
' ita, ut ejus domus oraculum totius civitatis vere
' posset appellari (13). — He had the same, which ' is reported of Lucius Lucullus, a surprizing happines
' of Memory; inasmuch, that he retained almost every ' thing exactly as he had read or heard, and would ' repeat it agreeably, and off Hand, to those who de' sired to hear it. He had read and heard so much,
' being extremely inquisitive after Knowledge, that,
' like Gorgias, he could, and often did, dispute on what' ever Topic was proposed for debate. On Civil-Law he ' answered with Caution; on the System of the Hea' vens, the Theory of the Globe, and the Manners of ' Nations, with Judgment; on Poetry, as if he had been ' inspired; on Philosophy, like a Sage; and on Religion
' like a Saint. But if any one asked him to speak of ' History or Rhetoric, he did it with such Freedom,
' such Humanity, such Elegance, and such Fluency,
' that he appeared to be a perfect Champion in ' his way. Wherefore besides the numbers of young
' Students, who constantly crowded his Gate, many Se' nators of the first Rank and Condition, came almost ' every day to consult him, on Matters of Importance;
' inasmuch, that his House might justly be called the ' Oracle of the whole City.

(13) Id. ibidem,
pag. 3.

[E] He was not less celebrated for his Virtue, than for his Learning.] Erasmus gives him this Encomium at the same time that he will not allow him the Title of Ciceronian. ' Virum non minus probum &
' integrum quam eruditum & eloquentem nominasti,
' sed cui Tulliani cognominis honorem negant docto-
' rum suffragia. Docte loqui maluit quam Ciceroni-
' ane, & quod voluit assequutus est (14). — You have ' mentioned a Man, no less eminent for his Virtue, than ' his Learning, but to whom the Learned will not allow
' the surname of Ciceronian; he chuses rather to speak
' like a Scholar, than like Tully, and therein succeeds to ' his Wish. Ghilini says also, that Egnatius made him' self beloved by his Doctrine, and by his Behaviour.
' Per la singulare sua dottrina e integrità di costumi (15).
The Author of the Epistle dedicatory, which I have already mentioned, enlarges very much on this Head, in a very positive manner; for after displaying the Gifts of his Mind, as his Memory, Invention, Knowledge, and Eloquence, his Art of mixing Mildness and Gravity in his Reproofs, and of instructing the Youth, he concludes in these Words. ' Postremo
' verò, si omnes ejus mores diligenter inspicias, per-
' fectum sanè atque absolutum innocentissimæ vitæ ex' emplar sese offert. Univerfa enim ejus vita, nihil
' aliud quam ardentissimam religionem, Christianam-
' que pietatem spirat. Poterat omnis Veneta civitas
' in hoc uno perinde atque in purissimo speculo sese ad omnem pietatem, eruditionemque componere (16).
— Lastly, if we thoroughly examine all his Excel-
' lencies, we will appear to be a most perfect Pattern

(14) Erasmus, in Ciceroniano, pag.
m. 72.

(15) Ghilini,
Teatro, Tom. I.
pag. 97.

(16) Marcus Mo-
linus, Epistola Dedicat Exemplorum Egnatii.
See also Remark
[D], at the end.

' of Innocence; for his whole Life breathes nothing
' but the warmest Zeal, and Christian Piety. The whole ' City of Venice might by him alone, as by the purest
' Mirror, compose themselves to all Virtue, and E' rudition. He appears so sure of his Point, that he takes pains to refute those who had published in a satirical Letter, that Egnatius lived, and died without Religion. He contents himself with exclaiming at their Impudence, and laughing at their Folly: ' Illud unum
' præterire nequeo, hominiones quosdam nefario
' scelere audaces, in tam singularis, tamque omnium
' judicio probati viri memoriam invecos: atque male ' confaricata epistola, ac vix coherenti tam placidos
' manes violare fuisse ausos. Ut jam exclamare libeat,
' ô mores, ô tempora. Unde repente tam inopinata
' atque immania monstra? Unde isti tam infesti Caly-
' donii apri spumoso ore in præclaram omnium virtu-
' tum sylvam debacchantes, universamque optimi ac
' doctissimi viri famæ existimationisque segetem indig-
' nè devastantes? Ergo iterum opus est Hercule? Jam
' 13 instat labor? Dii vestram fidem. Sed attende
' quæso quid præclari isti censores damnent. Egnat-
' ium parum Christianè vixisse, atque eadem, qua
' vixerit pietate defunctum esse. Id nimirum quod
' quemvis hominem Christianum offendere potuisset.
' Sed qua tandem in urbe hoc levissimi homines men-
' titi sunt? Nempe in illa, quæ hunc genuit, edu-
' cavit, atque ad ampliss. honores summo judicio pro' movit, ac publicis decretis toties decoravit. O in' signem audaciam, ô manifestam callumniam. Vides
' quam libere, quam confidenter pronunciant, quam
' gravem notam defuncto homini inurant. Quid quæ-
' so reliquum erit Christiano homini si religionem
' adimas non solum in cætera vita, sed etiam sub ip-
' sum mortis tempus, quando vel perditissimi homines
' resipiscere solent? Verum ne tam argutum illorum
' mendacium non careret ratione ἀλογία protulerunt:
' quod etiam, ne præter rerum scientiam, linguarum
' cognitionem illis deesse putes, Græcè explicarunt
' ἀδύνατον εἶναι καλῶς ἑρμηνεύειν, μὴ καλῶς ἀ-' νοθῶσαι. Sed præstiterit fortasse hanc illorum de-mentiam risisse (17). — One thing I cannot omit mentioning, that certain insignificant Persons, but impiously outrageous, have inveighed against the Memory of so extraordinary and universally approved a Man, and dared to disturb his peaceful Shade, with a noisy ill concerted heap of Ribaldry. We may now reasonably cry out, o tempora, o mores. From whence could such Savage Monsters on a sudden start? Whence these furious Caledonian Boars, that, with frothy Mouths, lay waste the fair Grove of Virtue, and riot-ously trample under Foot the glorious Harvest of so learned a Man? We have occasion therefore for another Hercules. At thirteenth Labour waits him. O Heavens! But pray observe what these notable Reformers would condemn. That Egnatius lived not like a Christian, and shewed no more Religion at his Death, than he had done in his Life. This indeed might have given offence to any Christian Man! But in what City, pray, have these idle Persons hated these Falsities? namely in that which gave him Birth and Education, and raised him with the greatest Applause to the highest Honours, and so often distinguished him by public Decrees. Here is Impudence not to be paralleled! Here is glaring Detraction!
You see with what unconcern, with what confidence they pronounce Sentence upon his Fame, how scandalously they stigmatize his Memory. What, I beseech you, will they leave a Christian, if they strip him of his Religion not only in his Life, but even in his last Moments, when the most profligate are wont to repent!
But that these barefaced Lies might not want Reason, they bring a Greek Axiom to prove them, least we should think they had no greater a store of Languages, than of Knowledge. It is impossible for him that lives a Libertine, to die a Saint. But perhaps it would be more proper to laugh at their Madness.

(17) Marcus Mo-
linus, ibid.

[F] He left his Estate, and his fine Library to three illustrious Families of Venice.] It consisted of abundant of Medals, and pieces of Antiquity: read these Words of Thuanus. ' Treis amplissimas patini
' sanguinis

(e) See Remark [E].

lified, in which he was charged with having had no Religion, neither in his life nor at his death (c). I have observed in another place (d) his difference with Sabellicus, and their Reconciliation. It is pretended, he refused to heinously the Abuses which Robortel had in his Writing put upon him, that he would revenge them with his Sword (e). Mr Teiffier's Criticism against the Translator of Tbuanus might be extended even to the Original [G]. Something must be said against Moreri [H].

(d) In Remark [F] of the Article SABELLICUS.

(e) See the Article HIPPONAX, Remark [F], towards the end.

(18) Tbuanus, lib. xii, p. 253.

* sanguinis familias Molinam, Lauretanam, & Bragadenam, supremis tabulis heredes instituit; qua in hereditate præcipue numeratur copiosa librorum suppellex, nummis antiquis aureis, argenteis & æreis, aliisque præterea veteris ævi monumentis instructissima (18). — By his last Will, he appointed three of the most eminent Families of Venice his Executors: the most considerable part of his Effects was his Library, consisting of a large Collection of Books, enriched with a vast variety of ancient Coins, in Gold, Silver, and Brass, and Monuments of Antiquity.

[G] Mr Teiffier's Criticism might be extended even to the Original. First let us see the words of du Ryer.

* John Baptista Egnatius was born at Venice of a good Family, but poor, and was the Disciple of

* Angelo Politio, who restored good Learning in Italy, where it was almost extinct, and who, having taught

* forty Years with the Admiration of all Italy, received

* this Favour from the Senate, &c. (19). Mr Teiffier

* makes this Remark (20). 'If we abide by the gram* matical Construction of du Ryer's Words, it should

* seem that Angelo Politio, who restored good Learn-

* ing in Italy, taught also for forty Years at Venice:

* nevertheless it is certain Tbuanus speaks of Egnatius,

* and that Politio, who was one of the most

* learned and most polite Writers of his Age, died in * his fortieth Year in 1553 (21). This Critic might * have observed two other things; one, that the Latin * word Politianus ought to be translated Politian, and not Politio, a Name unknown to the Republic of Learning, when the question is of the celebrated Angelus Politianus; the other, that Tbuanus is not the innocent cause of his Translator's Error; for his Words are ranged in such a manner, that they will bear no better Version than du Ryer's. 'Hic & annus abulit, sicut be (22), Johannem Baptistam Egnatium familiam honestam, sed in tenui re, Venetiis natum, Angelum Politianum, qui bonas literas in Italia intermortuas excitavit discipulum, quique eas non mediocri studio illustravit, & scriptis & publica xli annorum professi-

* one cum summa totius Italie admiratione.' Mr Perizonius has observed (23) that modern Writers are sometimes the cause of the Obscurity, and equivocal sense of the Latin, by their ill placing of the Words.

[H] Something must be said against Moreri. I. He ought not to say Egnatius was in esteem about the end of the XVIth Century. This is a very improper expression of a Man who died but in 1553.

II. He ought not to bring as a proof of the old Age of this Professor, that Gesner saw him at Venice in 1543:

he should have said, he lived ten Years after that; but,

as Vossius only made use of this Observation of Gesner,

(24), I do not wonder that Moreri stopped there: I wonder much more, that Vossius should not know what the Epitome of Gesner and Tbuanus might have informed him concerning the Year of Egnatius's

Death.

(22) Tbuanus, lib. xii, p. 253.

(23) See the Writings of Mr Perizonius against Mr Frœnius.

(24) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. p. 678.

(19) du Ryer, Translation of Tbuanus cited by Teiffier, Tom. I, pag. 74. Edit. 1696.

(20) Teiffier, pag. 75.

(21) This is an Error of the Press: it ought to be 1494, as it is in the first Edition of Teiffier.

EIMERIC (NICOLAS), a Dominican, and Inquisitor-General in the Kingdom of Arragon in the XIVth Century. His Directory of the Inquisitors was printed at Barcelona in 1503. Francis Pegna published two Editions of it at Rome, one in 1578; and the other in 1585.

EYSENGREIN (MARTIN), in Latin Eysengreinius, Doctor of Divinity in the XVIth Century, published many Books, of which you will find a Catalogue in the Epitome of Gesner's Bibliothèque. Moreri will inform you that he was born at Stuttgart in the County of Wurtemberg, that he was Vice-Chancellor of the University at Ingolstadt, and that he died in 1578. I add to this, that he was of a very good Family (a), and the Son of a very honest Man, and was once of the Protestant Religion (b). He had even declared in a public Work, that he would persevere in it constantly and unalterably, and dedicated his Book to Vergerius, to congratulate him for having owned the true Church, and abandoned the Party of Antichrist. Yet soon after he threw himself into the Romish Communion, about the Year 1560 (c), and expressed a great deal of Bitterness against the Protestants. He attacked them in several Tracts, in which he handled the Controversy with all the Violence, and according to all the Common-Places of that time. George Leibler, Professor of Physic in the Academy of Tubingen, refuted one of his Tracts [A]. I do not know whether he was related to WILLIAM EYSENGREIN whom I have mentioned in another place [B].

(a) George Leibler, in Scholii ad Sermonem Mart. Eysengreii de Pueris Jesu, pag. 43.

(b) Ibid. pag. 11.

(c) Ibid.

(1) At Tubingen, in 4to It contains 86 pages.

[A] George Leibler . . . refuted one of his Tracts.

It is a German Homily upon the Gospel of the first Sunday after Epiphany. It relates to the Son of God being found sitting in the Temple of Jerusalem in the midst of the Doctors. Leibler translated it into Latin, and published it together with Scholium in the Year 1575

(1). He charges the Author with troubling the World with many little Books which were of no Value. 'Tu

* spreta mea fidei admonitione, hæcenus multos parvos

* & pravos edidisti libellos, quos an quisquam hæcenus

* responso dignatus sit, haud scio. Mihi quidem cum

* initio aliqui venissent in manus, eisque respondere

* vellem, ita visa sunt indocti & inepti, ut chartarum

* tam turpiter contaminatarum vehementer me misereret

* & omnino eorum lectione postea abstinere. Sed

* cum infelici partu adeo sis fecundus ut subinde

* nova monstra per abortum edas, &c. (2). —

* Without any regard to my friendly Advice, you have

* still published several little naughty Pamphlets; but I * am ignorant whether any one as yet has vouchsafed

* them an Answer. When, at first, some of them came * to fall into my Hands, and I was inclined to answer

* them, they appeared to be so childish and empty, that

VOL. II.

* I was extremely concerned to see Paper converted to

* so shameful a use, and determined for the future not * to take the pains to read them; but since you are so

* unhappily prolific of the monster Brood, and will not

* suffer them to ripen, before you turn them out into * the World, &c.' He charges him also with heaping together a great number of Words, only to encrease

the number of Sheets. 'Neque enim mihi libet tu-

* am imitari inanem loquacitatem, qua nihil aliud a-

* gis, quam ut multas paginas frustra explas, & mag-

* nos facias libros, in quibus res paucas bene & recte

* doceas (3). — Neither have I any Inclination to copy

* your impertinent Prolixity, whereby you only labour to

* swell the number of Sheets, and multiply Words to

* no purpose.' He concludes with some Remarks upon a Homily, wherein Eysengrein had explained Siméon's

Prophecy concerning the Infant Jesús.

[B] I do not know whether he was related to William Eysengrein, whom I have mentioned in another Place (4).] He was a Canon of Spires, his Native Country, and Contemporary with our Martin. He published, at Ingolstadt in 1566, a Book intitled Cen-

tenarii XVI, continentes Descriptionem rerum memorabilium

(3) Ibid.

(4) Ibid.

(4) In the Remark [E] of the Article ILLERICUS.

(2) Leibler, Schol. in Serm. Mart. Eysengreii, pag. 1.

him in Ecclesia contra Matthiam Flacium Illyricum. as Christopher Lehman has observed in his Preface to He had published, at Dillengen, in 1564, Chronicon the Annals of Spire (5). Spirense, a Work wherein there are abundance of Lyes,

(5) See the Introductio in Historiam Ecclesiasticam of Caspar. Sagittarius, pag. 519.

(a) Cum Prefa-tione spurca & pierati moribusque adversa. Tobias Tandlerus, in Re-pulsione Colu-
mar. Elichi.

(b) Plurimi libri Scholis enormi-bus ac non tole-randis confuta-
ti. Idem, ibid.

ELICH (LEWIS PHILIP), in Latin Elicbius, lived at the beginning of the XVIIth Century. I think he was born at Marpurg. He maintained there a public Dispute de Magia Diabolica, and would have printed a Book upon the same Subject with a Preface full of bad things (a); but they prohibited it, and the Magistrates searching his House found several Books upon which he had writ Notes somewhat scandalous (b). They confiscated the Books, and summoned him before the Judges. He promised with an Oath, and in writing, to renounce those frivolous Studies: nevertheless he published his Book at Frankfort in 1607 [A], and joined to it a very angry Preface against the Academical Senate of Marpurg. They would have called him to an account for it; but he made his escape, and turned Roman Catholic (c). This is but part of the ill they say of him in the Book I quote. He published at Frankfort, in 1609, another Book intituled Innocentius, sive de Miseria hominis libri tres, in ignominiam & confusionem superbiorum editi.

(c) Taken from Tobias Tander-us, in Repulsio-ne Calumniarum Elichi.

[A] He published his Book at Frankfort 1607. He called it de Dæmonologia, de Dæmonis curgia & Lamiarum energia. He confutes arrogantly, in it, those who doubt of the Truth of what is said of Witches, and of their being really carried to the Sabbatical Assemblies. Particularly he attacks Tobias Tandler, Professor of Physic at Wirttemberg, who had published an Harangue de Fojina & Incantatione, in the Year 1606. This Tandler, reprinting it in 1607, with some other Tracts of the same Nature, added a short answer to the Calumnies of Elicbius, from whence I have taken the matter of this Article.

(a) Crenius, in Præfatione Falsi
I Exercitationum
Philologico-Historicorum.

(b) Beverovicus, de Vite Termi-no, parte iii.
pag. m. 139.

(c) König, Biblioth. pag. 27c.

ELICHMAN (JOHN) Native of Silesia, practised Physic at Leyden (a). He married a Wife in the Year 1638, who was of a Burgomaster's Family (b). But he did not enjoy her long, for she died in the year 1639 (c). He understood sixteen Languages well (d), and was so skillful in the Persian, that, in the Judgment of Salmafius, Europe never produced a Man who came up to him in that, and perhaps never will produce the fellow of him (e). He believed that the Persian and German Languages were derived from the same Source, for which he assigned many reasons (f). He writ a Letter in Arabic (g) which was printed at Jena in the Year 1636. His Dissertation De termino vitæ secundum mentem Orientalium (h), was published in 1639. It would have been much longer if he had not died while he was about it. His Latin Version of the Table of Cebes was printed at Leyden in 1640, with the Greek and Arabic Version, by the Care of Salmafius, who prefixed a large Preface to it.

(d) Christianus Ravius, pag. 11, primæ Panegyri-cæ, apud Crenium, ibid.

(e) Salmaf. in Præfat. in Tabul.
Arabic. Cebetis.

(f) Id. ibid.

(g) De Usu Lingæ Arabicæ in Medicina. See König, Biblioth. pag. 27c.

(h) It is at the end of the third part of Beverovicius's Book De termino Vitæ.

(a) Videri potest ea Traditio in Tractatu jucha-sim folio 11 quam
etiam amplectitur
R. Salomon
noud Lirium
&c. Egidius
Camartus, de Re-bus gestis Elias,
pag. 71.

(1) Tractat. VII in Joannem, apud Egidium Cam-artum, de Rebgest. Elias, p. 71.
(2) Tom. VI, Problem. cccxi,
apud Camart.
ibid.

(3) Lib. I. Epist.
vi, apud Camart.
pag. 72.

(4) 1 Chron. ix.
20.

(5) Spiritum feveritatis & ultio-nis exortum fuisse in Elia & collegis magis quam in discipulis Evangelicis.
The Spirit of Rage and Revenge was more exerted by Elias and his Colleagues than by the Preachers of the Gospel. Martyn.
(6) 1 Kings ch. i.
xviii, 40.
(7) 2 Kings
chap. 1.

ELIJAH, one of the greatest Prophets of the Old Testament, lived under the Reign of Abab. His true History is to be found in Moreri's Dictionary: to which I refer my Readers, and shall content myself with relating some apocryphal Stories of him. There was a common Tradition among the Jews (a), that he was the same with Phineas, the Son of Eleazar the High-Priest [A], and that the Prophet, who lived among Men sometimes under the Name of Phineas, sometimes under the Name of Elias, was not a Man but an Angel (b). St Epiphanius relates one thing which is as incredible as these, I mean the Vision of Sobac, the Father of Elias. As soon as his Wife was delivered, he thought he saw Men clothed in white, who saluted the new born Child, covered him over with Fire, and made him swallow the Flame. These are the waddling Cloaths in which they wrapped the little Elijah. This is the Milk with which they nourished him. Sobac went up to Jerusalem to consult the Oracle, and was told what the Vision signified. They assured him that his Son should inhabit in Light, and that he should judge Israel with Fire and Sword (c) [B]. It is a pretty

(b) Hanc eorum traditionem refe-runt Lirius, A-bulensis, Megallanus, Serrarius.
Id. ibid. pag. 100.

(c) Epiphanius de Vitis Prophet.
pag. m. 237.

[A] A Tradition says, he is not to be distinguished from Phineas the Son of Eleazar the High-Priest. This Tradition is very ancient; for Origen makes mention of it (1). I suppose it is founded upon the promises which were made to Phineas, when he had killed the Man that defiled himself with the Midianitish Woman. Francis George of Venice (2) is not far from this Opinion of the Rabbies. Peter Damien (3) embraces it cordially: he believes that Phineas, for the sake of the Zeal, which fired him at the sight of so scandalous an Object, will be preserved alive in the terrestrial Paradise to the end of the World, and that it was he who, under the Name of Elijah the Prophet, was carried up to Heaven in a fiery Chariot. He cites a Passage of the Scripture (4), to prove that Phineas was alive in David's time.

[B] That he should judge Israel by fire and sword. This agrees pretty well with that revengful Spirit, which animated Elijah on some Occasions (5), as when he destroyed the Priests of Baal (6), and called for fire from Heaven upon the King's Soldiers (7). The Enemies of Toleration do not love to be told that JESUS CHRIST has abolished this Spirit (8): such an Information is an uneasy Lesson to them, and they would willingly say to whoever puts them in mind of it, as Felix to Paul, go thy way for the present, when a convenient time comes, we will call for thee again (9). I do not wonder that they cannot endure to be deprived of the Authority of such an Example as this: for what can be more strongly urged in Favour of Massacres out of Zeal for Religion, than the Conduct of Elijah. A Man, who had no Character in the State, no political Authority, no right to make use of the Sword, a Man, I say, whose Office was only to prophecy, affables all the Prophets of Baal, who were 450, and the Prophets of the Groves to the number of 400, who had the Honour to eat at the Queen's Table (10): he convinces them by a Miracle, that they worshipped a false God, and immediately orders them to be seized (11), and to take care that none escaped. He commands them all to be killed, without condescending so much as to ask King Abab, who 53: 56.

(8) Luke ix,

(9) Acts xxiii.
26.

(10) 1 Kings
xviii. 19.

(11) Ibid. ver.
40.

common Opinion, for many ages received among Christians, that Elijah is not dead, and that God preserves him alive either in the terrestrial Paradise, or in the Heavens, or elsewhere, to employ him at the end of the World against Antichrist. There are some who assure us, that then he is to suffer Martyrdom, and that he and Enoch are the two Witnesses mentioned in the eleventh chapter of the Apocalypse (d): they also ascribe to him a very exact Contineny (e), and conclude he will be honoured with three Crowns, the Crown of Doctor, the Crown of Virginity, and the Crown of Martyrdom (f). They pretend that his Chastity has far exceeded that of all the other Prophets who lived in Celibacy; for he was not contented to live chaste, but also ordered his Disciples to abstain from Women (g); and it is he that is looked upon as the first Founder of the Monastic Life. The Carmelites boast that he is the Founder of their Order, and tell a thousand Stories which are ridiculed by the other Monks. Nothing is so impudent as a certain Story of the Gnostics concerning this Prophet [C]. The Apocalypse of Elias has commonly passed among the Fathers for a supposititious Book: but Origen seems to mention a Book of that Prophet as a genuine Production [D]. There

(d) See Alcazar and Viegas upon the Xth Chapter of the Apocalypse cited by Camart, ibid. pag. 121.

(e) Hieron. lib. 1. adv. Jovin. & multi alii Patres, apud Camart. pag. 277.

(f) Ægid. Camart. pag. 275.

(g) Id. pag. 278.

who was present, if it was his Will to have it so, and without exhorting them to Repentance and Conversion. It cannot be said that they acted against their Conscience (12); for if they had believed that Baal was a false God, they would not have submitted to an Examination, and by the credit they had with the Queen, they might easily have evaded the Challenge of the Prophet Elijah. Besides, we see they invoked their Deity with the utmost Ardor, and cut themselves with Knives in Honour of him; therefore they were in hope of being heard. In order to excuse Elijah, Divines are forced to acknowledge that he had received invisibly, from God, an extraordinary and special Mission to put these Prophets to Death, and that God had revealed to him, that they were Reprobates not to be wrought upon by any Admonitions to Repentance (13). Peter Martyr indeed alleges the Law of Moses against Idolators, the Law of Retaliation, &c; but after all he confines himself to a particular Inspiration, which is a thing not to be disputed among Christians. 'Omnia hæc privato instinctu Dei agebantur contra legem in communi propositam. Ipse legislator cum aliquid contra suas leges jubet mandatum ejus pro lege habendum est' (14). — All these things were done by a particular Inspiration from God, contrary to the Law established in common. When the Legislator commands any thing repugnant to the Laws he has before ordained, his Command ought to pass for Law. For the rest, nothing can be equal to the Impertinence of Feuardent the Franciscan, who accuses Peter Martyr of uttering injurious things against the Prophet Elias, and then of contradicting himself afterwards. 'Pergit idem (Vermilius) says he (15), vineta sua, quod ajunt, cedere, cum scribit, ad id vocatus erat Elias ut judicium divinæ severitatis exsequeretur, nec ex seipso verum ex Deo & Angeli monitu ita duxerit se gereret. Potuit quidem specie tenus homicida videri, nec tamen pro tali habendus est cum solum fuerit Dei minister. — He proceeds to overturn his own System, by saying, that Elias was called, as an Instrument, to execute the divine Vengeance, and that he had not of himself, but by the Direction of God, and an Angel, had recourse to such Extremities. He might, in Appearance, pass for a Murderer; but he is by no means to be looked on as such, since he acted only by a divine Commission. Feuardent makes the same Complaints against Calvin: he charges him with saying, 'Elias fuit homo depravatus, nimis vehementi zelo correptus... peccavit etiam quiritando se solum de clade ac persecutione restare: raptus item fuit spiritu servitutis & vindictæ (16). — Elias was a Man depraved, and guided by too furious a Zeal: he was also guilty of a Crime in complaining so frequently that he alone escaped the Fury and Persecution: He was likewise a Slave to a base vindictive Spirit.' He cites Calvin's Commentary upon the second and third Verses of the eleventh Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans: but I find nothing like it there. In Truth, the Liberty these Protestant Writers take to censure, in some things, the Conduct of this Prophet, cannot be found fault with, without blaming St Chrysostom (17). 'Qui acerrimis verbis Eliam crudelitatis & cujusdam avaritias arguit. Deinde alibi (18) eundem quasi penitus ad divina monita insensibilem, dum variis factis & exemplis ad commiserationem induceretur. — Who reproves

Elias, in the sharpest Terms, of Cruelty and Inhumanity; and in other places represents him as insensible of the divine Admonition, when so many Facts and Instances might have moved him to Compassion.'

[C] Nothing is more impudent than a certain story of the Gnostics concerning this Prophet. They said that if a Soul, when it ascended up to Heaven, could not give a good answer to the Virtues which asked it questions upon its Entrance, it was sent again upon Earth. Above all things it must answer that it had left no Children; for if it answered the contrary, it was sent back, and obliged to live in this World, till it had collected together all its Children, and was united to them. They tell you that, when Elijah ascended up to Heaven, he met with an Obstacle, which forced him to descend back again upon Earth. A female Demon came to him, and said stand, whither art thou going? I had Children by thee, and thou canst not enter Heaven, and leave them upon Earth. And how, answered he, couldst thou have Children by me, seeing I always lived in Continency? notwithstanding that, replied she, I had them by thee, for I took the benefit of thy Sleep. Those who understand the Latin will not find this obscure. 'Ὅτε ἐνυπνίους ἐνυπνιαζόμενος πολλὰ κῆς ἐν τῇ ἀπορροῇ τῶν σωμάτων ἐκινῶν, ἰδὼς ἡμῶν ἢ μεταλαβῶσα ἀπὸ σοῦ τὰ σπέρματα, καὶ γέννησά σοι υἱός. Cum in somnis effusione seminis sæpe corpus exbauiries ego abs te illud excepi, tibi que filios peperī (19). St Epiphanius confutes very well this Impertinence by the Impossibility of the thing: for the spiritual nature of Demons cannot be the passive Subject of any Generation. It is not so easy to refute those who say that a Demon may interpose, as an active Principle, in the Production of an Animal, not that he can, out of his own Sublimity, furnish the necessary Materials; for a Spirit is an immaterial Being; but he can, say they, make use of the seed of a Male, by conveying it to a proper Place, and so direct the motions of Matter, that this seed be converted into an organized Body. Those, who hold this possible, rightly affirm, that the Child, produced in this Manner, would be the Child of the Man, whose seed was employed; for why is a Man reputed the Father of a Child, conceived in the Womb of a Woman, whom he had enjoyed in the Stews, with no other view than to satisfy his brutish Lust? Is it not because the first Foundation, upon which the Body of the little Infant is built, was taken from the Body of that Man: and cannot the same be said with respect to that other Generation? however, the difference would be very great in this, that those, who became Fathers in this extraordinary Method, might nevertheless perfectly preserve their Virginity; so that the folly of the Gnostics concerning Elijah is every way extravagant.

[D] Origen seems to speak of a Book of this Prophet as a genuine Production. In explaining those words of St Matthew's Gospel (20), then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the Prophet, saying, and they took the thirty pieces of Silver, &c. he observes that it is not to be found in any Jewish Book, Canonical or not Canonical, that Jeremiah ever prophesied this, and he suspects, either that instead of Jeremiah, it ought to be read Zachariab, or else that Jeremiah wrote a Book which was never published. Upon which he says that Jeremiah is not the only Prophet, (19) Epiph. Hæc. XXVI, lib. 1, Tom. II, n. 13, pag. m. 95.

(20) Cap. 27, ver. 9.

(12) The Author of the Philosophical Commentary seems to suppose this, the better to answer the Objections which the Doctors who oppose Toleration found upon this Conduct of Elias.

(13) Certus erat Spiritu Dei eos non esse convertendos aut immutandos. Petrus Martyr. Comment. in lib. 1. Regum, cap. 18, fol. m. 141, verso.

(14) Ibid. folio 141.

(15) Feuardent. Theomach. Calvinist. lib. 9, cap. 3, pag. m. 437. He cites Martyr's Commentary, in lib. iv Regum, cap. 1, and cites it faithfully.

(16) Ibid. pag. 436.

(17) Homilia in SS. Petrum & Eliam, apud Camart. de Rebus Eliæ Proph. pag. 227.

(18) Homilia de Eliæ, apud eundem Camart. ib.

There is an old Tradition, which they falsely impute to Elijah, that the World shall continue but six thousand Years, whereof two thousand were to be before the Law, two thousand under the Law, and two thousand under the Messiah (b). The Jews say, that, seven Years after he was translated, Elijah wrote a Letter from Heaven to King Joram [E], and that he composed in Paradise the Annals of all Ages (i). Observe that the Extraction of this Prophet, who is almost equal to Moses, is so little known, that it is yet disputed what Country, and also what Tribe, he was of, &c (k). I have cited a Minime (l) who designed to have writ upon the Actions of Elijah. This Work would have been very long; for what the Friends of the Author published of it after his Death, is one Volume of Four hundred Pages in 4to, which contains only the Prolegomena.

You will find in Baronius, that Basilius, the Macedonian, Emperor of Constantinople, erected Temples to the Honour, and under the Name, of the Prophet Elijah, in his Capital City (m). This was one of the Proofs that a Carmelite Friar advanced to prove, that Father Papebroch had rashly denied mount Carmel to be reckoned among the holy Places which were visited by the first Christian Pilgrims (n). Every body may see the Impertinence of this Proof. It appears by the Book I have cited (o), that a Divine of the Order of St Francis confounded the Carmelites in a public Dispute in the Year 1594. He attacked a Thesis, in which it is assured, that Elijah bound himself up by a Vow to Celibacy. He cited a Jewish Doctor, named Rabbenu Haccados, that is, our holy Master, and who lived before JESUS CHRIST. This Rabbi says, that Elijah had a Brother, whose Wife was barren to the Death of Elijah, and consequently the Prophet could not devote himself to Continency, for the Law commanded him to marry his Sister-in-law if she became a Widow.

Prophet, who may have had Writings concealed, and that those kinds of Writings are cited by St Paul. He brings the following Passage for an Instance (21): As it is written, Eye hath not seen, nor Ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of Man, those things which God hath prepared for them that love him. He maintains that this is not to be found in any canonical Book, but only in the hidden Works of the Prophet Elias. St Jerome disdainfully rejects this Opinion, and says the Passage in St Paul is to be found in the Prophet Isaiab (22), not word for word, but as to the sense of it, which is sufficient for the Apostle. 'Quasi Hebræus ex Hebræis assumit Apostolus Paulus de authenticis libris in Epistola quam scripsit ad Corinthios, non verbum ex verbo reddens, quod facere omnino contemnit, sed sensum exprimens veritatem quibus utitur ad id quod voluerit roborandum (23). The Books, ascribed to Elijah, are not in the Catalogue of the Apocryphal Books, which were condemned by Pope Gelasius: nevertheless it is certain that the Apocalypse of Elijah, the Assumption of Elijah, &c. were looked upon as supposititious Books (24). [E] He wrote a Letter from Heaven to King Joram. This Opinion is founded upon a Place of Scripture misunderstood. Then there came a writing to him from the Prophet Elijah, saying, thus saith the Lord God, &c. (25). The true meaning of which is, that they carried to King Joram a writing, which was found among Elijah's Papers.

ELISHA, the Disciple and Successor of the Prophet Elijah, wrought abundance of Miracles, as may be seen in Moreri's Dictionary. There happened a very great Prodigy at his Birth: the golden Calf, which was at Shiloh, bellowed so loud, that it was heard to Jerusalem. Upon which the High-Priest consulting the Stones of his Breastplate found that a Prophet was just born, who should destroy the Idols (a). There is reason to believe, that Epiphanius, who relates this, has no other ground for it, but a false Tradition [A]. The Jews are not worth confuting, who pretend, that Elijah being was born at Gilgal, the golden Calf which was at Shiloh bellowed. Here Epiphanius commits another geographical Error, for which Dorotheus is not responsible. He takes Abelmuth and Gilgal for the same Place, in which he is mistaken; his fault arises from not understanding aright the pointing of Dorotheus's Words. 'Dorotheus scripserat, postquam Elizæus natus est, in Galgalis vitulus aureus mugitus edidit: quomodo interpungendum esse locum Dorothei, vel potius auctorem interpunxisse, apparet ex Isidoro qui ita rem istam narrat, Helizæo nato vitulum aureum cum magna boati clamasse in Galgalis. . . . Epiphanius non animadvertens hanc interpunctionem, putavit illud in Galgalis referendum esse potius ad sententiæ partem præcedentem quam ad sequentem, ad Elizæum potius quam ad vitulum (7). — Dorotheus wrote, as soon as Elisha was born, in Gilgal a golden Calf lowed: how this ought to be pointed, or rather how the Author himself pointed it, may be learnt from Isidorus, who relates the matter thus, when Elisha was born, a golden Calf lowed aloud in Gilgal. . . . Epiphanius not observing this pointing, imagined that in Gilgal ought rather to be referred to the former Clause than to the latter, to Elisha rather than to the Calf. III. Having mistaken Elisha's native Country for the Place, where the Author, he follows, had set the golden Calf, he was forced to place that Idol somewhere else, and he fixes it at Shiloh, where it never was. It is not necessary to say, that the miracle we speak of refers

(b) Id. pag. 283. See also Bernaldi Chronicon, lib. ii, cap. 3.

(i) See Cuneus de Republ. Hebræorum, lib. ii, cap. 1.

(k) See Petavius in Esaiam, ad Hiercl. LV. pag. m. 213.

(l) Giles Camart: He was General of the Order. His Work, intituled, Elias Theibiter, five de Rebus Eliæ Prophetæ, C. mmentarius posthumus, was printed at Paris in 1631.

(21) 1 Cor. ii, 9.

(22) Chap. lxi, ver. 4.

(a) Epiphanius de Vitis Prophet. pag. m. 237, 238.

(1) The Paris Divines, in the Ap- probation of this Root of Dorotheus published by Margarin de la Bigne in the Bi- blioth. Patrum.

(2) Sixtus Senen- sis, Biblioth. lib. 4.

(3) Annotat. in Martyrol. apud Rainoldum de Libris Apocryphis, Præf. 138, pag. 153.

(4) Tom. I, Controv. III, lib. 2, cap. 2, apud Rainold. Ibid.

(5) Quemadmodum manifestum est partim ex Reg. 4. collato cum 3. Josue, partim idque planius ex Judic. 7. As it manifest partly by comparing 1 Kings iv with Josb. iii, partly and more plainly from Judges vii. Rainoldus, de Libris Apocryph. pag. 157.

(6) See Numbers, esp. xxxii, and Josh. chap. xxii.

(m) See Father Papebroch, Re- spons. ad Exhibi- tionem Error. pag. 155.

(n) Ibidem.

(o) Ibidem, pag. 227, 228.

(23) Nicron in cap. xiv. l. 1610.

(24) See Camart, pag. 256, 257.

(25) 2 Chron. xxi, 12.

(7) Rainoldus, de Libris Apoc. pag. 153.

being become incapable of exercising his Office, received a Command to resign it to Elisha [B].

to one of Jeroboam's golden Calves: now as one of those Calves was set up at Dan, and the other at Bethel, it is certainly a mistake, whether, with Dorothicus, one is placed at Gilgal; or, with Epiphanius, it is placed at Shechem. IV. To come to the prodigy itself, we shall observe that Epiphanius might easily have known the falsity of it; for if the Oracle of the Breastplate had answered that the Prophet, who was born that day, was to throw down and destroy the Idols, Elisha would have abolished Jeroboam's Idolatry, he would have melted down, or broke in pieces, the two golden Calves: but he did not do this, therefore it is false that the Oracle gave out the Answer which is imputed to it, and thus the bellowing of the golden Calf is a Fable. I take no notice of the Observations of the English Doctor, upon the distance between Jerusalem, and the Places where Jeroboam's Calves were: for, besides that the Figures have been falsified by the Printers, I do not see that the distance is anything at all to the purpose; It is as easy to make the bellowing of a Statue be heard at twenty or thirty leagues distance, as twenty or thirty paces: whoever can work the latter Miracle, may perform the former: so that I wish our Doctor had not been so merry upon it. His raiillery of Torinus is as cold as Ice: he says that Torinus, fearing a Heifer could not bellow so loud, has translated the word δαμαλίσ a Cow, and not an Heifer. Albanus Torinus interpretes ejus operis videtur aliquid tale formidasse, cum Græcam vocem δαμαλίσ qua LXX Interpretis usi sunt pro vitulo vel vitula, ipse interpretatus sit, bovem: Bos illa aurea, & quæ sequuntur: videtur illi mihi metuisset ne vitula non posset tantum mugitum edere: itaque maluisse bovem dicere (8). — Torinus, the Translator of that Work, seems to me to have dreaded something of this Nature, when he translates the Greek Word δαμαλίσ which the Septuagint render a Calf, by a Cow. The golden Cow, &c. He seems to me to have been afraid, that a Calf could not have been able to make a sufficient noise, and therefore chose rather to call it a Cow.

[B] The Jews are not worth consulting, who say that Elijah, being incapable to exercise his Office, received a command to resign it to Elisha. I shall first produce the words of the Author, who is an evidence for me, and then make a short Observation.

Judæi etiam impingunt Eliæ spiritus coercendi impotentiam, qua ineptus fuerit redditus ad prophetiæ munus obendum, atque ideo iussus fuerit loco sui successorem assumere (9). — The Jews charge Elias with being unable to check the impetuosity of the Spirit, whereby he was rendered unfit to execute the Office of a Prophet, and was therefore ordered to resign it to his Successor. He that speaks in this manner, pretends he says no more than what he has read in Peter Martyr, whose Commentary he cites upon the first Book of Kings (10). I find no such thing in the place he cites. However that be, according to this Jewish dream, Elijah was no longer able to govern his enthusiastic Raptures, or the Impetuosity of his prophetic Spirit; and thus like an old Man, who, by reason of his Age, yields so easily to the Passion of Anger, they must force him to get himself declared emeritus, and resign his Office to Elisha, as to one more capable of discharging it worthily. What Impertinence this! for not to say that such a thing as this is not consistent with the Accounts of Scripture, is it not certain, that the Spirit, which seized the Prophets, and which so often transported Elijah from one place to another, was superior to the Prophets, and wanted not to be checked or restrained. Add to this, that the danger of being transported, too far, is more to be apprehended from a young Man than an old.

(9) Ægidius Camartus de rebus gestis Eliæ, pag. 127. He cites Peter Martyr, Vermilius in 3 Reg. cap. xix, ver. 20.

(10) I call the first Book of Kings what the Roman Catholics call the third.

(11) I call the first Book of Kings what the Roman Catholics call the third.

ELIZABETH, Queen of England, Daughter to Henry VIII, by Anne Boleyn, was one of the most illustrious Personages recorded in History. It would not be sufficient Justice to say, never any Woman swayed a Sceptre with more Glory than she did; but it must also be added, that there are few great Monarchs, whose Reign can be compared with her's [A]. Her Reign is the most shining Part of the English History, and was the School where so many able Ministers [B], and so many great Politicians were formed, that England never had a greater Plenty of them. The same may be said with respect to military Men (a). I shall not amuse myself with relating the principal Events of her glorious Life, which may be found in innumerable Books that every body may meet with, some of which are lately published (b). I shall rather collect together certain things, which are very curious, though not so important, and have not been observed by so many Authors. When Holland and Zeland offered to acknowledge her for Sovereign, she told their Embassadors, it would neither be honourable nor honest in her to seize the Property of another, and that the Hollanders were in the wrong to excite so many Tumults upon account of the Mass. She pleasantly continued this Conversation [C]. It was perhaps during this Audience that a young Man,

[A] There are few great Monarchs, whose reign can be compared with her's. Left I should be charged with overflattering any thing in order to flatter this Queen, let us hear the praises given her by a Jesuit, in a Book published at Paris. Elizabeth, says he (1), 'was one of those Persons, whose name alone imprints such an Idea on the mind, as can never be formed by any Description to be made of her; never crowned head better understood the Art of governing, or committed less Errors in a long reign. The Friends of Charles V could easily reckon up his mistakes: Elizabeth's Enemies were forced to make a diligent search for her's, and those admired her most, whose interest it was to cry down her Conduct. So that in her are verified the words of the Evangelist, that often the Children of this World, are wiser in their Views and Designs, than the Children of Light. Elizabeth's view was to reign, to govern, to be Mistress, to keep her People in Subjection, and her Neighbours in awe, without affecting either to weaken her Subjects, or to extend her Conquests over Foreigners. She would not suffer the least Infringement of the supreme Power, which she equally knew how to preserve, by Policy, and by Force; for no one, in her time, had more Wit, Management and Penetration than herself. She was no Warrior, and yet she knew so well how to form her military Men, that England had hardly ever seen them in greater numbers or more experienced than in her Reign.'

[B] Her Reign... was the School where so many able Ministers were formed. See their Names and Characters in a Book, which was printed in French at Roan, in 1683, intitled Fragmenta regalia, or the true Character of Elizabeth Queen of England, and her Favourites. This Book is originally in English: Robert Naunton, Secretary of State to King James I, and Master of the Court of Wards, is the Author of it. This Work has been newly translated into French (2), and printed with the Secrets of Courts, or the Memoirs of Walsingham. The Author of the Translation observes, that those two books were long since printed together, what he translates being the fourth Edition of them: he does not take the Title of Fragmenta regalia, &c. but of Fragments or Observations of Robert Naunton upon Queen Elizabeth's Reign and Favourites.

[C] She pleasantly continued this Conversation. What a bustle, says she, do you make about the Mass: if you will not assist at it as a Mystery, you may be present at it as a Comedy. What, if I should immediately

(8) Idem. pag. 260.

(1) Pathe d'Orléans's History of the Revolution of England, Tom. II, pag. 409, Edit. of Paris, 1695.

(9) Ægidius Camartus de rebus gestis Eliæ, pag. 127. He cites Peter Martyr, Vermilius in 3 Reg. cap. xix, ver. 20.

(10) I call the first Book of Kings what the Roman Catholics call the third.

(11) I call the first Book of Kings what the Roman Catholics call the third.

(a) See the Words of Rather or Leans, in Remark [A], at the end.

(b) See the History of England by Mr de Laury, printed at Rotterdam by Reineke Leers, 1698.

(2) It was printed in Holland, in 1694, though the Title, I do not know for what Reason, says at Cologne, by  1695.

Man, who followed the Embassadors, expressed, in a gross manner, the Sentiments which the Sight of so charming a Queen inspired him with [D]. But it was no Injury to him: on the contrary he was distinguished by it ever after. The Queen's Resentment against Buzenwall, who found fault with her way of speaking French, is very remarkable, and may serve for a Lesson to others [E]. What I am going to relate is better known: At her coming to the Crown, she was in suspense between the two Religions, and at last made choice of the Reformed [F]. This, even in the way of the World, was a Step of human Prudence. She would never have sat upon the Throne, if the King of Spain had not had much more Hatred against France than Zeal for the Catholic Religion [G]. It was this that preserved the Life of Elizabeth, a Circumstance diately act this Comedy, should you think yourselves obliged to run away? It must be noted, she was then dressed in white. I have read this in the Annals of Reidanus. Recenti multorum memoria obversari verba ejus ante annos XII. ad Aldegonduum & Paulum Bayrium Arausienensis Patrumque legatos prolata, immerito Hollandos unum ob Missæ sacrum tantos motus ciere, nec decoram iis præstam adeo adversus Regem contumaciam: quando fidem divinitati Missæ habere non adstringantur, asperantem tanquam fabulam. Quid inquit (Et erat candido amictu vestimento) vobisne pro flagitio foret, me hoc habitu, si histrioniam ordire, intueri (3)? This was enough to put the Embassadors out of Countenance.

[D] A young Man . . . expressed in a gross manner the sentiments which the sight of so charming a Queen inspired him with. I shall use du Maurier's own Expressions. Prince Maurice, says he (4), being one Day in a good humour, told my Father that Queen Elizabeth of England, through the common weakness of her Sex, was so desirous of being thought handsome (5), that the States having sent a splendid Embassy of the chief Men of the Country, and attended by a great many young Gentlemen of the United Provinces, a Hollander, in the Embassadors Retinue at their first Audience, after having earnestly viewed the Queen, told an English Gentleman he had known in Holland; that he did not know why they should speak so indifferently of the Queen's Beauty: that they did her the greatest injury: that he thought she was very charming, and if she was his Wife, he would convince her she had Beauty enough to fire a Gentleman's Heart: adding other juvenile Discourse fitter to be imagined than expressed: as he said this, he often looked towards the Queen, and then turned to the English Gentleman. The Queen who had her Eyes fixed upon these Gentlemen, much more than upon the Embassadors, when the Audience was over, sent for the English Gentleman, and commanded him, upon Pain of her Displeasure, to tell her what the Dutchman had said to him: being assured by their Motions and Behaviour, that they spoke of her. The Gentleman excused himself a long time, pretending they were trifles not worthy to be told her Majesty: but at length the Queen pressing him exceedingly, he was forced to tell her ingenuously the whole Truth, and to confess the violent Passion the Hollander had expressed for her Royal Person. The Conclusion of the matter was, that the Embassadors were presented each with a Chain of Gold of 800 Crowns, and their chief attendants with one of 100 Crowns each: but the Hollander, who found the Queen so handsome, had a Chain of 1600 Crowns, that is, double to what the Embassadors had, and he wore it about his Neck all his Life after. Mr Fontenelle has inserted this artfully, according to his Custom, in his Dialogues of the Dead (6).

[E] The Queen's Resentment against Buzenwall. Du Maurier has heard his Father say, That she was implacable against all those who frowned the least Contempt of her Person: upon which he told this Story. One des Combes, a Frenchman, informed the Queen, that, being at Mr du Plessis Mornay's Table during the Siege of Paris, Mr Buzenwall, who had resided at London for the King, mimicked the Queen, and said she spoke French very disagreeably, repeating often with a long and ridiculous accent, paar Dieu, paar maa foy. The Queen kept this in her Mind, to be revenged both of the Author of the Raillery, and of him who had suffered her to be publicly rallied: for a little after Mr du Plessis being sent Embassador-Extraordinary into England, to beg assistance against the League, met with a very cold Reception, and could obtain nothing: upon which my Father being dispatched to the Earl of Essex at Dover, to see if there was any room to hope, he answered him, that there was some unhappy secret in the affair, that he had never seen the Queen before so alienated from the Interest of France. So that to appease the Queen, Henry IV sent extraordinarily into England the Viscount de Turenne, afterwards Duke de Bouillon, followed by Mr de Buzenwall, who was to be left Embassador in ordinary to the Queen. As for the Viscount, he was very well received, but she would not see Mr de Buzenwall; and when Mr de Turenne told her he had orders from the King to leave him there, she told him positively she would have nothing to do with him: and the Viscount knew from some Englishmen that this aversion arose from the Stories he had made of the Queen at the Siege of Paris. This Mr de Buzenwall, as able a Man as he was, committed a very great fault, to ridicule in public so powerful a Princess, whose aid the King stood in such want of at his coming to the Crown: also he did himself a great injury, as well as his Master; which proves that the Great are always to be spoken of with respect (7).

[F] She was in suspense between the two Religions, but at length she chose the Reformed. Without all doubt, if things had been equal on one side and the other, she would have preferred the Protestant Religion to the Roman Catholic; for she was educated in the former. But I believe also, that to avoid the hazards, which an overthrow of the Religion she found established must present to her view, she would have preserved the Romish Religion, if she had found it to be her Interest. The hard usage she received from the Pope (8), forced her into the Arms of the Protestant Party. She saw clearly, that if she had continued a Catholic, she must have acknowledged, either that her Crown was owing to an undoubted Usurpation, or to the Condescension of the Court of Rome, which would have exposed her to continual Contests. Being a Catholic, she must have confessed that her Father's divorce from Catharine of Arragon was null, and that therefore Anne Boleyn could be only Henry the Eighth's Concubine. Now in Hereditary Monarchies, a Bastard cannot exclude the legitimate Heir, without destroying a Fundamental Law, and consequently without becoming an Usurper. Therefore there was a necessity for Elizabeth to abandon the Church of Rome, that she might maintain that the Court of Rome was in the wrong to condemn the Marriage of Anne Boleyn. But besides this, she was of too penetrating an understanding not to see the general Situation of affairs, that, by immediately declaring against the Pope, she should fix all the Protestant Powers of Europe in her Interest, and by this means cherish a Civil-War as long as she pleased among her Neighbours. Mezeray observes, that the Court of France put the Pope in an ill humour with Elizabeth (9), because the exclusion of that Princess might secure the Kingdom of England to Mary Stuart Queen of Scotland, Wife to the Dauphin. The Design was good, but France was then unlucky.

[G] She would never have sat upon the Throne, if the King of Spain had not had much more hatred against France, than Zeal for the Catholic Religion. One of the principle means which God made use of to establish the Protestant Religion, and which he still employs to make it flourish is the natural jealousy of France, and the House of Austria. These two Powers have each in their turn rather chose to act for the benefit of the Protestants, in order to ruin their rival, than to suffer their Rival to aggrandize himself by the ruin of the Protestants. Philip II gave an eminent instance of this strange jealousy. The Queen of England, his Con-

(3) Reidanus, Annal. lib. 6, pag. 135, at the Year 1587.

(4) Du Maurier, Memoirs for a History of Holland, pag. 254, Paris Edition, 1680.

(5) This Queen shining with a thousand heroic Qualities had yet the Weakness to desire to be thought beautiful by every body; and I have heard my Father say, that having been sent to her, at every Audience, which he had, she would pull off her Gloves a hundred times, that he might see her Hands, which were indeed very fine and white. Du Maurier, pag. 256. See Remark [P].

(6) First Part, pag. m. 82.

(7) Du Maurier, ibid. pag. 256, and following.

(8) He sent her Word, that she was a Bastard, and that he would revoke none of his Predecessor's Bulls: that she was guilty of great Presumption in mounting the Throne, and must hope for no Favours if she did not renounce her Pretensions, and refer herself entirely to the Decision of the Holy See. Leti, Hist. of Elizabeth, Tom. I, pag. 215, at the Year 1558.

(9) The King, whose Interest it was not to let Elizabeth enjoy a Crown he believed did belong to the Wife of his Son, the Dauphin, caused the Pope to give an ill Reception to the Queen's Envoy, and treated her as illegitimate. Mezeray, Abrégé Chron. l. 8. Tom. IV, pag. 214, at the Year 1553.

cumstance sufficient to destroy the Charge of Ingratitude that is brought against her [H]. It is a little unhappy that she may justly be reproached with violating the Promises she made upon her succeeding her Sister (c). She had engaged to maintain the Roman Catholic Religion, which was the established Religion, and yet she abolished it soon after.

(c) See her History by Leti, Tom. I, pag. 331, and following.

(10) Memoirs of Holland, in the Preface. Mr. B. Bun, Fellow of the Royal Society, in his Character of Queen Elizabeth, translated into French, and printed at the Hague, in 1694, owns, pag. 21, that the same State-Jealousy hindered Philip from consenting to the Death of Elizabeth.

fort, foreseeing that the Catholic Religion would not be continued in her Kingdom, if her Sister succeeded her, would have put her to Death: but Philip, foreseeing another evil much more considerable to him than the destruction of the Catholic Religion, if Elizabeth did not succeed to the Crown, preserved her safe from all mischief. Let us see what Mr. du Maurier says of it (10). 'Religion is often sacrificed to Interest, and reason of State: witness what the same Queen Elizabeth formerly told my Father, that she owed her Life to King Philip II her Brother-in-law, though the greatest of her Enemies; therefore she put up his Picture at the side of her Bed, and shewed him to every Body as her preserver. Indeed he prevented her Sister Mary from putting her to Death: for Queen Mary, who was second Wife to King Philip, and a zealous Catholic, being very infirm, justly feared that Elizabeth her Sister, who was a Huguenot, whenever she succeeded her, would one day banish the Catholic Religion out of England, as it afterwards happened: and therefore she pressed the King her Husband to take off her Head, whilst she was yet a Prisoner in the Tower of London. But King Philip vehemently opposed it, lest Mary Stuart, who was Heir after Elizabeth, and who had married Francis II, should succeed to the Crown of Great-Britain: and joining it to France, as would most certainly be done if she had Children, by the Union of so many Kingdoms, a formidable Power might be created, which should be able to blast his vast Designs of an universal Monarchy.' As the Author wrote this during the War, which ended in the Treaty of Nimeguen in the Year 1678, he did not fail to reproach the Spaniards with doing the very same thing they had found so much fault with: They were in alliance with Holland, and they had published an infinite number of Books against the Alliances of France with the same Republic, and with the Swedes; upon which he adds these memorable Words: 'So that every body must perceive, that Interest alone governs the World, and a certain great Commander had reason enough to say, that the People were governed by Princes, and Princes themselves by Interest: which is so true, that oftentimes what is most sacred among Men is sacrificed to this Interest: and most Sovereigns observe the Rules of Justice and Religion no farther than they are consistent with this unlucky Interest.' This is an admirable Confirmation of what I have said elsewhere (11) of the Religion of a Sovereign. To conclude, England was far from continuing in the Romish Religion, since on one side the King of Spain prevented the Death of Elizabeth, and on the other the King of France would not suffer that Princess to be treated at the Court of Rome in such a manner as might encourage her to persevere in the Catholic Religion (12).

(11) Remark [H] of the Article AGESILAUS II, and Remark [C] of the Article ARISTIDES.

(12) See before, Citat. (9), out of Mezerai.

(13) It was Robert Parsons, Sec. of the Algambe, pag. 415.

(14) Andreas Philopetrus Respond. ad Edictum Regine Angliæ, pag. m. 88, 89.

(15) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(16) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(17) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(18) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(19) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

withstanding their watchfulness, she formed an Intrigue, by which it was agreed that Thomas Stafford, who was fled into France, should return to England, assume the Title of King, and marry her. Accordingly he landed in the Month of April 1557, and seized a maritime Town, but was soon after taken, and executed with some others of his Party. This affair brought Elizabeth into the utmost danger, and she would certainly have suffered Death for it, if the King of Spain's Protection had not extricated her out of this difficulty (16). I shall not examine the Truth or Falseness of these three Plots, the Discussion of which may be seen in the British Histories. I shall only observe that the Charge of Ingratitude founded upon these three services of King Philip II is not a just one; for besides that from the time that Elizabeth ascended the Throne to the Proclamation in the Year 1591, Philip's Conduct justified the Complaints Elizabeth made, which are condemned by the pretended Philopetrus, he deserved no thanks for preserving the Life of that Princess: he did not do it for her sake, but only for his Interest; and found his own reward abundantly and sufficiently in the preservation of Elizabeth's Life. It was not a principle of Clemency which prompted him to behave in such a manner, but a principle of Maliginity against France, or at least a political Prudence necessary to his ambition. When a benefit springs from such an Original, those who complain that it is not gratefully acknowledged, should be referred to one of the Fables of Phædrus (17). It ought also to be considered that Gratitude among Princes is not subject to the same Laws with the Gratitude of private Persons towards one another. Lewis XII has been much applauded for saying that the King of France ought not to revenge the Injuries done to the Duke of Orleans. He might almost with as much reason have said, that the King of France was not obliged to acknowledge the services done to the Duke of Orleans. Do you think that a Duke of Orleans, who should ascend the Throne by a Civil-War, in which he owes his success to the powerful assistance of a neighbouring Prince, would be obliged to confederate himself with that Prince, or not to join with the Enemies of that Prince? Will he not be ungrateful if he does not espouse the Interest of this Benefactor? Will he not be much more so, if he should espouse the Interest of the Princes that shall attack his Benefactor? There is but one point to be known in order to resolve these Questions. Is it the Interest of the State, of which our Duke of Orleans is now become the Head, that the neighbouring Prince, who has so much assisted him, should not augment his Power, but should lose even part of those Conquests which render him so formidable to his neighbours? In that Case, he ought to forget the benefits he has received, and say it does not become the King of France to requite the Obligations of the Duke of Orleans: he ought not to join through Gratitude with that Prince, attacking or attacked; and he ought even sometimes to join with those who declare War against him. Such is the Law of Politics, such is the Law of State; and it was by virtue of that State-Law, that Elizabeth did well in traversing the designs of Philip II. The United Provinces had the utmost Obligations to this Queen, and to Henry IV, the two firm supports of their growing Liberties. Nevertheless, if the Interest of the State had required that they should have weakened the Power of the English, or the Power of the French, they ought to have concurred with the Enemies of those two Nations, and there is great reason to think they would have done it. To know how these Politics agree with the eternal Laws of Morality, and how such an Opposition between the Duty of Princes, and the Duty of private Persons, is no breach in the unchangeable certainty of the Ideas of Honesty and Virtue, is another Question. It is sufficient to say, that such is the nature of Societies, that the public Interest is like the Sun, with respect to a great many Virtues. Which Virtues are like Stars that vanish, and disappear at the Presence of this Interest. Salus populi suprema lex esto. Naudé touches a little upon this in his Coups d'Etat.

(17) Fæderes si causa mea Gratum esset . . . Nunc quia laboris ut fruaris relinquit Quas sunt solus, simul et ipios devotes Noli impetere vnum beneficium nihili Phædri F. fab. xxiij. lib. i.

(18) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(19) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(20) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(21) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(22) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(23) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(24) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(26) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(27) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(28) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

(29) Id. ibid. pag. 97, 98.

[1] This after. Perhaps this Conduct was a great Service to the Protestant Religion in the famous Revolution of 1688 [I]. It is impossible to say what vile Calumnies were spread abroad concerning this Queen [K]; which were not to be avoided considering the Severity she was forced, by Reasons of State, to use towards Papists. Some lost their Lives, a great number of others either suffered the Rigours of Imprisonment, or the Inconveniences of Exile [L]; and those were the Men who chiefly composed injurious Libels against the Reputation of Elizabeth. They made her a Monster of Cruelty, Avarice, and Lust. There are few Protestant Authors who do not extol this Princess's Chastity to the Skies; and there are some Memoirs which affirm she could not have run the Risque of being got with Child without the utmost Hazard of her Life [M].

A modern

[I] This Conduct was perhaps a very great service to the Protestant Religion in the Revolution in 1688. A solemn promise made to a whole People, and confirmed by Oath, is a Barrier which cannot be broke through without exposing one's Reputation. Therefore there is reason to think that a Prince bound by such a promise will keep it, if it be only to secure his Honour: but if it is seen, that, in certain Cases, by a special Privilege in matters of Religion, a great Queen has failed in a promise of this nature, and yet passed for a Heroine, and for the wonder of her Age, People durst no longer depend upon the good Effects which the Fear of incurring blame by falsifying an Oath is capable of producing. Thus the English were persuaded that James II would not be afraid of the ill Consequences of a breach of his word in matters of Religion, and that he would hope his Memory would suffer no greater prejudice than Queen Elizabeth's, whose Footsteps he should only follow. Therefore having no reason to rely upon his Oath, they took care betimes to prevent him from imitating their Heroine. In this manner there are things which are useful many ways, both for the present, and for the future. In general, we may be assured there is nothing that has not its use in a State (18).

[K] The vilest Calumnies were spread abroad of this Queen. Mr Bobun complains particularly of four Authors, who are Sanders, Florimond de Raimond, George Cane, and the anonymous Author that published the Didymus Veridicus. He says (19) that Sanders, 'not content with diffaming Anne Boleyn . . . would also calumniate and dishonour Elizabeth. For this purpose he invented the most scandalous Stories, and the most infamous Satires against her, and her Ministers, endeavouring to make the World to believe that she was guilty of Rapine, Incontinency, vile Debauchery, Frauds, and horrible Falsehoods, in order to ruin the English Nation.' The Author of Didymus Veridicus (20) undertook 'to pollute the Ear by the leudest Discourses, and to destroy the Reputation of the most celebrated Princess in the World . . . he invented abundance of lies, and absurd and incredible things, which were like the Images and Fancies of Poets and Painters.' Mr Bobun's Observation, concerning the Penalties which were inflicted on these Libels, must not be forgotten. 'The rage, says he (21), and impudence of the Writers of these scandalous Pieces made the Queen treat with great severity all those who composed Libels or Verses to blacken the Reputation of others; she forbid them to be dispersed, or even read, and ordered them to be burnt by the common Hangman. Her rigour extended to those, who secretly spread any false reports to the prejudice or dishonour of the Government, least her People by these means should be excited to Commotions and Rebellions.' I do not find he has taken notice of a Reproach they cast upon that Queen, viz. that she only was a Protestant in outward Appearance. They maintain not only that she confessed to the Sieur de Lansac that she was persuaded of the Pope's Primacy (22), and to the Spanish Ambassador that she believed the real presence (23); but they say also that she drove away the Bishops who came to see her in her last Sickness. 'Denique aversionem ejus à tota reformatione & grege Ministrorum, horror quem erga Pseudo-Episcopos in supremo morbo ad se accedentes præ se tulit, adeo eos Presbyteros de sepibus (phrasia ea est Anglorum erga mendicos & meretrices, victu testoque carentes) vocatos ab aspectu suo facessere jussit, luculenter demonstrat (24). — Lastly, her Aversion to all Reformation and Reformers is most clearly demonstrated by that horror, which she expressed in her last illness towards those Mock-Bishops, that came to her, calling them HEDGE Presbyters, (a phrase in England applied to Beggars and Whores who have neither Habitation nor Subsistence) and charged them directly to quit her presence.'

[L] A great number of others suffered either the Rigours of Imprisonment, or the Inconveniences of Exile. The Protestants of England confess it; they do not deny the Fact (25); but they maintain, that the wicked Attempts of the Papists against the Government, and against the Queen, deserved such a Punishment. You will be sure not to find this Observation in the Libels of the English Roman Catholics. You will indeed find the Punishments, with all the rhetorical Flourishes that can amplify them, but not a Word of the seditious Enterprizes which preceded, and were the Cause of them. There are few Relations in which the order of the Events is not confounded. This Confusion is not always produced by Fraud: a too turbulent Zeal is sometimes the Cause of it; Nature does the rest without designed Malice. The Constitution of Man is such, that he imagines the Evils he suffers to be great, and those he does not to be small. He perceives not these, but is sensible of the other; and even when he knows he has been the Aggressor, he pretends to have cause of Complaint, he makes no account of what he has done, only of what he suffers. An ill-conducted Zeal fixes the Mind upon the Hardships of persecuted Virtue, and causes the Provocations of the Persecutors to be forgotten. If these two Causes are not sufficient, Dishonesty, which alone would disorder the Events, compleats the Confusion. However it be, I have observed, that the principal Difference between the Accounts of Catholics and Protestants consists in the Order of the Facts: each Party endeavours to give the first Place to the Injuries they have endured; they make a long Detail of these, and pass over slightly what they have done by way of Reprisals, or what they have suffered as a just Punishment. This is what is pretended. There is nothing that perplexes the Heads of the unprejudiced Readers more than this; for in order to know exactly what is blamable and what is excusable in each Party, it is absolutely necessary to consider the Facts in their true Situation. If the Catholics had not laid violent hands on the Protestants till after they had seen them overturn Temples, Altars, Images, and Crosses, &c. their Cruelties would not have been so criminal. For these Reasons it is necessary to give an Adversary the Precedence in such Cases. A modern Author has declared that he would not examine whose Relations had composed the Events (26). This Discussion in certain cases is not altogether so laborious, but sometimes it would be found so embarrassing, that unless one was assisted by some Revelation, which should act contrary to that of the Apocalypse (27), one would never arrive at the certain Truth.

[M] Some Memoirs affirm, that she could not have run the Risque of being got with Child without the utmost Hazard of her Life. The Historians who give Reasons for her not marrying do not omit this, that Marriage would have been dangerous to her: let us hear Mezerai on account of the Duke d'Alençon. The thing went so far, that the Queen gave him a Ring for a Pledge of her Faith: but the contrary Intrigues in opposition to this Alliance, and her Women, who knew the danger she be would in if she had Children, made such an Outcry, and filled their Mistress's Head with so much Clamour, that she demanded it back again (28). The Abbot Sir says, that she commanded her Officers not to let any body touch her Body, or see her naked, after her Death,

(25) See Bobun, Character of Elizabeth, pag. 411.

(26) See the 5^e Letter of la Critique Générale de Malmbourg.

(27) This is easily said upon Supposition, as Mr Jarvis has done, that the Holy Ghost had left those things in Confusion which he, Mr Jarvis, had put into Order. See here Part of the Title of the twelfth Chapter of his Accomplishment of the Apocalypse, Part II.

(28) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. V, par. 253, at the Year 1581.

(18) See, before, the Article DOLABELLA (PUBL. CORNEL.) in the Text, Citat. (1).

(19) Bobun, Caractère de la Reine Elizabeth, pag. 412.

(20) Idem pag. 414.

(21) Idem. pag. 417.

(22) Person. in Resp. ad Coquum, cap. 15, pag. 363, 364, apud Henricum Fitz Simon in Britannomachia Ministorum, lib. 3, cap. 5, pag. 318.

(23) Comiti (postea Duci) Ferre realemi Christi præsentiam esse juravit: quod ejusdem Ducis testantur ad Regem Literæ (Novemb. 16, anni 1558) in Archivis Cymance in Hispania conservate. Id. ibid.

(24) Id. Fitz Simon, ibid. He quotes Discessit, Personi, cap. 2, from pag. 216 to 220.

A modern Writer of the Reformed Religion has made her Chastity a Problem [N]. It is much easier to vindicate her Honour in this Respect, and in the Acts against Papists, than with regard to the unhappy Queen of Scotland [O]; and yet she cannot justly be intitled to the Praise, which the Roman Historian bestows upon Agrippina, of having freed herself from the Weaknesses of her own Sex by an Application to manly Business [P]. Pope Sixtus had a particular Esteem for (29) Journal des Savans de September 6, 1677, pag. 282, in the Extract of Memoire recondit di Vittorio Siri.

Elizabeth

(30) Leti, Hist. d' Elizabeth, Tom. II, pag. 513. See also pag. 220, and following, where he relates several Passages and merry sayings concerning the Gallineries of this Queen.

(31) Jerem. xlii, 23.

(32) Bohun, Character of Queen Elizabeth, pag. 404.

(33) See the Remark [D].

(34) Tacit. Annal. lib. 6, cap. 25.

for Reasons which are not hard to be apprehended by those who know the History of this Princess (29). See the Remark [X] towards the end.

[N] A modern Protestant Writer has made her Chastity a Problem. This Modern is Mr Leti, whose Words are (30), 'I know not whether she was as chaste as is reported; for, in short, she was a Queen, handsome, young, full of Wit; she loved fine Cloaths, Diversions, Balls, Pleasure, and to have her Favourites of the best made Men in the Kingdom. This is all I can tell the Reader.' It is certain one ought to have a great deal of Charity, or a great deal of Caution, to suspect nothing impure in the Conduct of a young Queen, who always had some Favourite, and always chose them among the bravest, youngest, and handsomest Lords of her Kingdom. If Elizabeth in this Behaviour preserved a perfect Continence, as I am willing to believe, she acted quite contrary to that Maxim, si non castè, saltem cautè. She is not to be commended for her Circumspection; for she took no care to save Appearances: she preserved her real Chastity, and delivered up the Out-works to the Censures and Suspicions of the World, contenting herself with keeping the Body of the Place.

[O] It is much easier to defend her Honour in this respect, than with regard to the unhappy Queen of Scotland. There is, without doubt, great Excess and Insincerity in the Elogies and Apologies for this Queen: but the Faults she might have committed do not excuse Elizabeth, who put her to death. They have published a hundred Apologies for this Action; for what is there so execrable which some mercenary Pens will justify, who without going out of their Polyanthes find Instances of the thing in Question? The best is, that after having read these Apologies with some sort of Temptation to approve them, one perceives right Reason regain its Empire, and dissipate all the Charms of the rhetorical Apologist. The Proverb of the Scriptures, Can the Ethiopian change his Skin, or the Leopard his Spots (31), agrees admirably well with those who have undertook to justify Elizabeth upon the Execution of the Queen, who fled to her for Refuge. Ethiopem lavas, may be said to each of them. It must be so, since Mr Bohun, the great Panegyrist of this Queen, condemns her, upon this Article, absolutely, and without Mercy. 'The worst Action of all her Reign, says he (32), was her Treatment of Mary of Scotland. This Queen having been expelled by her Subjects, and deprived not only of her Royal Authority, but also her Liberty, her Estate, and her Crown, came distressed and desolate into England upon Elizabeth's Royal Word. At first she received her very well, and ordered her to be treated as a Queen; but afterwards detained her as a Prisoner, and, under Pretence that Mary formed Designs against her Life, had her tried, condemned, and at last executed, and thereby made her a sad and unheard of Example of her cruel and unjust Severity. She polluted, if I may so say, her Reign, by this shedding of innocent Blood, not of an Enemy, but of a Princess, to whom she had given Sanctuary, and whom she had received into her Kingdom.'

[P] She cannot justly be intitled to the Praise . . . of having freed herself from the Weaknesses of her Sex by an Application to manly Business. Her passionate Desire to be thought handsome, the Care she took to shew her Beauty, and the Complaisance she expressed to those who were sensibly touched with her Charms (33), are undeniably a female Foible, which Agrippina had not; for if that Roman Lady had had those Infirmities, they could not have truly said, sed Agrippina equi impatiens, dominandi avida, virilibus curis feminarum vitia exuerat (34). She would still have less deserved that great Encomium, if she had bestowed such Careless upon young Men as Elizabeth did lavishly upon them. Let us produce an Author who relates what he saw and heard himself. He says, the Ceremony of creating the Lord Robert Earl of Leicester, and Baron of Denbigh, was performed at Westminster, with a great deal of Solemnity, the Queen herself assisting at the Ceremonial. He was upon his Knees before her, with the greatest Gravity, whilst the Queen could not forbear to make him an hundred Careless; sometimes pinching him softly, sometimes laying her Hand on his Head and Shoulders, though the Ambassador of France and myself were present (35). He that speaks in this manner was Mary Stuart Queen of Scotland's Envoy at the Court of Queen Elizabeth. The Queen, my Mistress, says he (36), knowing Queen Elizabeth's Humour, commanded me not to be too much upon the Reserve with her, and, that my Conversation might not be tiresome to her, to be sometimes upon the diverting strain; wherefore one time giving her an account of the different Modes and Customs of foreign Countries, I even mentioned the Womens Buskins. Upon which she told me she had the Dress of every Country and every Fashion by her, and indeed she took after that every day a different Dress, sometimes after the English, sometimes after the French, and sometimes after the Italian Mode, continuing these Changes all the time I staid at London. At last she would know of me which Dress became her best, I answered, in my Opinion the Italian, which Answer did not seem to be displeasing to her; for she loved exceedingly to shew her fair Hair, so that a little Italian Bonnet was what pleased her best. Her Hair was rather of a yellowish Colour than white, but with a beautiful Curl, which in Appearance was natural. She asked me which coloured Hair was reckoned the handsomest, her's or my Queen's? and seeing that I hesitated, she pressed me to declare upon this Point. I told her she was the finest Queen in England, and mine in Scotland (37). But this not satisfying her, I told her, they were both the most charming in their Country, that her Majesty was indeed the fairest, but that my Queen was also very lovely. She would still know which of the two was the tallest, to which I answered, my Queen. Then, says she, she must be too tall, for I am neither too tall nor too short. You see here a Queen of England busying herself with Fashions and Dresses. It does not look like a meer Amusement: one would think she had made this her principal Business, if her Application to the Royal Functions were not well known. But it must be said, the found time for every thing: she applied herself to the Cares of Government with as much Diligence as if she thought of nothing else, and she was as exact in her Dress and Ornaments as if that had been the utmost of her Concern. On the other hand, if her Conversations with the Envoy of Scotland are considered, her Design was not so much to interrogate him, as to make him confess, that she was handsomer than Mary Stuart. One may discern by this, that she looked upon her as a Rival in point of Beauty, and that by the turn she gave her Discourse, she would induce People to give her the Preference over this Rival. This is very consistent with a feminine Spirit and Temper. Every body knows with what Address Women seek for Applause, sometimes despising themselves in order to be contradicted, sometimes by inquiring if it be true that such and such have Beauty, Splendor, an incomparable Shape, &c.

VOL. II.

We may observe a notable Difference between Agrippina and Queen Elizabeth. The latter could not resolve to marry, tho' she saw Men agreeable enough to think them worthy of her Choice: the other seeing herself a Widow, and young, desired Tiberius to give her a Husband, and represented to him that an honest Woman could find no Satisfaction but in her Spouse. At Agrippina pervicax iræ, & morbo corporis implicita, cum viseret eam Cæsar, profusus diu ac per silentium lacrymis, mox invidiam & preces orditur: subveniret solitudini, daret maritum habilem adjuventam sibi, neque aliud probis, quam ex matrimonio solatium (38). — Agrippina being stung with Resentment, and afflicted with Sickness, when Cæsar came to visit her, burst into Tears, and continued for some time without speaking, but (35) James Melvil, Memoirs, Vol. I, pag. 148.

(36) Id. pag. 154, and following.
(37) This was saying nothing; for when there is but one Queen in a Country, she is the fairest Queen there, let her be never so homely. There is a Country Witicism, viz. I am the handsomest at the Table, when some Woman or Girl is the last that remains.
(38) Tacit. Annal. lib. 4, cap. 53.

9 F

(d) See the Character of Queen Elizabeth by Mr. Bohun, printed at the Hague, in Elizabeth [2], and it is even said that he kept a Correspondence with her to the Prejudice of the King of Spain. What Mr. Leti relates of this Affair is not very unlikely [R]. I have said nothing of the Learning of this Queen, which yet deserves Admiration (d). Her Reign, which was crowned with so many Favours of Providence, 1694, pag. 5, & seq. See also the Words of Balzac, Remark [2].

ended

'at length she broke forth into Intreaties, conjuring him to take Compassion on her forlorn Condition; that she was still young, that virtuous Women could have no Comfort but in a married State.' This was speaking sincerely; for it is well known that when a Woman is not honest, she can find sufficiently in an unmarried State wherewith to content Nature. The Envoy of Scotland declared very freely to Queen Elizabeth the reason why he imagined she would not marry. 'I value him as a Brother, says she, speaking of Lord Robert, whom she had made Earl of Leicester, and he is the best Friend I have. So that if I could resolve to marry, it should be with him; but not being able to bring my Humour to it, it would be a great Satisfaction to me to see my Sister choose him for her Spouse, there being no body I could with so heartily to enjoy Part of the Succession with her (39).' The Scots Envoy answered, your Majesty is assured of having no Children, being determined not to marry. 'It is true, said she, I am determined, and will never marry, unless the Queen, my Sister, should force me to it by her Conduct.' I know, Madam, answered I, that you speak sincerely, and it is unnecessary to give me Assurances of it. For you know, being married, you would be only Queen, whereas now you are both King and Queen. I know your great Heart will never suffer a Master (40).

(39) Melvill, Memoirs, Tom. I, pag. 148.

(40) Ibid. 152.

[2] Pope Sixtus had a particular Esteem for Elizabeth. He reckoned her one of the three Persons, who, in his Opinion, were alone worthy of a Crown: the two others were himself and Henry IV. 'Your Queen, said he one day to an English Gentleman, is born happy, she governs her Kingdom with a great deal of Success, she wants only me for her Husband to give the World another Alexander (41).' Mr. Jurieu has expressed this a little more cavalierly. 'This good Pope said, that he would willingly lie only one Night with Elizabeth, Queen of England, being assured they should get another Alexander the Great. This was worthy the Gravity and Chastity of a Pope. . . . It was this same good Pope, that said Elizabeth was happy in striking off a crowned head, and that he envied her Felicity (42).' Balzac, by I know not what Affectation, has given the Pope's Expressions another Dress, which takes away their natural Air. I shall go a little farther back, that it may be seen what Praises that French Writer bestows upon this Queen (43), in a Letter he wrote to a certain Lord (44). 'My Intention, says he to him, was never to touch the true Glory of your Heroine, I have always thought she ought rather to be considered for the Magnanimity of her Soul, the Benefits of which will be enjoyed by your latest Posterity, than by a slight Beauty of her Body, which is not only destroyed by Death, but flies away at the first Approaches of old Age (45). I must come from another World to be ignorant of the Praises she has received from the general Voice of this. I know she has been hailed the Northern Star, the Goddess of the Sea, the true Thetis. I have read these Words, I will be, Madam, your Captain-General, in a Letter written to her by Henry the Great, at the Height of his Difficulties, and under the violent Proceedings of the League; even he, who had excommunicated her, spoke of her with Esteem, and you know he was a Prince of a very great Understanding, and well skilled in the Art of Government. He took a Pleasure to talk of her with the Ambassadors resident at his Court, and sometimes would pleasantly say, that if he had been married to her, Authority and Grandeur would have proceeded from such an illustrious Marriage. But though she had not arrived to this high Degree of Reputation, and tho' they had deprived her of all these glorious Marks of Esteem, yet two Considerations, less specious indeed in the Eyes of the World, but more sensible to my Mind, would have obliged me to revere her Memory, which are, my Lord, that she did not despise our Muses, and that she loved your Family (46). I am informed by Camden, that she was so well

(41) Leti, Hist. d'Elizabeth, Tom. II, p. 137.

(42) Apologie pour la Reformat. Tom. I, pag. m. 153, 154.

(43) In the 10th Letter of the 6th Book, pag. 205, Folio Edition.

(44) To the Earl of Exeter. His Letter is dated June 25, 1634.

(45) If he would justify himself, as it seems from the Passage I have quoted in the Text of this Article, at the end, he does not do it fairly.

(46) The Earl, to whom Balzac writes, was of the Family of the Cecils.

'acquainted with good Learning, that she made a good Latin Translation of some Tragedies of Sophocles, and the Orations of Isocrates. The same Author tells me what share your Ancestors had in her Confidence, &c.'

Note: That Mr. Jurieu ought to cite d'Aubigné for the second Fact; for he read it only in the Catholic Confession of Sanci, and in the same Author's Universal History. The Pope having caused Count de Pepoll's Head to be cut off. . . . (these are the Words of the Sieur d'Aubigné rejoiced, among his intimate Friends, for the Head of a Count; but bearing what had passed in England, he esteemed no body in the World like Queen Elizabeth for Greatness or Felicity, and, as if he had lamented the Conquests of Alexander, said of her: O beata femina, che ai gustato el piacere di far saltare una testa coronata (47).

[R] What Mr. Leti says concerning Pope Sixtus the Fifth's keeping a Correspondence with Elizabeth is not very unlikely. Pope Sixtus V both hated and dreaded the King of Spain: therefore he must naturally wish him ill Success, and rather desire to see Herefy maintained in England than to see Philip II become Master of so good a Country. The Popes, as Sovereign Princes, follow the Principles of the Religion of a Sovereign, and consequently they sacrifice the Catholic Interest to the Interest of their particular Power? What Service would it be to them, for Example, that a King of Spain should subdue the Protestants, if by that means he would become so formidable to the Court of Rome, that they should not dare to refuse any thing to the Spaniards for fear of seeing the Year 1527 return again, and the Imprisonment of Clement VII? It is a less Damage to the Pope not be acknowledged either by Holland, or by England, than to be owned by them, and thereby some Catholic Prince to be in a Condition of obtaining from Rome, by Favour or Force, all his Demands. If this Principle of Speculation is not sufficient to convince us, that Sixtus V did all he could to make the King of Spain's Designs against Elizabeth miscarry, we shall see presently a practical Reason which will make it evident. When Lewis XIV made such great and rapid Conquests upon the United Provinces, in the Year 1672, Cardinal Altieri, who was Pope in effect, although another was called Clement X, received the News with a mortal Concern, because he did not love France, and the Duke d'Etrée, Ambassador from that Crown, took all Opportunities to mortify him (48). Of a later Date we have seen Innocent XI deaf to whatever could favour the Interest of King James, and ardently promoting every thing that was contrary to France (49). Because he feared more the Increase of Lewis the Fourteenth's Power than he desired the Progress of the Catholic Religion. He was afraid of being crushed under the too great Power of that Prince, and therefore he was very glad the Protestants were in a Condition to bridle and reduce it. From hence we may better know the happy Situation of the Affairs of the Protestants, since not only the eternal Jealousy between France and the House of Austria will always procure them Allies, and Protectors in the States of the contrary Religion, but even the Court of Rome, according to the Exigency of Occasion, will do what Sixtus V did to the Prejudice of the King of Spain, and what Innocent XI did to the Prejudice of Lewis XIV. This Court is no less concerned than others to preserve the Balance of Power.

But to what Purpose is it to look for Instances? We need only consider Sixtus himself with respect to Henry the Great. It is certain, that having observed how much the League augmented the Strength of the Spaniards, he shifted Sides, and favoured, in France, the Protestant Party, and if he had not died, he would have done his utmost to have deprived the King of Spain of the Kingdom of Naples (50). He traversed the League so visibly, that the Spaniards threatened to protest against him, and to provide otherwise for the Preservation of the Church, which he abandoned (51). His Death filled the Leaguers with Joy: one of their Preachers (52) giving the Parisians (47) D'Aubigné Hist. Universal. Tom. III, lib. 2, cap. 27, pag. m. 270. See also the Catholic Confession of Sanci, lib. 2, cap. 11.

(48) See a Post intitled, Memoirs of the Court of Rome, from the Year 1669 to 1676, printed at Paris, in 1677, pag. 204, and following.

(49) See Lewis the Fourteenth's Letter to the Cardinal d'Etrée, inserted by Mr. Leti in the 114 Tome of the Universal Monarchy, pag. 436.

(50) See Maimbourg, Hist. of the League, lib. 4, pag. 418.

(51) Ibid.

(52) Aubry, Cap. rate of St. Andrew des Arx.

ended at last in the deepest Melancholy that ever was heard of [8]. Some say, that the Death of the Earl of Essex was the Cause of this cruel Grief [7]. Some Controversialists have published a ridiculous Jest, which has no Appearance of Truth in it (e): they pretend the Marshal de Biron boasted he had seen the Head of the Reformed Church dancing. They should have fathered this upon some other Ambassador; for Elizabeth was no longer of an Age to dance (f) when Henry IV sent the Marshal Biron to her. If Balzac had taken notice of the old Age of this Queen (g), he would have been far from saying, She was so charming, that the Earl of Essex chose rather to die than to ask his Life of her, that he might not be still importuned by her Love and Caresses (b). There is more than one Incongruity in these Words. Moreri's Mistakes will be seen in the Remark [U].

(g) The Earl of Essex was executed in 1601, and the Queen was born in 1533. (b) Balzac in his Prince, n. 62. Note, he speaks ironically, and to confute the Poets who had preferred the Beauty of that Queen to the Beauty of Helen. A pitiful Confutation!

Pope

notice of it made use of these Words. God has delivered us from a wicked and politic Pope: if he had lived longer People would have been astonished to have heard the Pope preached against in Paris, but it must have been done (53). It was not because he was sensible of the great Merit of Henry IV, and the Knave-ries of the League (54), that this Pope took Measures contrary to the Catholic Religion; but because the Heretics Success was so much Damage to the King of Spain, whom he hated.

[S] Her Reign . . . ended in the deepest Melancholy that ever was heard of.] Mr Silbon furnishes me with a Commentary on these Words: "Who would have thought, says he (55), that the Course of such a Reign, and such a Life (56), should have terminated in a Satiety of Life and Government . . . and that there should have been such a Precipice at the end of so fine a Career?" After which he gives the Substance of a Relation which History, says he, has not taken notice of; and which is contained in a Letter that a Gentleman belonging to the French Ambassador at the English Court wrote to his Friend at Paris. As this Letter is in print, I chose rather to take out of it what is to my Purpose, than use Mr Silbon's Words: "I must tell you, Sir, that the common Opinion of her Physicians, and of those who waited on her in her Chamber, is, that her Distemper proceeds from Grief, which she secretly entertained some days before she made any Complaint, and they ground their Opinion on there being no Sign of any mortal Disorder upon her, besides that of Age, having always had her Urine, her Pulse, and her Eyes good to the last. And especially that in all the Course of her Sickness she never would take any Remedy that was prescribed to her, notwithstanding the Entreaties, and Threats of Death, which her Servants and Physicians made to her. As if the Apprehension of being despised for her Age, or some other secret Uneasiness, which they impute to her Grief for the Death of the late Earl of Essex (57), made her desire and seek it of herself. However it be, the Truth is, that as soon as she found herself sick, she said she should die. She made no Will, nor declared her Successor, nor did she take to her Bed but three Days before her Death, having been sitting above fifteen Days upon Cushions, dressed, with her Eyes fixed on the Ground, without seeing or speaking to any body. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of England, the Bishop of London, and her Almoner, assisted her at her Death, when she gave many Signs of great Devotion and Thankfulness to God (58)." This Account is very different from Mr Leti's Narrative; according to which the Queen was seven Weeks without being sensible, and in a continual Delirium, which was caused by her Fever, and which ceased three Days before she died (59). According to the Abbot Sir's Memoirs, "The Queen, sitting upon her Bed, all dressed, keeping her Eyes upon the Ground, and her Finger in her Mouth, which was the Posture she would die in, ordered the usual Music to be admitted, which she heard with great Tranquillity, even to the last gasp of Life, in order to die, says this Author, agreeably, come era vissuta allegrementi — as she had lived merrily (60)." I wonder they did not let her the last Words of Augustus (61).

[T] Some pretend, that the Death of the Earl of Essex was the Cause of this cruel Grief.] After the Earl's Execution the Queen was a long time as gay as usual, which she shewed particularly during the Embassy of the Marshal de Biron. Therefore it is likely, if she died of Grief upon the Earl of Essex's Account, it was not because she had put him to death, but because she was informed that he had implored her Mercy, in a way which she had promised him should never fail of Success. Mr du Maurier will explain this Mytery to us. "It will not be needless, says he (62), nor unpleasant to add here what the said Prince Maurice had from Mr Carleton the English Ambassador in Holland, who died Secretary of State, so well known by the Name of Lord Dorchester, a Man of very great Merit, that Queen Elizabeth in the Height of her Passion for the Earl of Essex gave him a Ring, bidding him keep it safely, and that upon sending it to her, she would pardon him let his Crime be what it would. Afterwards the Earl's Enemies prevailing with the Queen, and besides being enraged at the Contempt he had thrown on her Beauty which was ruined by Age; she ordered him to be brought to his Trial, and after his Condemnation, expected continually that he should send the Ring to her, that she might pardon him according to her Promise. The Earl in the last Extremity had Recourse to the Wife of Admiral Howard, his Kinswoman, and intreated her, by a Person he could trust, to give the Ring into the Queen's own Hands. But her Husband, who was an utter Enemy to the Earl, to whom she had imprudently discovered the thing, preventing her from discharging her Commission, the Queen consented to his Death, enraged at his proud and haughty Spirit, that chose rather to die than fly to her Clemency. Some time after the Admiral's Lady falling sick, and being given over by her Physicians, sent the Queen word, that she had an Affair of great Consequence to communicate to her before she died. Her Majesty being at her Bed's side, when the rest of the Company were withdrawn, she unseasonably gave her that Ring from the Earl of Essex, excusing herself that she could not put it sooner into her Hands, her Husband having prevented her. The Queen was struck with a mortal Grief, and retired immediately. For fifteen Days together she did nothing but sigh, without taking any thing at all, lying down in her Cloaths, and rising a hundred times in the Night. At length she died of Hunger and Grief together, for having given her Consent to the Death of her Lover, who had thrown himself upon her Mercy."

[U] These are Moreri's Mistakes.] I. He ought not to have said, that Elizabeth left in the Church the Names of Bishops, Canons, Curates, &c. The Bishops of the Church of England are not Titular Bishops; they actually execute the Episcopal Functions, and have over the Curates the same Hierarchical Pre-eminences as the Romish Bishops. II. He should not have several times exaggerated the Persecutions of the Roman Catholics, without mentioning the Acts of Rebellion which exposed them to that Storm. A faithful Historian ought first to have observed their Plots against the Queen's Government, and then the severe Punishment she inflicted for those Plots. The Transposition of these two things would be great Unfaithfulness in an Historian (63): he could not, without Perfidiousness, make the Punishments go before, when there was a Train of Plots. What Name then shall be given to Moreri's Conduct, who suppresses entirely those Plots? Such an Omission is not barely a Fault, but a Crime, which the Latins would call felis, or at least flagitium. I consider Moreri

(e) See Olander in Grotium de Jure Belli & Pacis, pag. 465.

(f) Some Historians say she danced. Others only that she played on the Spinnet. See Remark [C] of the Article GON-TAULT (C. ARLES DE).

(62) Du Maurier, Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire de Hollande, pag. 260.

(63) See, above, Rem. [L].

(53) Maimbourg, History of the League, lib. 4, pag. 429.

(54) Maimbourg, ib. p. 427, alleges these Reasons, but is very much out.

(55) Silhon, Ministre d'Etat, Part. III, cap. 7, pag. m. 112.

(56) He had just made the Elogium of Queen Elizabeth.

(57) See the following Remark.

(58) These Words are taken from a Letter inserted in the Sequel of Memoires d'Etat, printed at Paris, in 8vo, 1623. The Letter I speak of is in pag. 276 of the Third Volume, and is dated, London, April 3, 1603.

(59) Life of Elizabeth, Tom. II, pag. 532.

(60) In the Journal des Savans, Sept. 6, 1677, pag. 282.

(61) Amicos admiros percontatus, equid ut videretur mimum vite commode transigisse, adjectis & clausulam, &c. He enquired of his Friends who were admitted to see him, whether they thought, that he had acquired himself well in his Post, then subjoined this Clause, &c. Sueton, in Augusto, cap. C.

Pope Clement VIII said some very disobliging things of this Queen, which shew that he was ill informed of the State of England [X].

veri here only as an Author, and if I accuse him of a Crime, I mean only a Crime in point of History. III. The greatest Crime they charged upon the Queen of Scotland, says he, was her having endeavoured to make her Escape out of her Prison. He is mistaken, they charged her with more enormous Crimes. If he had said it was the greatest Crime they could justly charge her with, he might have secured his Retreat, and disputed the Ground by the contrary Accounts the two Parties published; but it is a Question of a Fact, which is incontestably determined in three Words, to know what the Judges went upon. It is but to read the Trial. Neither Moreri nor his Adherents can contradict this, nor alledge one Word for their Justification. IV. It is not true that Henry III heard with Displeasure of the Death of Mary, nor that he sent Bellievre to save the Life of that unhappy Queen. The Embassy of Bellievre was a meer Farce. The Leaguers reproached Henry III with pushing on to the utmost the Destruction of Mary Stuart (64). Mr du Maurier has revealed that Mystery (65). V. Virginia is not an Island. VI. Elizabeth did not die the fourth of April, but the third. VII. It is false that the fourth of April, New Style, is the Twenty fourth of March, Old Style. VIII. Queen Elizabeth's Reign continued Forty four Years and some Months: therefore he ought not to say she died after a Reign of Thirty five Years. But what is strange is, that he allows but Thirty five Years to a Reign which he makes to begin in November, 1558, and end in April 1603. The Knowledge of the Mathematics was not the chief of this Prince's Acquirements in the Sciences, as Moreri assures us (66). Neither do I find that Mr Boban, who gives an exact Account of the Sciences she had learned, ever makes her to have handled Euclid's Elements (67). This then is Moreri's ninth Error.

[X] Pope Clement VIII said some very disobliging things . . . and which shewed he was not well informed of the State of England. Cardinal d'Osset, in a Letter from Rome, of the first of February 1595, writes in this manner: 'The Pope answered me . . . That England had formerly been conquered, and might be so again; that it was little united in itself, because of the Diversity of Religions, and governed by an old Woman, without a Husband, or a certain Successor: that she must have pretty well drained her Exchequer by the Expences she had been at; that besides he had observed, that Women who had reigned long, and loved Pleasure in the Youth and Vigour of their Age, became afterwards, in their old Age, despised by those to whom they had given themselves up: and he mentioned to me two Queens of Sicily, who, he said, had lived in the same manner: one of which, in her old Age, suffered herself to be boxed by one she had entertained in her Youth: that he believed this Queen also would be for the future little valued by those who had formerly loved and esteemed her: that he and I were not so old, but, all these things being considered, he hoped we might see her one day subdued (68). Mr Amelot de la Houssaye makes three Remarks upon this. In the first he says: 'Surely Clement VIII was ill informed of the State of England, which was never more flourishing, or more powerful, both by Sea and Land, than in Elizabeth's Reign: and Sixtus V, his Predecessor, had quite another Opinion of this Queen, of whom he would say upon all Occasions, Ch'era un gran Cervello di principessa. She had a very good Head.' His second Remark is, 'Joan II, Queen of Naples and Sicily, suffered herself to be beat by the Seneschal, Giovanni Carracciolo, her Gallant; but at last she grew weary of him, and got him assassinated, with which these Royal Amours usually end.' Let us hear his third Remark. 'I know not whether all be true that is said or written of Queen Elizabeth's Amours and Lovers; but it is certain, she had no Vulva, and the same Reason, which hindered her from marrying, ought also to hinder her loving Coition. She might love, and in truth she did passionately love the Earl of Essex, but such was the make of her Body, that she could not be carnally known of any Man without suffering excessive Pains; nor become big with Child (69), without exposing herself inevitably to lose her Life in the birth of the Child. And she was so well perswaded of it, that one Day when she was earnestly pressed to marry the Duke of Alençon, who passionately solicited her, she answered, that she did not think she had been so ill beloved by her Subjects, that they would bury her before her time.'

(68) Lettres d'Osset, Tom. I. pag. 339.

(69) See, above, Rem. [84].

(64) See Lewis d'Orleans, in his Catholique Anglois, and Jacques le Bossu, pag. 43, of the first Dialogue.

(65) In the Preface of his Memoirs. See the Critique Générale de Maimbourg, Lettre II.

(66) She had an excellent Knowledge of all the Sciences, and especially the Mathematics. Moreri, Tom. I, pag. 1092.

(67) Character of Queen Elizabeth, pag. 32 and following.

(a) That is our Year 1113.

(b) He was their Secretary. Ipso velut Notario usi fuere ad secretiora consilia. Goilius Pref. Hist. Saraceni.

(1) About the Year of the Hegira 569, which answers to the Year of our Lord 1173.

ELMACIN (GEORGE), Author of a History of the Saracens, or rather of a Chronology of the Mabometan Empire, was born in Egypt, about the beginning of the XIIIth Century. I shall speak of his Family [A]. He has carried his Work from Mabomet to the Caliph Mustapha Billa, who died in the Year of the Hegira 512 (a). He relates, Year by Year, but in few Words, what concerns the Saracen Empire, and intermixes some small Part of the History of the Christians of the East. He confines himself chiefly to Arabia, Syria, Egypt, and Persia. He must have been a Man of extraordinary Merit, for though he professed the Christian Religion, yet he did enjoy a Place of Distinction and Trust under the Mabometan Princes (b). Those who shall consider the Measures he was obliged to keep in such a Post, will not think it strange that he speaks honourably of the Caliphs, and that he never makes use of injurious Terms against the Mabometan Religion. There are some People so strictly scrupulous, that they will not approve of the Epithets of Orthodox, Emperor of the Faithful, &c. with which he honours the Followers of Mabomet; much less will they like that, in speaking of that Impostor, he should say, Mabomet of glorious Memory. In consequence of such Language they would be ready to assert that he was a Mabometan; but if they do it will be easy to convict them of a Falshood [B]. His History was translated out of Arabic

[A] I shall speak of his Family. Here is a short Account of it. Our Elmacin was the Grand-son of Abul-tibis, whose Grand-father was settled in Egypt, where the Caliph had granted him some Privileges. This Grand-father was a Syrian Merchant, and professed Christianity. He left a Son who was employed by the Court, in Quality of a Notary: Abul-tibis, the Son of the latter, was very skillful in the same Office, and was recommended by the Magistrates of Grand Cairo to the Council of Arabia. He had five Sons, four of whom were Bishops: the other named Abulmecarimus, married the Sister of Simon Elmacin, a famous Notary, who having been three Years in the service of the Council of War, under Joseph Saladin (1), turned Monk, and led an exemplary Life for above thirty Years in that Profession. Abulmecarimus also, after the Death of his Wife, turned Monk and died in the Year 606 of the Hegira. He had three Sons, of which the second, who was the Father of our Elmacin, and who was named Abuljafirus Elaamidus, obtained the Office of Notary to the Council of War, when Simon Elmacin, his maternal Uncle, quitted it, to enter into a religious Life. He held this Post Forty five Years, and died in the Year of the Hegira 636 (2), after having lived a very pious Life (3).

[B] It will be easy to convict them of a Falshood. For he not only has not put at the beginning of his Book the formal Declaration, which the Writers of that Sect commonly make with a superstitious Affectation, that they are Mussulmen: he not only takes great care

(2) The Year 1238 of Jesus Christ.

(3) Taken from Elmacin's History, towards the end.

ELMENHORST. EMERI. EMILIUS. 761

Arabic into Latin by Erpenius, and printed in both those Languages at Leyden in the Year 1625 in folio [C].

to infer in his Annals several things concerning the Christians, and that turn to their Praise, which a Muslim would avoid as a Crime; but we find also, at the end of his Work, a short account of his Family, which proves undeniably that he was a Christian. As to the nicety of those, who condemn the using honourable Names towards false Religions, see the Author of the General Criticism of the History of Calvinism (4).

[C] His History was translated from the Arabic into Latin, and printed in both those Languages (5) in the Year 1725 in folio. The Translator was then dead, and it was Galius, who took care of the Edition, and wrote a Preface to it, from whence I have taken this Article. He tells us, that Erpenius designed to have added a great many Notes and Explications to his Translation: it is pity that Death prevented him from doing it: for he might have said a hundred curious things upon it, which also would have been very necessary to the right understanding of the Original. Elmacin began his Work at the Creation of the World: Hottinger had in Manuscript that part of it which reaches from that time to the flight of Mahomet (6).

(4) Letter XXX, pag. 289, and following, third Edition.

(5) Note, the Translation was printed at the same time by it self without the Arabic.

(6) Hotting. Bibl. Oriental. cap. ii, pag. 75, apud Cave de Scriptor. Ecclef. pag. 718.

ELMENHORST (GEVERHART) deserves a Place among the Men of Learning who flourished in the beginning of the XVIIth Century. He was of Hamburg, and applied himself to Critical Learning. The Books he published [A] manifest his great reading (a). Scaliger was not of his side in his dispute with Wouwer [B]. He died in the Year 1621.

His Library was in being in the Year 1648; but his Son was upon the point of selling it, and desired Vossius to procure him liberty to do it by way of auction at Leyden (b).

[A] The Books he published. He made Notes on Minutius Felix, Arenobius, Gennadius's Treatise de Ecclesiasticis dogmatibus; the Letters of Martial Bishop of Limoges; and on Apuleius. But he did not live long enough to see the last printed.

Note, he printed at Leyden in 1618 the Table of Cebes, with the Latin Version, and the Notes of John Caselius.

[B] Scaliger was not on his side in his Dispute with Wouwer. This appears by a Letter of Scaliger lately inserted in a Book full of curious Things (1). The Author of this Book is a learned German, named

Mr Crenius. The dispute between John Wouwer and Elmenhorst arose from their having both published Notes upon Minutius Felix. Wouwer's Edition was followed close by that of our Elmenhorst, who perhaps boasted that his deserved the Preference. Scaliger wrote to him that a Pretension of that Nature was without Foundation; and gave him other Advice, mixt with Expostulations. The Letter is dated the twenty sixth of March 1603; the Superscription is Ornatissimo juveni Geverhardo Elmenborstio: which I observe, in order to shew that Elmenhorst died before he had reached to old Age.

(1) Intituled Animadversiones Philologicae & Historicae, Rotterodami 1694, in 8vo. See the Addenda & Emendenda of the II Part of these Animadversiones: the Author confesses there, that this Letter of Scaliger is the CCLXth of the IIIA Book of Scaliger's Letters printed at Leyden in 1627.

EMERI (SEBASTIAN) Advocate in the Parliament of Paris in the XVIth Century, 'would never charge himself, at the time of the difference between the Dukes of Angouleme and the Constable of Bourbon, with the Interests of that Prince, and he even made a severe Satire against Poyet, who was afterwards Chancellor of France, because upon that occasion he had basely offered Incense to Fortune. This Piece made a great noise, and caused the Author to be disgraced, who had Orders to retire from Court. He retired into the Bourbonnois; and out of Vexation that he could no more return to Court, entered into the Order of St Francis, which he left afterwards to enter into the Carthusian Order, being desirous of a greater reform. They would have made him their General some years after, but he opposed it so violently that they were obliged to leave him in his Cell, of which he made it an inviolable Rule with himself not to interrupt the Solitude by any Communication with Seculars (a). Mr EMERI, Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, is of this Family. He inherited the Estate of Mr EMERI his Uncle, who died Counsellor of the Court of Aids in the year 1703, and whose Father had the same Office (b).

EMILIUS (PAUL), or Æmylius, a Native of Verona. The Reputation he had acquired beyond the Alps made Stephen Poncher, Bishop of Paris, advise Lewis XII to order him to write the History of the Kings of France in Latin (a). For this end they invited him to Paris, and made him a Canon in the Cathedral Church. He retired to the College of Navarre to write that History (b), and applied himself to that Work with very great care: he spent many Years in it without being able to finish the tenth Book (c), which was to contain the beginning of the Reign of Charles VIII. He was a nice Critic of his own Work [A]; always finding something to alter. Though I have read what more than twenty Authors say of him, yet I do not find one that informs us what time he came to Paris, how he was employed before that in Italy, which is the first Edition of his History, and whether it was published before his death. He died in the year posset. Nam historiam quam edidit, plusquam triginta annis habuit præ manibus. Et suspicor huc adaptum ut evulgaret (2). — The truly learned Paulus Æmylius of Verona had a Tincture of this Failing, who never satisfied himself, but as often as he revised his Works, altered a great part of them. You would say the Piece was not the old one corrected, but a new one: and he delighted in revising it again. Whence it happened that he was longer

[A] He was a nice Critic of his own Work. Erasmus imputes the same Fault to him, which was charged upon that ancient Painter, who never thought his Pieces finished (1). 'Huic vitio affinis fuit vir eximie doctus Paulus Æmylius Veronensis, qui sibi nunquam satisfaciebat, sed quoties recognoscebat sua, mutabat plerique: diceres opus non correctum, sed aliud: idque subinde faciebat. Quæ res in causa fuit, ut citius elephanti pariantur quam ille quicquam edere

(1) It was Protagoras: Manum de Tabula tollere nesciebat. In this Apelles boasted he excelled him. See Erasmus, Apoph. lib. vi, p. 524.

(a) Mercurius Galant, Feb. 1703, pag. 200, 201.

(b) Ibid. pag. 199, 200.

(c) See Remark [F].

(b) Lannoius, Hist. Gymnasii Navarræ, p. 13.

(c) See Remark [F].

(2) Ibid.

year 1529 [B], and was buried in the Cathedral of Paris. The History of France which he composed pleased Justus Lipsius very much, and, generally speaking, is accounted to be well written [C]; but on the other side it is condemned on several Accounts

'in bringing a Work to maturity, than an Elephant it's young. The History which he published had been thirty Years in Hand. And I imagine he published it at last against his Inclination.' We shall see by and by, whether it be true that he spent thirty Years in composing the History of France, as Erasmus, and others assure us.

[B] He died in the Year 1529. I have read this in his History of France, of the Edition of Basil in 1601, in Folio, under some Latin Verses, where he speaks of his Condition. His Death is placed, by Bucbolter (3), and by Vossius (4), on the fifth of July, 1529. Spondanus anticipates it by near ten Years; for he places it on the fifth of May, 1519 (5): He is mistaken. I shall cite Erasmus below, who, in a Book, whose Epistle Dedicatory is dated in the Year 1528, speaks of Paulus Emilius, as an Author still living. Here is an Evidence of some weight: Father de Breul (6) assures us that Paulus Emilius's Epitaph, engraved upon a flat Tomb-stone near the Northern Window of the Church of Nostredame at Paris, contains these Words; 'Paulus Emilius, Veronensis, hujus Ecclesie Canonici qui præter eximiam vitæ sanctitatem, quanta quoque doctrina præstiterit, index atque testis erit historia de rebus gestis Francorum, posteris ab eodem edita. Obiit Anno Domini 1529, die quinta mensis Maii. — Paulus Emilius of Verona, Canon of this Church, of whose uncommon Sanctity of Life, and Improvements in Literature, the History of France, which he published, will be a lasting monument to Posterity. He died the fifth of May in the Year 1529.' This Proof would be a Demonstration, even to those who have not been upon the Place, if the Printers never made mistakes in public Inscriptions; but they mistake the Figures so often, that there is no dependance upon them. We have an instance of this, in this very Affair. Mr Brice, in his Description of the City of Paris, mentions the same Epitaph of Paulus Emilius; and instead of Index, he puts Judex; and instead of 1529, he makes it 1526 (7). Note, he assures us, that they do not know exactly the Place where this Author was buried, and that they could read his Epitaph not long ago; which is a sign it is not now to be found.

[C] The History of France, which he composed, pleased Justus Lipsius very well, and, generally speaking, is accounted to be well written. It is divided into ten Books, and reaches from Pharamond to the Year 1488, which is the fifth of the reign of Charles VIII. The tenth Book was found among his Papers, in a confused Condition; and in order to publish it to the World, such as we have it now, a Relation of the Author's took care to gather together the scratched, and blotted Sheets. You will find his Name in these Latin Words: 'Ac libros quidem novem perfecti, decimum morte præventus reliquit imperfectum. Sed eum propinquus illius, Daniel Zavarisius Veronensis ex schedis dispersis, multaque litura obductis collegit, ac digessit ita uti nunc legitur (8). — Nine Books indeed he finished, but, being prevented by Death, he left the tenth imperfect. Daniel Zavarisius of Verona, a Relation of his, collected it out of his loose Papers, scarce legible for Blots and repeated Corrections, and digested it into the order wherein we now see it.' Michael Vassosan declares that the Edition he dedicated to Francis I, deserves a better Reception, since there is added to it the tenth Book, sent lately out of Italy by Peter Danes (9). He had said just before, that he published that History better printed, and more correct; Elegantius à nobis excusum (opus) et castigatum. His Epistle Dedicatory is dated from Paris the fifth of May 1539: From whence there is Reason to infer that, before the Year 1639, there was an Edition containing only nine Books. I express myself with this Caution, because I know the Term elegantius is not necessarily the comparative. One thing which may incline us to believe that the Author died before the first Edition, is, that in the same Epistle Dedicatory it is assured that, if Death had not prevented him, he would have dedicated his Work to Francis I. 'Paulus ipse si viveret, tuæ Majestati, cujus auspiciis ceptum opus fere absolvit, consecraret. Quare quoniam morte præventus id non potuit, vicariam illi operam in hac re præstabo (10). — Had Emilius himself lived, he would have dedicated this Work to your Majesty, under whose happy Influence it was begun and well nigh finished; but since Death prevented him in that Design, I shall beg Permission to put my self in his Place.' This may bring in Question what Erasmus says, that probably Paulus Emilius was in a manner forced to publish his History of France: Suspicio hac adductum ut evulgaret (11). He expresses himself in this manner, in a Book, whose Epistle Dedicatory is dated the twenty sixth of February, 1531: From whence we may conclude, that the first Edition of Paulus Emilius was prior to that Year; but as it might happen, will some say, that Erasmus did not know exactly the Circumstances of that Edition, and that he did not mind carefully either the time when it was published, or when the Historian died, we ought not to conclude from his Words, that the Author actually published his own Book: Let us allege therefore something more convincing to those who start these Difficulties; let us shew them that Erasmus knew the Quality and Style of this History of France, even before Paulus Emilius died. I prove this by the Words of his Ciceronianus, which may be seen below (12). It will be replied perhaps, that he had read it in Manuscript; but I cannot think that in that place he would make use of an Instance which was not public: therefore I am very much inclined to believe, that Paulus Emilius had published something: we see that even his Epitaph ascribes to him the Edition of his History of France. A Letter written in the Year 1516 informs us, that at last he had printed the History of France, which he had been working upon above twenty Years. 'Ex oratore vestro cognovi Paulum Emilium tandem evulgare rerum Gallicarum historiam. Non enim poterit non esse absolutissimum opus quod à viro non minus docto quam diligenti plus annis viginti sit elaboratum (13). — I have been informed by your Ambassador, that Emilius at last is publishing his History of France. It must undoubtedly be an accomplished Work, since it has employed a Man of no less Learning than Application above twenty Years.' It is Erasmus that speaks in this manner, and you see he had this News from an Ambassador of Francis I. But there is no more need of Conjecture or Arguments, since a Letter written from Paris informs me, that there is in the King's Library, 'An Edition of the four first Books of Paulus Emilius, done at Paris without having the Year set down in it; but it was certainly before the Year 1520; and in the beginning of the reign of Francis I, this Copy having been presented to him before he took the Close Crown.' Let us observe an Error of Erasmus. It is false that, in 1516, Paulus Emilius had worked above twenty Years upon his History. He was called into France to write it by King Lewis XII: now this Prince began his reign but in the Year 1498, and though his calling this Author should be the first thing he did, yet it could at most be but eighteen Years, that Paulus Emilius had composed the History of France, when Erasmus wrote the letter I have cited. Those who say that this Historian spent thirty Years in this Work, must suppose that he came into France in the first Year of the reign of Lewis XII, without which their Computation would not be right, since he died in the Year 1529. Spondanus (14) was very much in the wrong to suppose these three Things: I. That Lewis XII called Emilius into France: II. That this Historian spent thirty Years in writing a History: III. That he died in 1519. If the first and the third of these Suppositions were true, the second would be very false: For it would be ridiculous to suppose that Paulus Emilius set about this History ten Years before Lewis XII employed him in it. Note, it has been often reprinted. I make use of the Edition of Paris in Folio, by Vassosan 1550, which was preceded by that of 1539, and by that of 1544, and followed by that of 1555, in 8vo, and by one in 1566, in Folio, both one and the other by the same Vassosan. Du Chesne (15) cites the Edition of 1576 ex Officina Vassosani. By his leave, this is but little Honour to him: an Author like him who intitles his Work, A Catalogue of the Authors, who have

(10) Michael Vassosan, Epist. Dedic. Hist. P. Emili.

(11) Erasmus, in Apophth. lib. vi, pag. 524.

(12) In Remar. [F], Citat. [33].

(13) Erasmus, Epist. xvi, lib. i, pag. 60, 61.

(14) Spondanus, Annal. Eccles. ab. ad Ann. 1488, n. 5.

(15) Du Chesne, Biblioth. des Auteurs qui ont écrit l'Histoire de France, pag. 63, Edit. de 1618.

(3) Bæchle, in Indice Chronol. pag. m. 518.

(4) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. p. 675.

(5) Spond. Ann. Eccl. ad annum 1488, num. 5, pag. 189. Edit. Lugd. 1678: he tunc Gall. Christ. in Prefat. Paris. num. 103.

(6) Du Breul, Antiquitez de Paris, livr. 1, pag. m. 14.

(7) Pag. 182, Tom. II, Hague Edit. 1685.

(8) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. pag. 674.

(9) Et etiam nomine gratior esse debet quod accessit liber decimus ad nos super ex Italia missus à Petro Danefio. Michael Vassosan, Epist. Dedic. Note, There is no Substantive in what precedes, to which the Word gratior may be referred.

Accounts [D], and there are many Frenchmen who despise it. He is wrongfully charged have written the History, and Topography of France, ought to put down the several Editions, especially the first. I have already mentioned the Edition of Basil in 1601, in Folio: let us say one Word of the French Translations. Simon de Montiers, Advocate at Roan, translated into French the two first Books which were printed at Paris in 4to, by Vascofan 1556 (16). John Regnart, a Gentleman of Anjou, Lord of la Michiere translated the five first Books: they were printed at Paris in Folio by Claude Michard (17). He translated also the five last, if the Bookellers are to be believed who have published in French the entire History of Paul Emilius. I have the Edition of Paris in Folio 1598 (18).

Here is Justus Lipsius's Judgment (19): which is very advantageous, though intermixed with some censuring Strokes. 'PAULUS ÆMILIUS, ut rem dicam, pæne unus inter novos, veram & veterem Historiæ viam vidit, eamque firmo pede calcavit. Genus scribendi ejus doctum, nervosum, presum; ad subtilitatem & argutias inclinans, & relinquens desigensque aliquid in animo seri lectoris. Sententias & dicta sæpe miscet, paria antiquis. Nec ipsum sedulus scrutator, severus iudex: rem legi nostro ævo, qui magis liber ab affectu. Dedecus ævi est, quod minus ille placeat, quasi pauci sint qui capiant hæc bona. In tantis tamen virtutibus etiam hæc labeculæ. Quod stilum parum necesse, & spargit dividitque eum in minuta quedam membra. Hoc cum in omni seriosa oratione parum congruum, tum in Annalibus minime: quorum est, ut ille ait, tarda quedam & iners scriptura. Deinde, quod inæqualis. Alibi nimium anxius & castigatus, ideoque subobscurus; alibi (sed rarer) laxus & solutus. Vetusitatis etiam nescio quid affectat in nominibus hominum, locorum, urbium immutandis, & in veterem formam redigendis: sæpe eruditè, interdum vanè, sed, ut ego judico, semper indecorè. Quorsum Chartierius Gallorum Cancellarius, Quadrigerius mihi sit? Ille ipse Cancellarius, dicitur Præfectus juris? Et ubique rex Tarraconensis, Castulonensis, Dux Geldubensis: qui nobis & majoribus fuerunt, Arragoniæ, Castellæ, Geldriæ? Talia infinita sunt audacter & ambitiose innovata, & cum fraude pariter ac cruce lectoris. In his, & paucis aliis, si refingere leviter eum nobis fas: (audeo dicere) virum daremus supra omnem hanc novitiam, & ad prisecam laudem. — Paulus Æmilius, to speak freely, is almost the only Modern, that has found the true and ancient Road of History, and trod therein with an unbiased Step. His method of writing is learned, nervous, and compact, inclining to Delicacy, and fine turns of Wit, always leaving an impression on the Mind of the serious Reader. His Thoughts and Expressions are often equal to the Antients. He is exact in his Examination, and impartial in his Judgment of Facts. Nor have I met with any of our time more free from party Zeal. It is a disgrace to the Age, that he is in so little esteem, as though there were but few that have a just taste for these Beauties. Yet amidst all his excellencies there are some spots. His style is not always connected, but parcelled into little Members and Divisions. As this is not to be allowed in any serious Composition, least of all in Annals: the writing of which is heavy and lifeless. Besides 'tis unequal, sometimes too laboured and correct, whereby it becomes obscure, sometimes, though seldom, too loose and rambling. He also affects a sort of Antiquity in changing the Names of Men, Places, Cities, and reducing them to the form of the Antients. Why should Charretier, Chancellor of France, be called Quadrigerius? Or the Chancellor be stiled Præfectus juris? Or why should he every where use the Titles of Rex Tarraconensis, Castulonensis, Dux Geldubensis, instead of the received Terms Arragoniæ, Castellæ, Geldriæ? An infinite number of such Innovations have been arrogantly introduced, whereby he often misleads, or perplexes the Reader. Might I take the liberty to retouch these and a few other Faults, I durst engage to make him appear superior to the charge of Novelty, and equal in merit to the Antients.' Note, that, amongst other Praises, Lipsius commends Paulus Emilius for examining diligently into the bottom of Things, and his being free from Prepossession. Neither la Popelliniere nor Boetler agree to this. ' Besides many other Faults, says the First (20), which some remark in the Style and outward Form of that Author, which alone Lipsius insists upon, we shall shew elsewhere how little his Writings are to be depended upon for Truth and Sincerity.' Here is Boetler's Opinion. ' Paulus Emilius, cui de Scriptoribus Gallicis plurimum creditur, sæpe historiam confundit, sæpe non ex rerum fide, sed ex impetu calami interpolat, fingit multa, ut animo concepit, non commemorat ut memoriis publicis ea debere potuit. Non parum adulari Pontificiæ curiæ doctus (21). — Paulus Emilius, who has the greatest Credit of all the Writers of the French History, often confounds his Relations, and often interweaves Facts not founded on the Credibility of Testimony, but that flow from the Impetuosity of his own Imagination. Nor is he a Novice in the Art of making his Court to the Pope by flattering Encomiums.' If one could rely upon the Commendations which Bookellers procure to the Authors they print, we should have a high Idea of Paulus Emilius's Merit. What follows, is to be found in the Epistle Dedicatory of his Work (22). ' Quo in negotio sic versatus est vir eloquentissimus, ut non solum recentiores omnes qui eandem materiam tractarunt, superaverit, sed etiam veterum historicorum permultos qui populi Romani res gestas scripserunt, longo intervallo post se reliquerit. Etenim si vel rerum gestarum fidem vel dicendi genus studiose velis expendere, nihil per Deos immortales hoc quidem genere scribendi absolutius invenire possit. Res gestas libere quidem, sine ulla tamen aut simulatæ, aut gratiæ suspitione narrat. Ordinem temporum ita diligenter observat, ut hoc nomine Livio sit præferendus, quod semper sibi constet, nec ulquam pugnantia loquatur: quod plerumque in illo reprehendere licet. Regiones porro & loca quum res postulat ita describit ut illa oculis lustrare videaris. Ad hæc, consilia deinde acta, postremo eventus ita suo ordine inseruntur, ut lector etiam parum attentus turbari nullo modo possit. Genus dicendi fultum atque tractum & cum lenitate quadam æquabili profluens (23), ita ut eum Livio aliquanto magis compositum & perspicuum sentire possis. — So well has this learned Historian succeeded in his Enterprize, as not only to surpass all the Moderns who have engaged in the same design, but even far outstrip several of the Antients who wrote the actions of the Roman People. For any one that will carefully examine the credibility of the Facts, or the method of Narration, must confess, that nothing can be found more perfect in it's way. He relates the Facts indeed with Freedom, but even so as to clear himself from the least suspicion of Hatred or Affection; he observes the order of time with such exactness, that he is always consistent with himself, and his Facts correspond to each other, inasmuch, that he may be preferred to Livy, who is often found deficient on this head. His descriptions of Countries, and Places, which on proper occasions he gives, are so natural, that one would imagine he had a view of the Places themselves. Besides his Designs, his Facts, his Consequences, are disposed in so regular an order, that the Reader with the least Attention can never be puzzled. The Style is copious and noble, flowing with an even softness, so that one may pronounce him more regular and clear than Livy.'

[D] But on the other side, it is condemned on several accounts.] This is what you will find in the following Passages of Mr Sorel. ' This Praise is given to Paulus Æmilius, that he was the first who put the ancient Rules in Practice for our History. His Style is accounted Grave and Nervous, sometimes Acute and Subtle, but every where Learned and Sententious. This is the Opinion of those who are in love with elegant Latin: We may answer them, That if we design to make Use of this Author, as of a Classic, to learn to speak well, there is some Reason to value him; but that it were better to have recourse to the Roman Historians, who are supposed to know their own Language best: neither must it be thought, that his pure Latin ought to give credit to his History. The Native Frenchmen were undoubtedly better acquainted with our History than he; and we do not find that he was very diligent in his Inquiries. What swells his Work to such a Bulk, are his Speeches, and other fictitious Pieces. That which regards

(20) La Popelliniere, Histoire des Historiens, pag. 440.

(21) Joh. Henr. Boetler in Pref. Ser. Cæsar. German. apud Pope Blount, Cens. Author. pag. m. 384.

(22) Michael Vascofanus, Epist. Dedicat. Hist. Pauli Æmili. Federic Morel, when he addressed to Henry III the French Translation of this History, copied almost all the Praises given to the Author in Vascofan's Epistle.

(23) This is very different from what Paulus Jovius, in Elog. cap. 130, pag. 282, says, viz. That Paulus Emilius has written with a Laconic Brevity.

(16) Du Verdier & la Croix du Maine.

(17) Ibid.

(18) By Robert Foët. The Epistle Dedicatory to Henry III is signed by Federic Morel: It is without Date, but I know the Edition of this Federic Morel is of Paris, in 1581, in folio.

(19) Lipsius Not. ad l. librum Politicorum, cap. 6, pag. m. 217, Tom. IV. One more Edit. Vesp. 1672. In Morel they quote Justus Lipsius Not. in lib. 1, Polit.

* Tacitus, de Causis corrup. Eloq. cap. 22.

ed with saying nothing of the Holy Vial at Rheims [E]; a French Author has expressed some Chagrin that the Court should prefer a Stranger before all the French to the Office of Historiographer: what he says thereupon is full of Lies [F]. It must not be

(24) Compare with this the Remark [L] of the Article ABDE- RAME; and That of the Article VALDES (JAMES).

(25) Sorel Bibliothecaire Francoise, cap. 4, de la Guide de l'histoire de France, pag. 370.

(26) Du Haillan in his Preface to the History of France.

(27) Claudius Verderius, in Author. Censura, pag. 88, apud Pope Blount, ubi supra, pag. 385.

(28) Vossius, ubi supra, pag. 675.

(29) La Popeliniere, lib. 1, of his Histoire Nouvelle des Francois, pag. 371, & seq. See also his Hist. des Francois, lib. viii, pag. 438.

(30) Bishop Poncher of Tournai was the Meccas and Patron of P. Emilius, and contributed most to the fetching him out of Italy to come and write the History of France in Latin. And seeing him in ill Circumstances in France, and not able to raise such a Body of History, he gave him a Prebend in Notre-Dame of Paris, out of the Revenue of which he bore most of the Charges of the Work. Ibid. pag. 343, 344.

regards the Truth of History is very much abridged, and that too obscure and perplexed. We are not altogether satisfied with those Pieces of Oratory, contrived upon the Greek and Roman Patterns: They are not all of them in a proper Place; for sometimes the Historian makes Barbarians speak learnedly and eloquently, which is seen almost throughout his Book (24). For a remarkable Instance: Though we find in our most authentic Histories, that the Advocate named Havier, or Hanier, who made a Speech full of Invectives before King Lewis Hutin against Enguerrand de Marigny, performed it very pitifully, and said abundance of silly things, Paulus Emilius, who changes his very Name, calling him Annalis, makes him speak with an affected Eloquence, nothing like what is reported of him. He makes also Enguerrand speak in his own Defence, though according to other Histories he had no liberty to say any thing; so that all this is only to exercise the Historian's Pen. That gives some Diversion to the Readers, but it is not a Means to come to the knowledge of Truth (25). Du Haillan has censured Paulus Emilius upon another Score; to wit, his being too diffuse in foreign Matters, and too succinct in his principal Subject. He has writ the History of France, says he (26), elegantly, and in good Latin, but he is too concise in French Affairs, and too prolix in the holy Wars, the Schisms of the Church, and the Affairs of Italy.

[E] He is wrongfully censured for not saying any thing of the holy Vial at Rheims. Claudius du Verdier accounts this Silence malicious. Paulus Emilius Veronenfis, says he (27), malignum silentium non fitebo, qui multorum non meminit quæ ad Gallorum gloriam pertinerent. Nec ea ignorasse dici potest, quæ nullus ante ipsum præterit, ut oleum illud ad unctionem Regum coelitus demissum, & lilia similliter: quibus si fidem non adhibuit, eam saltem hominum mentibus opinionem insitam esse dicere oportuit. — I cannot pass over the malicious Silence of Paulus Emilius of Verona, who has made no mention of several things which redound to the honour of France. Nor can he be said to be ignorant of them, since none before him ever forgot them. Such as the Oil which was sent from Heaven to anoint the Kings, and the Lilies likewise. To which things, though he might give no credit himself, he ought at least to have said, that a belief of them is ingrafted in the minds of Men. Vossius approves this silence (28).

[F] A French Author has expressed some Chagrin that the Court should prefer a Stranger before all the French to the Office of Historiographer. What he says thereupon, is full of Lies. The Passage I am going to produce is somewhat long; but I am sure it will not tire those who are for an exact and well circumstantiated knowledge of Things. By that means they will know the Thoughts of the Author I am now criticising (29). King Lewis XIIth, though a good Prince, and truly called the Father of his People, little concerned however for the honour of his Subjects, or ill advised, or soon enough for the two Occasions: Not vouchsafing to excite and cherish any of his, to supply the want of French Historians, (as if France was unprovided with good Wits) purchased, and, by the suggestion of Bishop Poncher and others, sent for Paulus Emilius of Verona in Lombardy; persuaded by his Counsellors, as favourable in that as many others who have succeeded them to this Day, That an Italian might much better restore (but rather stifle) the Honour lost among his own People, than any other of his Frenchmen. A Design as groundlessly followed and practised by Francis I his Successor, who . . . by small Favours encreased the generous Liberality of Poncher (30) with a Canon's Place in Notre-Dame of Paris, which he bestowed on the Veronese; not considering the Prejudice he did to so many Men of Parts, whom he had stirred up and subtilized, to employ themselves in this as in other Studies: And namely, to Robert Gaguin a Monk, in the Matburins of Paris, who had already made so fine a Beginning of the History of France in Latin, that if he had been encouraged by Royal Favours, as the Italian was, France might, perhaps, even then have been freed from such Reproach among Strangers. But the poor Monk (for want of Money) having not Pinions strong enough to fly, and make his Talents known among the Cloysters of his Monastery; his Genius, as it were bound up and in Prison, was forced to shew, that Talents, though never so great, do presently fade, and cannot shine without a proper Matter to entertain and put forth their Brightness. These two ingenious and well affected Writers, to the honour of this State, who strove with Emulation, under those two Princes, who should best approve his Sufficiency and Devotion in the Fabric of the History of France; which they wrote in the same Language, the same City, with like Memoirs and Subjects, though not with the like Royal Encouragement, left us the Legacy of their fine Productions. But Paulus Emilius composed his History with such Care, Eloquence, and Truth, that the French, having not seen till then any Thing so commendable, entertained it as the Chief of all the French Histories: And which, to say the Truth, has been since the Foundation and Source, from whence all those that followed after have drawn, and derived all those Rivulets, with which they have endeavoured to satisfy the Thirst of their Contemporaries. Gaguin, Prior of the Tuinity, otherwise called the Convent of the Malburins, was as liberal of his Time, Pains, and all his Means, as the other. But whether he thought himself deprived of the Graces of Nature, as well as of the Favours of his Prince and others, being inferior in Beauty of Language, Order, Eloquence, and Dignity of Subjects, he could acquire no other Advantage over that Lombard, than the being more plain and sincere in his Narration; and more diligent in gathering abundance of remarkable Particulars, which Paulus Emilius had overlooked, for want of Affection to this Country.

There are three unpardonable Falsities in this Discourse. First, Gaguin was not a Frenchman, as Popeliniere supposes. He was a Fleming, and almost as much a Foreigner as Paulus Emilius: So that the opposition between the Favours of the Lombard, and the Discouragement of the pretended Frenchman, is ridiculous. Secondly, Gaguin had been dead thirteen Years (31) when Francis I ascended the Throne. How then dares he complain, that That Monarch did him a great Prejudice, by the Liberalities he granted to the Italian? How dares he represent to us those two Historiographers, as two Competitors, who contend a long time for the Prize of the Race? The one died three Years after Lewis XIIth had began his Reign; the other was invited to Paris by that Monarch, and lived there till the fifteenth Year of Francis I. I may add, that if one compares the Favours and Liberalities of the Court of France towards Gaguin, with those that were bestowed on Paulus Emilius, it will be found that the Services of the pretended Frenchman, were better rewarded than those of the Italian. Lastly, I say, that it is absurd to pretend, that if Gaguin had had good Pensions, he had written a History as good as that of Paulus Emilius. Had he had a yearly Salary of Ten thousand Livres, he would never have reached his Competitor. He had so indifferent a Taste and Knowledge of Antiquity, and elegant Latin, that, to commend him worthily, it is enough to say, That he is not quite so barbarous as the Generality of Monks were at that Time. Robertus Gaguinus non ita pridem habitus est magni nominis, dictione tamen quam scriptis vendibilior. Verum suo seculo, nunc vix inter Latine loquentes reciperetur (32). — Robert Gaguin had some time ago the Reputation of great Merit, but happier in speaking than in writing. In his own time indeed he might pass, but now a-days would scarcely be admitted among those who have but a smattering of Latin. This is the Rank Erasmus allows him; and indeed he treats him according to his Merit. The Veronese was another sort of Man; and it is great Injustice to blame Lewis XIIth for preferring him before his Subjects. There was not in those Days (33), in all the Kingdom, any Writer who equalled Paulus Emilius in knowledge of the Latin Tongue, and the Laws of History. Though I do not pretend

(31) He died in 1501.

(32) Erasmus in Cicero's P. E. m. 72.

(33) I mean the first Years of Lewis the Twelfth's Reg-be forgotten that Paul Emilius lived a very exemplary Life; his Morals were as pure as his Language [G]. I must say something of a Work which is ascribed to him by Julius Cæsar Scaliger [H], and the clamour that Scioppius made upon that Subject.

by this, that he ought to have been put upon the same Level with the Salust and Livy's.

— quique alter haberis
Et Titus, & Crispus, nostræ unus conditor ingens Historiæ Emili (34).

(34) Rodolphus Boterius, in Luteris, apud du Breul, Antiquitez de Paris, Livr. 1, pag. 14.

*Salust and Livy are reviv'd in thee,
Thou sole great Founder of our History!*

(35) La Popelin. Hist. des Hist. pag. 437.

Let us observe another Mistake of Popeliniere. He says, that Lewis XII drew Paulus Emilius out of Verona (35), which is not true: For that Author was at Rome, when he was invited into France, as may be inferred from the Latin Verses which are found at the Beginning of his History, and wherein he mentions his Family and Condition. This may also be gathered from the Latin Verses, which are found in the Beginning of the French Translation, signed Fed. M. F.

[G] His Morals were as pure as his Language. Let us quote again Michael Vascosan: 'Atque hoc etiam nomine præstantius esse debet hoc opus quod non ingenium solum Francorum Regibus suppeditatum est, ut Cyros à Xenophonte, sed etiam autoritas spectatissimi atque in primis probati viri. Non enim magis in eo fuit admiranda eruditio excellens, cum pari eloquentia, quam perpetua vitæ integritas atque sanctimonia. — This Work claims still a greater Veneration, as not only furnishing the Kings of France with the Principles of good Conduct, as Xenophon did to Cyrus, but as carrying along with it the Authority of a Man distinguished by his probity and veracity. For his uncommon Learning, joined to an equal share of Eloquence, was not more surprising than the continual Integrity and Sanctity of his Life.' This is confirmed by the Epitaph before mentioned (36). If you desire a more unexceptionable Witness, read what follows. 'Pauli Emili & reconditam eruditionem & diligentiam & vitæ sanctitatem, & summam in historia fidem exosculor. Tullianam dictionem nec affectavit nec habet (37). — I am charmed with that prodigious store of Learning, that Application, that Sanctity of manners, and that Veracity which appear in Paulus Emilius. Tully's Style be neither affect'd nor bas.' These are the Words of Erasmus, and I have taken them out of a Book, whose Epistle Dedicatory is dated Feb. 14. 1528: And it is to be noted, that Erasmus speaks of Paulus Emilius as an Author then living.

(36) In the Remark [B].

(37) Erasmus, in Ciceroniano, pag. m. 72.

[H] I must say something of a Work which has been ascribed to him by . . . Scaliger. Julius Cæsar Scaliger boasted he had read a Book, which contained the History of the House della Scala, and which had been put into elegant Latin by P. Emilius. 'Non dum hæc nomina, quæ Comitum atque Marchionum circumferuntur, exorta erant: & Scaligerorum florabat imperium. Vultis annales nostros asseramus: quos rudes, atque barbaros (ut tunc ea ferebat ætas) vir bonus atque eloquens Paulus Emilius pulcherrimis Latinitatis donavit monumentis (38). — The Titles of Count and Marquis, now so frequent, were then unknown; and the power of the Scaliger's flourish'd. Would you that we produce our Annals, which the good and eloquent Paul Emilius took from the uncouth and awkward dress of the Age wherein they were wrote, and robed in the most splendid Attire of Roman Purity.' Joseph Scaliger relates this more at large, in a Letter he wrote upon the Antiquity of his Family in the Year 1594. 'Injuria temporis, says he (39), malevolentia holum, imperitia scriptorum, eos cuniculos in generis nostri memoria egerunt, ut de totius nominis Scaligeri ruina metuendum esset, nisi præsto fuisset eloquentissimus vir, & antiquarum originum vindex Paulus Emilius Veronenfis, qui nactus in Norico acta & annales prolapz nostræ vetustissimos, pingui filo, ut ipse ait, conceptos, edolavit eos, & Latine loqui docuit. Ex eo libro patrens meus ea excerptit, quæ ad nostri generis claritatem præcipue pertinere visa sunt. Cætera per otium describere non licuit. Quod utinam fecisset, & nobis edendi laborem reliquisset. — The injuries of Time, (38) Jul. Cæs. Scaliger. Orat. in Luctu Audeſti Cæſaris filii, pag. m. 74, 75.

(39) Joseph. Scaliger in Epist. de Vetustate & Splendore Gentis Scaligeræ, pag. 8 & 9.

V O L. II.

the Malice of Enemies, the Ignorance of Writers, had so far undermined the memory of our Family, that the very Name of Scaliger was in danger of ruin, had it not been rescued by that most eloquent and renowned Antiquarian Paul Emilius of Verona, who having found in Bavaria the Records of our Family, conceived, as he says, in a richness of Style, pruned them, and taught them to speak Latin. From that Treatise my Father extracted those things which more immediately concerned the splendor of our Race. The rest he had not leisure to transcribe, which I wish he had done, and left me the labour to publish them.' He mentions it also in the first Edition of his Commentary upon Catullus in the Year 1576, and in the second of 1600, but in a manner, which, with respect to some Circumstances, did not agree with what I have quoted out of his Letter de Vetustate & Splendore gentis Scaligeræ. Scioppius insulted him most cruelly about those small Variations, and moreover maintained that what the Two Scaligers had advanced, touching that Work of P. Emilius, was but a Fable, and an Imposture. His chief Reason, amongst others, was, that they had not mentioned either the Place where they boasted they had read this Manuscript, or the Name of the Person in whose Hands it was; and that the Authors, who had viewed the Libraries of Bavaria with most Diligence, never met with these Annals (40). 'Ut sum curiosulus, says he (41), libet de Paulo Emilio nonnulla exquirere. Primum, est ne verisimile Emilium in Norico umquam fuisse & Germanicum sermonem, cumque vetustissimum intellexisse? & quo in angulo Bavariz istos Scaligerorum annales invenit, qui summam Aventini, Hundi, Lazii & ipsorum Scaligerorum Bavarorum diligentiam effugerint? Potuit ne fieri, ut illustis vir Marcus Velleius reip. Augustanæ Præfectus, singulare illud ætatis nostræ ornamentum, ne Serenissimi quidem Bavariz Principis auctoritate subnixus eodem illos Annales alicunde non erueret? Et fuit ne quisquam, qui de hoc Emilii libro (tu quatuor libros fuisse in Catullum scribis) vel tenuissimam umquam audicionem accepit? — Being somewhat curious, says he, I have a mind to make some enquiry concerning this Paul Emilius. First, is it probable that Emilius ever was in Bavaria, and understood the German Language, and that the most antient? In what corner of Bavaria did he find these Records of the Scaligers, which have eluded the strictest search of Aventinus, Hundi, Lazius, and even the Scaligers of Bavaria? Is it possible that the great Marcus Velleius, chief Magistrate of the State of Augsbourg, that shining Ornament of our Age, supported by the Authority of the most serene Prince of Bavaria, should not somewhere or other have met with the same Records? Is there any one that has ever heard the least mention of this Book of Emilius, which you in your Edition of Catullus swell to four?' Joseph Scaliger replied, That there were many Books still unknown, and therefore that it was ill Logic to say, that Paulus Emilius's Manuscript had never been extant, because it was not published (42). He convicted Scioppius of having advanced a Lye, since it was false that Julius Cæsar Scaliger ever pretended, that Paulus Emilius had translated that Work out of German (43). 'Ego quero unde colligunt Julium dixisse eos Annales lingua Norica scriptos? Sed Julii verius consulere nulla invidia est. Ii sunt in libello de Regnorum everſionibus.

(40) Scioppius, in Scaligeri hypobolismo, foli 40 verso.

(41) Id. ibid.

Nam Paulus utrunque Emilius monet referri Deprompta libro, quem, ut retulit, fide vetusta Incude Latina igneque Noricum recoxit. Torellius omiserat ista Saraina.

(42) J. Scilg. Confutatio Fabulæ Burdonum, pag. 389, 390.

(43) Ibid. pag. 386, 387.

Et pueri patet illorum Annalium librum Noricum ideo dici a Julio, quod in Norico compositus, & ibi ab Emilio inventus, non utique quod lingua Norica scriptus esset. Quem magis idoneum verborum Scaligeri interpretem dare possumus, quam ipsum Julium Scaligerum (44)? — I would fain know where they find that Julius Cæsar Scaliger said those Records were written in the Bavarian Language. But

(44) Ibid.

* it will not be amiss to consult the Verses of Scaliger. They are in his Treatise on the Downfall of Kingdoms.

* Emilius informed us both, that those extracts were made from a Bavarian Treatise which he had fashioned again on the Anvil with true primitive Faith, and Roman Fire; which Torellius Saraina forgot to mention.

* It is plain, even to a Boy, that Julius Scaliger called that Book Bavarian, because it was composed in that Country, and there found by Emilius, and not as being wrote in that Language; and who can be admitted as an Interpreter of Scaliger's words better than Scaliger himself? Thereupon Joseph Scaliger sets down his Father's Words, which I have quoted in the Beginning of this Remark (45). Scioppius did not deny but that he had erred in this, but maintained that this was not a material Point in the Dispute, and pretended that his Adversaries could not answer his other Observations. 'Breviter concedo tibi, verba patris tui, quibus Emilius Annales Noricos latinos fecisse dicit, non recte à Scioppio intellecta fuisse (tameñ id adhuc controversi juris est) sed nego id attulisse Scioppium quasi de quo tecum litigare vellet (46)'. I conclude, by taking Notice that Paulus Emilius was one of the Heroes of Julius Cæsar Scaliger, who jointly with Torellius Saraina complimented him with a little Poem, which he inserted in a Book intitled Heroes (47).

(45) Above, Citation (38).

(46) Oporinus Grubinius, Amphot. Sciop. pag. 271.

(47) See Scaliger's Latin Poems, pag. 321, Edit. 1591.

EMILIUS (ANTHONY) or Emilius, History Professor in the University of Utrecht, was born the 20th of December 1589, at Aix la Chapelle, where his Father had retired for the sake of Religion [A]. He laid the Foundation of his Studies in his native Country, and in the Duchy of Juliers, under John Kunius, and then came to Dort, where he studied under Adrian Marcellus, and the famous Gerard John Vossius. As soon as he had finished his classical Learning, he went to Leyden, and attached himself to Baudius particularly. Afterwards he went to see Foreign Universities, and spent four Years in his Travels. He lodged at Heidelberg with David Pareus, and viewed at his leisure the Palatine Library. At Saumur he was known with Distinction to Mr Du Pleffis Mornei, who procured him as many Books as he desired. Being returned into his Country, he succeeded Vossius in the Place of Rector of the College of Dort. He was then in the 26th Year of his Age. Three or four Years after (a) he went to Utrecht, to exercise the same Office there. Having discharged it some Years, he laid it down, upon what Account I know not, and resumed it at the end of four Years (b) together with a more honourable One annexed to it, to wit, the Professorship of History in the illustrious School, which soon after was erected into an University. Emilius continued in that Place till his Death, and made his Erudition and Eloquence admired. There was a Design to draw him to Leyden, to fill the Greek Professorship, which Vossius (called to Amsterdam) left vacant. Nevertheless, he chose to remain at Utrecht: And to fix him the better in this good Resolution, the Magistrates of Utrecht increased his Salary, without which, as it is acknowledged in his Funeral Oration (c), he would infallibly have changed his Abode. The principal Theme of his Lectures, for more than twenty six Years that he continued in his Place, was taken out of the Annals of Tacitus. He died the 10th of November 1660 (d). There is no mention made, in his Funeral Oration, of his being addicted to the New Philosophy; which would have revived the Memory of his Correspondence with Des Cartes [B]. He published, in 1651, a Collection of Latin Speeches and Poems.

[A] His Father had retired to Aix la Chapelle, for the sake of Religion.] His Name was John Meles.

(1) In his Youth he was a Merchant at Antwerp, afterwards at Rome, and wherever he sojourned. He was born a Roman Catholic; but having taken notice at Rome, that many during Mass discoursed of their amorous Adventures, he began to have some distrust about his Religion, and examining nicely into it, he disliked it more and more, and secretly embraced the Reformed. At last, to profess the latter openly, he quitted the Country of Liege, and went to settle himself at Aix la Chapelle; from whence he retired into the Duchy of Juliers, when the Emperor caused the Church and School of the Protestants to be shut up at Aix la Chapelle. Last of all, he retreated to Dort (2).

[B] He had a Correspondence with Des Cartes.] Emilius, in his Funeral Oration of Reneri, who had publicly taught the Opinions of Des Cartes in the University of Utrecht, bestowed great Commendations upon Des Cartes; wherein he followed his Inclination, and gratified the Desire of the First Magistrate of Utrecht, who sent him a positive Order to set forth the Praises of Mr Des Cartes, and of the New Philosophy, in Mr Reneri's Funeral Oration (3). The Author of this Penegetic sent it in Manuscript, with a respectful Letter to Mr Des Cartes, who answered, as he ought, those first Steps of Civility: And this was the beginning of their Correspondence. This happened in the Year 1639, when there was yet no need of imitating Nicodemus, in being a Disciple in private, propter metum Judæorum: for the Storm against Regius had not yet begun to rage; therefore that would not be a Proof of the Courage of Emilius: but here is one; he not only refused to have a Share in the Proceedings, which in the Year 1642, were made against Mr Des Cartes, and Mr Regius his Follower, by the University of Utrecht, but opposed the Judgment that was given thereupon (4).

(d) Taken from his Funeral Oration pronounced by David Berckringius, the 21st of Nov. 1660. The Diary of Mr Witte is mistaken in setting down his Death to the year 1650.

(3) Baillet's Life of Des Cartes, Tom. II, p. 22.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 755.

EMMA, Daughter of Richard II, Duke of Normandy, Wife to Ethelred King of England, and Mother of Edward the Confessor who was also King of England, had a great Share in the Government in her Son's Reign, and such Power at Court, that the Earl of Kent, who had had great Authority in several other Reigns, conceived a violent Jealousy against her. He could not endure that a Woman should share with him in the public Administration, that is to say, for the most part, the Authority of doing what one pleases under the Name of the Prince; and therefore made use of this Artifice to rid himself of that Rival. He accused her of several Crimes, and gained some great Lords who confirmed his Accusations to the King: So that this good Prince, who in all probability

(a) In the Year 1619.

(b) In 1634.

(c) Haud dubie secutura fuerat alia (vocatio) priori pinguior, secutura dico, sed longo intervallo in locum Heinii emerit, nisi Palas Ultrajectina huic constul inieisset securum aucto stipendio Emilianio Schotani Jurisconsulti ad praefectores Batavos. He would certainly have quitted his Post for one more beneficial, in the place of Heinii, worn out with Age and Business, had not the Palas of Utrecht put a stop to this design, by augmenting his Salary before the departure of Schotanus to Holland, which enticed him into her Service.

(1) His Son Anthony latinized this Name honourably, since he converted it into a very illustrious Roman Family, Gens Emilia.

(2) Taken from the Funeral Oration of Anthony Emilius.

bability would never have had a Place in the Kalendar but for his great Simplicity [A], easily believed his Mother guilty, and went to her at unawares, and deprived her of all that she had got; alledging for his Reason, that those were ill-gotten Goods, and the Fruits of her unsupportable Avarice. In this Disgrace she had recourse to the Bishop of Winchester, her Relation: But this furnished her Enemies with new Matter of Calumny; for the Earl of Kent imputed to her as a Crime, the too frequent Visits she made to that Prelate [B], and accused her of Incontinency with him. The King being still credulous, Emma was obliged, for her Justification, to undergo the Trial in Use in those Days, which was, to walk bare-foot over red glowing-hot Plowshares [C]. This cruel Trial clearly proved her Innocence. The King being sensible of it, submitted himself to Penance (a). I do not find what became of her Accusers: And it must be owned, that the Custom of those Ages will bear many Reflexions [D].

(a) See Theophilus Raynaud. Hystor. §. II, Serie II, cap. vi, ubi quæritur Polidorus Virgil. Nicholus Harpfield, and Rhodolphus Cestrensis Natus, that Father a Orleans relates this Story with much Exactness in a first Tome of his Revolutions of England.

[A] Edward her Son . . . would never have had a Place in the Kalendar, but for his great Simplicity.] I mean, he would never have been canonized, nor a Holy-day assigned to his Memory. It is certain, that those, who sit on the Throne, have more need than others of the Assistance of a happy Temper, to become Saints. If Nature has not endowed them with a simple, meek, gentle, and humble Spirit, they entertain Passions which engage them in a Conduct little conformable to Christian Perfection; but with the forementioned Qualifications, they suffer themselves to be led like Sheep by their Spiritual Dictators; which are great Advantages towards obtaining one Day, at the Court of Rome, their Beatification, and it's Appurtenances. I do not pretend to exclude such Exceptions as will be thought necessary: But whatever it be, the Author I quote has acknowledged St Edward's Simplicity. Reginald Emmam apud filium Edwardum Sanctum quidem sed simplicis animi dehonefavit. Apud regem omnes ex suo ingenio simplici & candido (metentem) (1).

(1) Theoph. Raynaudus Hystor. §. II, Serie II, cap. vi, pag. m. 204. I add the Word metentem, because the Sense requires it.

[B] They imputed to her as a Crime, the too frequent Visits she made to the Bishop of Winchester.] The World was ever censorious, and would never allow that Persons of different Sexes, who have long and frequent Conversations together, may be honest. Be you a Widow, be you old, be you a Queen Dowager, be you in want of Counsel, chuse an Ecclesiastic rather than a Laic for your Confidant; yet nothing will exempt you from Suspitions, or the Lashes of slanderous Tongues. Emma is perhaps the Hundredth Thousandth among Women of a high Rank, who have made their Conduct talked of.

[C] She was obliged to walk bare-foot over red glowing-hot Plowshares.] One Robert, who was afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, seconded vigorously the Earl of Kent's Machinations: For it was by his Means that the Queen was condemned to clear herself by this Fiery Tryal. The Custom of those Times was, that the Person accused should pass bare-foot over nine Plowshares made red-hot in the Fire: And it was proposed, that Emma should make nine Steps upon those Plowshares for herself, and five for the Bishop of Winchester, for whose Reputation she was much concerned. She accepted the Proposal, and passed all the preceding Night in Prayers near the Tomb of St Switbin. The Day being come, all the usual Ceremonies were performed in the same Church, where she had passed the Night; after which, in the Presence of Edward, and all the Nobles of the Kingdom, she went over the nine Plowshares in the middle of the two Bishops. She was dressed like an ordinary Woman, and naked to the Knee, looking all the while towards Heaven. The Fire did her so little hurt, that they were leading her out of the Church when she asked, When she should come to the Place where the Plowshares were? Cum progrediendo decursi essent vomeres, jamque extra Ecclesiam procederent cingentes Emmam Episcopi, interrogavit Emma, equando ad vomeres esset perventura, quæ rei exitum edocta immensas gratias pro tanti probi absterfione Deo egit (2). Being told that all was over, she thanked God for this clear manifestation of her Innocence. King Edward kneeled to his Mother, asked her Pardon; and to repair the Injury done both to her and the Bishop of Winchester, he would undergo the Penance of being scourged over his naked Shoulders by the Bishops. And for that purpose, they stripped his Shoulders naked and whipped him as a Penitent. Rex matri supplex ad pedes accidit, & pro molestia matri ac Episcopo Aluino creata nudo dorso ritu poenitentium plagas ab Episcopis excepit (3). The Plowshares were buried in a Cloyster of Winchester.

(2) Theoph. Raynaudus, ibid.

(3) Id. ibid.

[D] The Custom of those Days will bear many Reflexions.] Historians are full of Stories like these. We find, that the Trial by Fire was often practised in several Places of Europe, and that the Persons, who underwent it, came off with Honour. Why has this Custom been so long disused? Is it because it has been found out to be subject to Illusion, and that through human Artifice it might be employed to countenance Vice? If so, we ought not to account innocent those Men and Women, who went over the red-hot Plowshares without receiving any hurt. Or is it because we must not tempt God? But why then did they tempt him in those Days? Why are not those condemned who authorized that Custom? Why should we believe that God wrought a Miracle to manifest a Person to be innocent, who did not deserve that Favour, since that Person had recourse to a Crime, viz. that of tempting God? It is very hard to resolve all these Difficulties, without the Interposition of an Occasional Cause; but with the help of this Hypothesis, it were easy to resolve them. We need only suppose an Intelligence who should protect Innocence, and who by his Desires should have determined the first Mover, not to follow upon this Occasion the general Law of the Communication of Motion. We may next suppose, not, as the Heathens did, that this sort of Intelligences die, but that they have other Offices assigned them, and that then they cease to preside at these Trials. Thus some Miracles might be in vogue in one Age, and cease in another. We must however conclude nothing from thence against the Immutability of general Laws. We might perhaps be mistaken, if we thought that, among created Spiritual Substances, the Soul of Man only is subject to change.

EMMIUS (U BBO) a Learned Professor at Groningen, was born at Gretha, a Village of East-Friesland the fifth of December 1547. He was Son to the Minister of that Village [A]. He was but nine Years old when he was sent to study at Emden; where he stayed till he was eighteen: After which, he was sent to Bremen in 1565, to hear the famous John Molanus. Being returned home, he was not presently sent to the Universities, but was kept some time at Norden, where the College began then to be restored. But when he was in the twenty third Year of his Age, he was sent to Rosock, where the

[A] He was Son to the Minister of Gretha.] This Minister's Name was Emmo Diken: He had been a Disciple of Luther and Melancthon, and very much esteemed by John Laetus, who for some time was Overseer of the Churches of those Parts. His Wife, Mother of our Ubbø Emmius, was Daughter of Egbert

Tiarda, who for thirty Years together had been Burgomaster of Norden, and whose Brother Ubbø Emmius, a good Civilian, gave his Name to the Person who is the subject of this Article. The Father of Emmo Diken was an honest Boor, who was Overseer of the Sluys of that Place (1).

(1) Taken out of the Life of Ubbø Emmius, printed among those of the Professors of Groningen.

[B] He

the University was in a flourishing Condition. There he improved by the Lessons of David Chytreus, a famous Divine and Historian, and those of Henry Bruceus, an able Mathematician and Physician. The News of his Father's Death obliged him to return to East-Friesland, after having stayed above two Years at Rosstock; and his Mother's Affliction hindered him from travelling into France as he desired. He stayed near the good Woman three whole Years, by which Time her Grief being somewhat alleviated, he went to Geneva, and sojourned there two Years. Being returned into his Country, he had the Choice of two Places; either to be a Minister, or Rector of a College.

(a) A priore ad quem animus referebat, retraxit eum verecunda modestia, quæ hereditaria adeo naturæ ejus insita fuit, ut nimis pene modestie de se sentiens, in hominum catu fari vix auderet. Vite Prof. Groning. pag. 42.

(b) To wit, That of Norden in East Friesland.

(c) This was in 1614, and not in 1607, as Valerius Andreas affirms in Biblioth. Belg. pag. 842.

He was naturally so modest, that he scarce durst speak any thing in Company (a), and therefore, tho' his Inclination led him to be a Minister, he undertook the Rectorship of a School (b) in the Year 1579. This School flourished marvellously under him; but he was put out of it in 1587, because he would not subscribe to the Augsburg Confession. Upon this Refusal, some zealous Lutherans caused his Salary, and the Licence to teach, to be taken from him: Whereupon he was called to Leer, in the same Country of East-Friesland in the Year 1588, to the same Employment he had lost. He gave the School of Leer such a Lustre, that it surpassed that of Norden, where the Lutherans could never repair the Decay it suffered after the Dismissal of Emmius. They had driven out of Groningen several Persons who followed Calvin's Reformation, and the Conformity of Fortune made those Exiles, who retired to Leer, to enter into a strict Friendship with our Emmius. So that, when the City of Groningen associated itself with the United Provinces, and thought of restoring it's College, he had the Recommendation of several Persons, and was called to be Rector of it, with Authority to make and abrogate such Statutes as he thought convenient. He took Possession of that Employment in 1594, being forty seven Years of Age, and exercised it near twenty Years successively for the Good and Advantage of the Youth, which crowded thither from all Parts. By this Time the Magistrates of Groningen, having erected their College into an University (c), they gave the Professors in History and Greek to Emmius, who was the first Rector of this new University, and the greatest Ornament of it by his Lectures, till the Infirmities of Age hindered him from appearing in Public. However, he did not become useless, either to the Commonwealth of Learning, or the University of Groningen; for he continued to write Books [B], and to give his wise Counsels to the Academical Senate in all important Affairs. His Erudition was not his only Merit, for he was capable to advise Princes themselves. William Lewis, Count of Nassau, Governor of the Provinces of Friesland and Groningen, consulted him often [C], and seldom swerved from his Advice. This is a Qualification which is rarely found among those, who have passed all their Life in the Dust of the School. Emmius was singular in some other Things. He settled at Groningen [D], and rejected the Calls that were sent to him

[B] He continued to write Books. It was then he set about the three Tomes of the Vetus Græcia Illustrata; the first of which contains a Geographical Description of Greece; the second, the History of the Grecians; the third, the particular Form of each State, or Republic of Greece. If the Printers had been as diligent as they had promised him, he would have had the Satisfaction to see that Work published before his Death; but by reason of their usual Dilatoriness, that Book did not come out till the Year 1626 (2). The Sieur Paul Freber was ignorant of the Publication of it (3). Our Author had written some valuable Books, before he set about this: Such are his Decades Rerum Friscarum, and in general whatever he has composed, both relating to the History of Friesland and Groningen, and the Geographical Description of those Places. Such are also his Books of Chronology and Genealogy, which in a most elaborate Method contain the Roman and General History. I say nothing of his History of William Lewis, Count of Nassau, Governour of Friesland, where one finds not only the Character and Panegyric of that Prince, but likewise an Abridgment of the History of the United Provinces, from 1577, to 1614. Neither do I mention his Theological Disputes against Daniel Hofman; nor the Book intitled, Vita & sacra Eleusinia Davidis Georgii, qui monstra putendorum errorum aut furorum veterum à se recocta mundo propinavit, ex libris ejus mysticis eruta (4). When he died, he was writing the History of Philip King of Macedon, Father to Alexander the Great; wherein, for the use of the United Provinces, he designed to shew by what unfair Practices that Prince had oppressed the Liberties of Greece. He had already brought down this History to the Fifteenth Year of that Monarch's reign (5).

(2) Vite Prof. Groning. pag. 50.

(3) Theatr. Freheri, pag. 152.

(4) Freher. ibid.

(5) Vite Prof. Groning. pag. 50.

[C] William Lewis, Count of Nassau, . . . consulted him often. We should wrong the Memory of Ubbø Emmius, if we should not publish to the whole World the Honours he received from that Governour of Friesland. His Historian mentions it in this manner: 'Ab eo tempore quo sedes suas Groningæ habuit, per annos XXVI, affectum illustrissimi Principis GUILIELMI LUDOVICI Comitis Nassoviæ, Gubernatoris nostri quondam laudatissimæ memoriæ, tam benevolam & benignam semper sensit Emmius, ut humilioris suæ conditionis sibi conscius, in ruborem sæpe daretur. Nam viri hujus cordatum ingenium Nestoremque in consiliis dandis prudentiam sæpe expertus Heros inclutus, eum ad se accersere, benignè habere, per fidos domesticos, per literas in maximis negotiis consulere, & à mente ejus haud temerè recedere, in more positum habebat (6). — (6) Ibid. pag. 45.

Emmius, from the time of his fixing at Groningen, for the space of twenty six Years, found in that most illustrious Prince William Lewis, Count Nassau, our late Governour of happy Memory, so noble and generous a Benefactor, that, conscious of his humbler Fortune, he was often seen to blush. For that renowned Hero having often experienced the Sincerity of his Heart, and the Prudence of his Counsels, sent for him and received him with the greatest marks of Affection, consulted him on the most important Affairs, by Letters, or by the most faithful of his Domesticis, and he seemed to have laid it down for a Maxim not barely to depart from his Sentiments.'

[D] He settled at Groningen. I have spoken three times (7) of the ambulatory Life of Professors. Here it is however, who was preserved from the Epidemical Distemper incident to those of his Order. 'Certe præter alios, Dordrechtiani, Leovardienfes, his excitati, ad similem apud se functionem, Emdani verò ad aliud vitæ genus capeffendum, amplissimis propositis præmiis eum invitarunt. Sed ille gratiis quibus debebat actis, non suum lucellum, sed Reipublicæ literariæ commodum semper querens, Groningæ, quoad Deo visum, manere, quam aliò transferri maluit, & quod aliis in simili casu occinere solebat, ipse ad usum quoque suum revocavit dictum hoc vulgare.

(7) See, above, Citat. (22) of the Article DECIUS.

Si

him from divers Places. Neither was he fondly prepossessed in favour of his own Country; for, on the contrary, he strenuously confuted the Fables, which the Historians of Friesland published about the Antiquities of their Nation [E]. This love of Truth raised him many Enemies (d). He died at Groningen the 9th of December 1625, as he was entering upon the seventy ninth Year of his Age (e). His chief Learning consisted in History [F]. He has been commended by several great Men [G], and particularly by Scaliger. He left Children behind him [H]. The Magistrates caused his Picture to be hung in the Stadt-House.

Panegyric upon Ubbo Emmius; which Nicolaus Mulerius, M. D. Professor of the Mathematics at Groningen, published without putting his Name to it, in 1633.

(d) See the Remark [E].

(e) Taken out of his Life, printed with those of the Professors of Groningen. This Life is little else but a

(8) Vite Proff. Groning. pag. 45.

(9) He saw that Dei was good. Gen. xlii, 15.

(10) Here is a Passage of Thuanus concerning Suffridus Petri, and Emmius: Postea à Frisæ Ordinibus invitatus origines, colonias, nobilitatem, libertatem, juræ gentis suæ illustranda suscepit, in quibus altius repetendis dum admittis fabularum signentis minimum sileo indulget, multorum reprehensiones incurrit, ut URBONI EMMIUS, qui cum provinciam summa fide ac admiranda simplicitate postea executus est, potius lampada tradidisse, quam ei in scribenda patria historia preluxisse videatur. — Afterwards, at the Invitation of the States of Friesland, he undertook a more clear Account of the Origin, Colonies, Grandeur, Liberty, and Laws of his Country, and endeavouring to trace them too far back, he incurred the Censure of many by giving his Pen too great a Liberty with the fabulous Accounts whereunto they were intermixed. So that he may be said to have rather put a Torch in the Hands of, than to have been a faithful guide to, URBONI EMMIUS, who afterwards discharged that Task with great Candour and Simplicity. Thuan. lib. 110, pag. 816, ad ann. 1597.

(11) Vit. Proff. Groning. pag. 40.

* De Orig. & Antiq. Fris. pag. 3, & 4.

Si quâ sede sedes, quæ sit tibi commoda sedes,

Illâ sede sede, nec ab illâ sede recede (8).

The Inhabitants of Dort, and Leuwarden, in a particular manner, solicited him to accept a like employ among them, and those of Emden made him extraordinary Offers to engage him in one of a different Nature. But he, making all due Acknowledgements, not studious of his own private Interest, but of that of the Republic of Letters, chose rather to remain at Groningen, during the good pleasure of God, than to be translated to another Place; and applied to himself, as he had often done to others on the like Occasion, this common saying,

When once well seated, on that seat remain:

Who rashly rise may wish to sit again.

There are very few Men who resemble Issachar (9), Son to the Patriarch Jacob.

[E] He strenuously confuted the Fables, which the Historians of Friesland relate about the Antiquities of their Nation. You may have seen before, in the Article ABGILLUS, how credulous Suffridus Petri is (10). He is not the only Frisian Writer, who has taken Pleasure in publishing a Thousand Fables. The worst of it is, that People have been angry with those that have exploded them; and in particular, Ubbo Emmius was quarrelled with, and exposed to a thousand Slanders upon that Score. Do not think that it is out of Vanity he speaks of his Ancestors, both Paternal and Maternal, and of his Education: These are as many Heads necessary for his Justification; for his Enemies had endeavoured to render him contemptible in these Particulars, out of hatred to his Honesty, in rejecting the old Legends of his Country (11). 'Patriam & originem paulo accuratius in historia descripsit, alique sua posteris reliquit, ob finitrum quorundam affectum, quibus quasi sudes in oculis erat, ingenua viri in dicendo scribendoque libertas; presertim quoties de jure libertateque Frisiorum mota esset controversia. Coegit quoque hoc facere eum adversariorum iniquitas, qui cum fabulas suas ab eo temni ac refelli indignis ferrent animis, cum convitiis conspuere & boni nominis ejus famam lacerare vellent, eum μυροσποισα esse, hostem patriæ, ignarium ignotumque sibi, & cujus conditionis sit, clamitantes. Quibus ille responsum hoc debuit: * Me quod attinet, sum origine & patria Frisius non minus quam bi qui me flagellant, si modo bujusmodi bi sunt, honesta domo utraque natus, honesta quoque in re, in literis voluntate ac sumptu meorum, sine onere aliorum, honeste domi forsique educatus, idque cum diminutione hæreditatis meæ Adversarii mei affectu in communem patriam & gentem nostram non concedo; sed affectum veritatis in historia vim facere non patior, iniquaque terminos me continere. Verum tradere tuerique ante omnia laboro: Et hunc laborem difficilem Frisiis meis impendo gratis, solo patriæ ac veritatis studio ductus, & hoc inter negotia assiduâ cum valetudinis jacturâ præsto.' — He left an accurate historical Description of his Country and Origin, with some other Compositions, occasioned by the Malice of certain Persons, who were extremely offended at his noble Freedom in speaking or writing, especially when any Controversy was started about the Rights and Liberties of the Frisians. The Virulence of his Adversaries also compelled him to it; enraged that their Fictions were despised and refuted by him, they endeavoured to bespatter him with Calumny, and mangle his fair Reputation, calling him an Enemy and Traitor to his Country, an Uppstart that had forgot himself and his Condition. To whom he made this Reply: As to myself, I am by Birth and Parentage as much a Frisian as my Enemies, if they be such; descended from honourable Families, in honourable Circumstances, and have had an honourable Education, both at home and abroad, to the Diminution of my Patrimony, without being burthenome to any one. In Affection for our common Country I yield not to my Adversaries, but shall confine that Affection within it's Bounds, and not suffer it to pervert the Truths of History. The Cause of Truth is first at my Heart; in it's laborious Defence I willingly enter the Lists, not for Pay, but for the Love I bear to it and to my Country; and herein do I persevere amidst the Hurry of Business, and the daily Decrease of Health.

[F] His chief Learning consisted in History. What some have related of the vast Extent of his Knowledge, accompanied with a most happy and ready Memory, is very hard to be believed. They tell us, that without being prepared, and without mistaking the Circumstances of Time, Place, or Persons, he was able to answer all Questions relating to the History of any Country, both ancient and modern. He knew not only Events, the great Actions and their Motives; but likewise the Interests of Nations, their Form and Government, the Genius of Princes, the Methods they used to aggrandize themselves, their Alliances and Pedigrees. Moreover, he knew the Figure, Situation, and Bigness of Towns and Fortresses, the Position of Rivers and High-ways, the Compaſs of Mountains, &c. Least People should think I amplify the Matter, I shall quote the very Words of his Historian. 'In omni omnium populorum ac gentium historiâ versatissimus, de cujusque gentis ac cujuslibet temporis historiâ rogatus ex tempore differebat, recitatis omnium locorum, temporis, & personarum circumstantiis, haud secus ac si præmeditatus & paratus accederet ad historias istas exponendas; ut satis appareat non fuisse eam superficialiam ipsi cognitionem, quæ multis contigit, sed quæ paucis exactam, solidam, ad interiora penetrantem atque descendentem. Notissimas habebat in veteri & nova historiâ, non solum res gestas, earumque causas & eventus, cujusque populi πολιτείας, sed & urbes arcesque à forma, situ, magnitudine, simulque vias publicas, fluvios, montium tractus, geniumque loci, Principum ingenia, mores, cupiditates, ambitus arteque quibus ad honores grassati, quibus propinquitatibus subnixi, quo sanguine creti (12). — Thoroughly versed in the Histories of all Kingdoms and Countries, at the Request of his Friends he would speak off-hand upon the History of any Nation, at whatever Period of Time, give a Detail of all the Places, Times, and Circumstances of Persons, as if he had come prepared to explain those Histories; from whence it is plain he had not that superficial Notion, which is so frequently to be found, but that scarce, complete, and solid Knowledge, which penetrates into the most secret Parts. He was intimately acquainted with not only the Facts, their Causes and Consequences, and the Interests of every State in ancient and modern History, but likewise with the Form, Magnitude, and Situation of Cities and Forts, public Ways, Rivers, the Tracts of Mountains, the Genius of the Place, the Abilities of the Princes, their Manners and Views, their Counsels, and the Intrigues whereby they had possessed themselves of Dignities, their Alliances and Pedigrees.

[G] He has been commended by several great Men. The Author of his Life has collected several Elogies bestowed upon him by Thuanus, Scaliger, Dowza, Heinsius, David Chytræus, and some others: All which are of great Force, principally those of Scaliger, who gives the Epithet of Divine to Ubbo Emmius's History of Friesland (13).

[H] He left Children behind him. He married at Norden in 1581: his Wife, who died in Child-bed, left him a Son, that lived to the Age of nineteen Years. He remained a Widower for three Years, and then

(12) Vite Prof. Groning. pag. 48.

(13) Hankius de Romanarum Rerum Scripturis, lib. 2, pag. 133, relates part of the Elogies printed with Emmius's Life.

then married Margaret de Berghen, Daughter to a Burgher of Emden, who survived him with two Children, a Son and a Daughter, The Son's Name was Wesselus Emmius: He was Minister of Groningen when his Father died. His younger Brother died at Orleans some few Months before their Father (14).

(14) Taken out of the Life of Ukko Emmius.

(a) Quo (Encolpio Alexander) familiarissimo usus est. Lampridius in Alexandro Severo. c. xxvii.

ENCOLPIUS, Author of an History of the Emperor Alexander, by whom he had been greatly beloved (a). I add two things to what Moreri has said of him. The first is, that This History is not extant, and that the English Writer, who boasts to have translated it from the Greek, justly passes for an Impostor [A]. The second will only be an unravelling of an Action, which Encolpius had described, and which Moreri gives us no account of. I do not pretend, that he was obliged to relate it; but, if I relate it, I hope my Readers will not take it amiss [B].

[A] The English Writer, who boasts to have translated the History of Encolpius from the Greek, justly passes for an Impostor. He lived in the Reign of Henry VIII. and was called Thomas Eliot. He published a Book, intitled, Image of Governance, compiled of the Acts and Sentences notable of Alexander Severus. He boasted, that he had translated this Work from the Greek Manuscript of Encolpius, which a Gentleman of Naples, named Puderic, had lent him. But it was proved (1), that he had taken the Materials from Lampridius and Herodian; that he had misunderstood, or perverted to another sense, several things, which those two Historians have said; and that he had invented many Facts, which they have said nothing of. Selden (2) believed, that he had translated a Greek Manuscript composed by a Modern: but Dr Wotton believes no such thing, and he observes, that Bale, having distributed the Writings of Thomas Eliot into two Classes, the one for Compositions, the other for Translations, has ranked among the first the Work in question; which proves, that at That time, it was not doubted, that the pretended Encolpius was spurious (3). I imagine, that this Thomas Eliot was encouraged to this Fraud by the Success, which the Marcus Aurelius of Guevara met with. I say elsewhere (4), that this Spaniard endeavoured to persuade the World, that he had taken the Life of that Emperor from an old Manuscript, which he gave as a Model of Government: he intitled it, L'Horloge des Princes — The Clock of Princes.

[B] If I report an Action, which Encolpius had described, I hope my Readers will not take it amiss. It is very remarkable. Lampridius relates, that Ovinus, Camillus, a Senator, and of a very ancient Family, aspired to the Empire. Alexander was informed of it, and convinced of it beyond doubt. Upon which he invited Camillus to the Palace, and testified how much he was obliged to him, in that he voluntarily offered to take upon himself the Burthen of Affairs, whereas others must be constrained to do it, against their Will. After this, he carried Camillus to the Senate, who trembled with Fear, being stung with the Remorse of Conscience, associated him to the Empire, and gave him an Apartment in the Palace, made him eat at his own Table, and ordered him to be clothed with Imperial Ornaments, more magnificent than his own. There happened at that time to be some War against the Barbarians, which required the Emperor's Presence. Alexander offered Camillus to take him with him, if he chose not rather to go alone (5).

Alexander, who went on foot, invited Camillus to do the same: but the latter, who was of a nice Constitution, being tired at the end of two Leagues, Alexander obliged him to get on Horseback; and, as he could not even follow him on Horseback more than two days, he ordered him a Coach. At last, Camillus begged, as a Favour, that he might renounce the Empire, protesting, either sincerely, or through Fear, that he had rather die, than live after this manner: and Alexander gave him leave to retire to his Estate in the Country, assuring him that he had nothing to fear, and he even recommended him to the Soldiers. Camillus lived thus a long time upon his Estate. But, afterwards, the reigning Emperor (for it is not believed, that it was Alexander (6)) ordered him to be killed, because he understood War, and was beloved by the Soldiers. Lampridius adds, that the People attributed this Action to Trajan, though none of the Historians of That Prince speak of it, whereas several Authors relate it of Alexander, in the History of his Life (7).

I must add, for the honour of Lampridius, that he has expressly observed, that an Historian ought not to follow popular Opinions, when they agree not with Authors. History, says he, is quite otherwise true than the Reports of the People: since then the Historians of Trajan do not ascribe this Action to him, and that it is attributed to the Emperor Alexander by Those, who have written his Life, we ought to reject the Discourse of the Vulgar, who ascribe it to Trajan. 'Scio Vulgum hanc rem quam contexui Traiani putare: sed neque in Vita ejus id Marius Maximus ita exposuit, neque Fabius Marcellinus, neque Aurelius Verus, neque Statius Valens, qui omnem ejus Vitam in literas miserunt. Contra autem & Septimius, & Achilius, & Encolpius, Vitæ Scriptores, cæterique de hoc talia prædicaverunt: quod ideo addidi, ne quis vulgi magis famam sequeretur, quam historiam, quæ rumore utique vulgi verior reperitur.' This Observation of Lampridius is very judicious. The Fact in question is so remarkable, that the Historians of Trajan would not have forgotten it, if it had belonged to That Emperor. A thousand and a thousand Examples prove, that remarkable Actions and Sayings are ascribed, by the People, sometimes to one King, sometimes to another. The same is practised with regard to Saints: Their Devotees have attributed to certain of them what had already been said of others. It were to be wished, that the Legendaries had, on these occasions, followed the Example of Lampridius.

(6) This is not found in Lampridius, who says only, Sed post justu Imperatoris occisus est. See the Commentaries.

(7) Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs. Tom. III, pag. 345.

ENEAS, or Æneas Tacticus, is one of the most ancient Greek Authors that have written concerning the Military Art [A]. Some Bibliographers (a) affirm, that the Manuscript of his Book is found in the Vatican Library; but I suppose this is only to be understood of a particular Treatise published by Casaubon [B]. Moreri's Faults are of no great Consequence [C].

[A] He is one of the most ancient Greek Authors that have written concerning the military Art. Cineas of Thessaly, Counsellor to Pyrrhus King of Epirus, and Disciple of Epicurus, abridged Eneas's Book concerning the Duty of a General (1). Moreover, in what remains of Eneas, there is no Instance given from any Passage that does not precede the CXXth Olympiad; and if there be mention made of some Machines that began to be in vogue in Aristotle's Time, there is no Account given of some others that were invented some time after Aristotle (2). We may therefore safely say, That if he be not that Eneas of Stymphalia, who was General of the Arcadians about the CIIIth Olympiad (3), he is not far from that Time.

[B] Of a particular Treatise published by Casaubon. In this Treatise Eneas shews the Manner how to sustain a Siege; it was joined to the Edition of Polybius in the Year 1609. The Preface tells us, I. That it is published from a Manuscript Copy of a Book brought from Italy, and that this Manuscript is in the Library of the Most Christian King. II. That Eneas had composed some other Books. Naudé (4) is in the wrong, to say, That the Commentarius Poliorcticus of Eneas differs from the Treatise De toleranda obsidione; for this is the Title of that Treatise in Casaubon's Edition: Ταχτικὸν τε καὶ πολιορκητικὸν ὑπομνημα περὶ τῶς χειρὶ πολιορκούμενον ἀρχέων. Commentarius tacticus & poliorcticus de toleranda obsidione.

[C] Mr Moreri's Faults are of no great Consequence. I. He says, That Eneas wrote a Book of the Military Art, and that Cineas made an Abridgment of that Work.

(a) Gellius's Abbreviatorum.

(4) De Studio Militari, pag. 45.

(1) Ælianus in Tacticis, cap. 1.

(2) Casub. in Prefat. Æneæ de toleranda obsidione.

(3) Xenophon de Rebus gestis Græcorum lib. 7, pag. m. 368. Note, That in the 4th Book of Expedition, Cyri, pag. m. 109, he speaks of another Eneas of Stymphalia, who participated in the Expedition of young Cyrus, towards the End of the XCIVth Olympiad.

(c) Ælian.
Tactic. cap. 1.

(6) Why then does Volius de Sciat. Mathem.
pag. 237, say only, that Cineas made an Abridgment of Æneas' Tactics.

(7) Volius de Hiflor. Græc.
lib. 4, cap. 11.

Work. This is not exact; for Ælian uses the Plural Number when he speaks of Æneas's Works concerning the Military Art: Αἰνείας τε διὰ πλεόνων, καὶ στρατηγικὰ βιβλία ἱκανῶς συντάξάμενος ὡς ἐπιτομὴν δ' Οὐτ' ἁλὸς Κινέας ἐποίησε (5). Æneas qui pluribus libris rem militarem copiose expo-suit: eorum (6) epitomen Cineas Theopompus exposuit: Moreri quotes a Book of Vossius (7), wherein these Words of Ælian are found: Why then did he express himself as he has done? II. He says, That Gesner affirms, That Æneas's Work is in Manuscript in the Vatican Library. Gesner says nothing of Æneas: It is only those that have abridged Gesner who say that Æneas's Book De Re Militari is in the Vatican. Cafaubon applies this to the Treatise De toleranda Opsi-dione. Note, That Vossius, in the 287th Page of his Book De Scientiis Mathematicis, commits the same Mistake with Moreri, in ascribing the same thing to Gesner.

EPHORUS, an Orator and Historian, was of Cumæ in Æolia (a). Isocrates, whose Disciple (b) he was, advised him to write a History. I have said elsewhere (c), that he gave the same Advice to Theopompus, one of his other Scholars; and I have marked the Difference of Genius which was observable between those two Persons. Ephorus, not caring to trouble himself with the Intricacies and Trifles of fabulous Times, began at the Return of the Heraclida to Peloponnesus (d), and he carried down his Work from that famous Epocha to the twentieth Year of the Reign of Philip King of Macedon, Father to Alexander the Great; which is an Interval of about seven hundred and fifty Years. He divided this History into thirty Books, to each of which he added a Preface (e). There are various Opinions as to the Merit of this Author: Some commend him; others blame him, and accuse him of Deceits, both Active and Passive [A]. He composed other Books

[A] Some commend him; others blame him, and accuse him of Deceits both active and passive.] Diodorus

(1) Diod. Sicul.
lib. 4, cap. 1.

(2) Id. lib. 5, init.

(3) In Rem. [C]

(4) 'Ανὴρ ἀξίος μνήμης. Vir memoria dignus.
Strabo, lib. 13,
pag. 428.

(5) Id. lib. 9,
pag. 290.

(6) Id. lib. 10,
pag. 320.

(7) See Strabo,
Ibid. pag. 319.

(8) Id. lib. 10,
pag. 320.

Siculus reckons him for one of the three Historians most in esteem (1). The other two are Callisthenes and Theopompus. After having complained, that many of those who had composed Histories had neglected
the right ordering and distribution of their Subjects, he declares, That Ephorus was not guilty of that Fault; and that his Work was no less to be esteemed for the Elegance of his Style than for his accurate Method: 'Εφορος τὰς κοινὰς πράξεις ἀναγράφων ἡ μόνον κατὰ τὴν λέξιν, ἀλλὰ καὶ κατὰ τὴν οἰκο-νομίαν ἐπιτίτενε. Ephorus rei passim gestas describens non verborum elegantia duntaxat, sed accurata ordinis quoque observatione probi officio historici fungi-tur (2). We shall presently see (3) that he has been preferred to Theopompus; which is a great Commendation. Neither are the Elogies Strabo gives him small; for he looks upon him as a Person whose Memory should be preserved (4): He quotes him often; and the Reason he gives for it is the Exactness of his Enquiries, acknowledged and commended by Polybius, a most competent Judge: 'Εφορος δ' ὅ τὸ πλεόνον χρῆμα διὰ τὴν περὶ ταῦτα ἐπιμέλειαν καθά-περ καὶ Πολύβιος μακροτέρων τυγχάνει ἀνὴρ ἀξιό-λογος. Ephorus quo plurimum utimur ob diligentiam in talibus rebus (quod & Polybius testatur vir magnæ autoritatis) (5). — Ephorus, whom I frequently quote for his Accuracy, of which Polybius, a Man of good Authority, has given his Testimony. Having taken notice of a Fault in that Historian, he adds,
That nevertheless he surpasses the other Historians:
Τοῦτ' οὐδ' ὡς 'Εφορος ἔλεγον ὅμως κρείττω ἐστὶ
καὶ ἀνὴρ ὁ ἐπιστάμενος ὅπως ἐπαινέσας ἀνδρὶν Πολύβιος καὶ φήσας περὶ τῶν Ἑλληνικῶν καλῶς μὲν εὐδίζον, κάλλιστα δ' 'Εφορον ἐξηγεῖσθαι περὶ κτίσεων, συρρενῶν, μεταναστεύων, ἀρχηγετῶν. Talis cum sit Ephorus, aliis tamen est melior: & ipse Polybius ita studiosè eum laudans, dicensque de rebus Græcis Eudoxum bellè, Ephorum optimè scrip-sisse, de origine urbium, cognationibus, migrationibus, dudibus autque autoribus (6). — Such was Ephorus, and superior to the rest; Polybius himself is hearty in his Commendation of him, saying, Eudoxus has written learnedly on the Affairs of Greece; but Ephorus has given us a most beautiful Account of the Origin of their Cities, of their Affinities, their Colonies, and their Chiefs. That Fault is a Contradiction (7), which is plain enough, and the less excusable, because the Author had taken much Pains to clear the Subject, and confute those who had treated it confusedly. He had besides boasted of his Diligence: 'Ο δ' ὡς περ καλῶς δὲ καὶ ἐπιλέγει. ὅτι ταῦτα καὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα διακελεύειν εἰώσμεν, ὅταν ᾖ τι τῶν πραγμάτων ἢ παντὶ ὁδῶς ἀπορέμενον, ἢ ψευδῆ δόξαν ἔχον.
Tamen Ephorus, quasi re præclarè gesta, addit hanc se accuratorem adhibere solere, cum aut dubia omnino res est, aut falsa de ea obtinet opinio (8). — Ephorus, as though he had performed something noble, concludes with saying, that he had accustomed himself to make the most exact Enquiry into such things, as were either altogether dubious, or falsely reported. This is not the only Contradiction he is guilty of: He used sometimes to fall into the same Fault: Δοκεῖ μοι πάναντία ποιεῖν, ὥσθ' ὅτε τῇ πραγμασίᾳ καὶ ταῖς ἐξηρχῆς ὑποσχέσει: videtur mihi nonnunquam contrarium ejus facere quod ab initio instituerat ac promise-rat (9). — Sometimes he seems to have performed the Reverse of what he had proposed. These Words are Strabo's, who immediately gives a Proof of it: For he says, That Ephorus, having censured the Authors who intermix Fables with History, enlarges in Praise of Truth, and promises to observe that Virtue principally in the Account of the Oracle of Delphi: there being nothing more absurd than a Lye, when one speaks of an Oracle so averie to Deceit: Περὶ δὲ τοῦ περὶ τῶν μαντείων λόγου, σημνὴν τινα ὑπόσχεσιν, ὡς πανταχῶ μὲν ἀεὶ νομίζει τ' ἀληθείας, μάλα δὲ κατὰ τὴν ὑπόθεσιν ταύτην ἀποπον γὰρ, εἰ περὶ μὲν τῶν ἄλλων αἰετὸν τοῖσιν τρέπον διακόμεν, ποσὶ περὶ δὲ τῶν μαντείων λέγοντες, ὃ πάντων ἐστὶν ἀψευδέστατον, τοῖς ὅπως ἀπίστοις καὶ ψευδοῖς χρονομάδα λόγοις. Sermoni de hoc oraculo promissum adjicit gravitatis plenum, se cum aliis veritatem maximi facere, tum vel apprimè in hoc ar-gumento. Absurdum enim est (inquit) si veritatem aliis in rebus sectantes, de oraculo dicturi omnium ve-racissimos, ita incredibilibus & falsis utamur narra-tionibus (10). This is very judicious; such a Reflexion does honour both to the Person and Judgment of Ephorus; but the Sequel is not consistent with it:

For the Account that Author gives of the Oracle of Delphi, is but little better than the vulgar Opinion.

He related so many Falsities about Egypt, that he shewed not only that he never travelled there, but also that he had not taken Care to be exactly informed by those who were acquainted with that Country. 'Scriptor hic non solum ipse locorum
'Ægypti naturam non vidisse, sed nec ab iis quibus
'regionis illius ratio cognita est, diligenter percun-
'Status nobis videtur (11). This is the Opinion of Dio-dorus Siculus, who a little after, having convinced him of lying, makes this Reflexion: Οὐκ ἂν τις παρ'
'Εφύρου ζητήσεν ἐκ παντὸς τρόπου τακεῖες, ὅρῶν αὐτὸν ἐν πολλοῖς ὀλιγορηκῶτα τῆς ἀληθείας.
Certi quid apud Ephorum nemo inquireret qui viderit in multis eum negligere veritatem (12). — A Man must expect little Accuracy in Ephorus, if he considers how little Regard he often pays to Truth. Seneca gives us still a worse Opinion of him, when he rejects his Testimony about a Comet. Let us relate the whole Passage, which shews what stress we ought to lay on the Authority of Historians when they speak of Prodigies. 'Nec magna molitione detrahenda est au'thoritas Ephoro: historicus est. Quidam incredibi-'lium relatu commendationem parant, & lectorem a-
'liud acturum, si per quotidiana duceretur, miraculo
'excitant. Quidam creduli, quidam negligentes sunt:
'quibusdam mendacium obrepat, quibusdam placet.
'Illi non evitant, hi appetunt. Et hoc in commune
'de tota natione: quæ approbare opus suum, & fieri
'populare non putat posse, nisi illud mendacio aspercit.
'Ephorus verò non religiosissimæ fidei, sæpe decipitur,
'sæpe

(a) Strabo, lib.
13, pag. 428.

(b) Plotarch in Vita Isocrat.
pag. 837.

(c) In the Article
THEOPOM-
PUS, Rem. [8].

(d) Diod. Sicul.
lib. 4, cap. 1.

(e) Id. ibid. lib.
16, cap. 77, pag.
m. 795.

(9) Id. lib. 9,
pag. 290.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Diod. Sicul.
lib. 1, cap. 39,
pag. m. 35.

(12) Id. ibid.

Books [B]: And there was one written against him, wherein his Plagiarisms were displayed

(13) Sen. Quæst. Nat. lib. 7, cap. 16, pag. m. 903.

(14) Vossius, de Hist. Græcis, pag. 36, 37.

(15) Εφορος ἢ τὸ ἄλλο ἀπὸ τῶν δὲ ἐπὶ τῶν πρὸς τὴν ἱστορίαν ἐκείνων καὶ μὴδὲν ἔχον ἐκείνων. Ephorus ingenio quidem erat simplici: in dictione vero historica supinus, & legis ac contentione carens. — Ephorus as to his Method is indeed regular, but indolent and supine in his Diction, without either Life or Spirit. Suidas, apud Vossium, ibid.

(16) Dionys. Halicarn. de collocat. verborum, cap. 81, pag. m. 58.

(17) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 5, init. I cite his Words above, Citat. (12).

(18) Vossius, ubi supra, pag. 36.

(19) See, above, Citat. (12), the Sequel of it.

(20) Strabo, lib. 13, pag. 428.

(21) Suidas in Εφορος.

(22) Id. ibid.

(23) Harpocrat. voce Δίωος.

(24) Plutarch. de vita Homer. init. apud Vossium, ubi supra.

(25) Jonfius, pag. 67, seems also to ascribe it to him.

(26) Harduin. in indice autorum Plinii. He quotes Polybius apud Strabonem, lib. 10, pag. 465, for the Treatise of Origine Urbium; and the Scholiast of Apollonius, in lib. 4, vers. 269, for the Treatise of Nili Incremento.

(27) Strabo, lib. 7, init. places him among them.

(28) Ibid. lib. 8, init.

(29) Cicero, in Oratore, cap. 51.

saepè decipit (13). — Ephorus writes like an Historian, and his Authority therefore may be easily set aside. For some frame Relations of things incredible, and spirit up the Reader with Tales of Prodigies, who would have given no attention to ordinary occurrences. Some are credulous, and others careless. Upon some Fictions steals unawares, to some it is agreeable; the former do not escape it, and the latter court it. And this is common to the whole herd, who think their Works will never be approved or become popular, unless they be seasoned high with Fable. Ephorus moreover is not a Writer of the best Credit; he is often deceived, and often deceives. You may see in Vossius (14) some Lies of Ephorus, and how much his Style was despised by Duris of Samos, Dion Chrysostomus, and Suidas (15). Dionsius Halicarnassensis (16), and Diodorus Siculus (17), had another Opinion of it, and they were good Judges. Whatever it be, I suppose that all the Lovers of History regret the loss of Ephorus's Writings: For my own part, I regret it very much. Note, that Vossius did not sufficiently characterize all the Errors he reproaches him with; for he blames him for deceiving his Readers, without being deceived himself, when he speaks of the Temple of Hercules (18). * Decipitur quidem, cum . . . tradit . . . decipit autem in eo quod de Herculis fano in Hispania finxit, ut est apud Strabonem initio libri III. & fuerit id genus apud Ephorum permulta. Unde & Diodorus Siculus, lib. 1. ἐκ δὲ τῆς, &c. (19). — He is deceived indeed when he said . . . but deceives in his fictitious Account of Hercules's Temple in Spain, as may be seen in Strabo at the beginning of Book the Third. Ephorus is guilty of several Instances of the same Nature, for which reason Diodorus Siculus in the beginning of Book the First says, a Man must expect little, &c. In the first Place, it is very probable that he said this innocently: What could he get by writing such a thing against his Conscience? He was so ill acquainted with the Affairs of the Spaniards, that he thought they were but one City. Josephus infers from thence, that the Greeks knew but late what concerned the Western Nations. Vossius does not disapprove this Inference. Why then does he think that Ephorus knew the Truth concerning that Temple? In the second Place, Strabo is not well quoted; for he does not denote precisely, whether Ephorus wrote according to, or against his Knowledge. Thirdly, the Passage of Diodorus Siculus does not prove, that there were in Ephorus's Works several Falsities contrary to the Author's own Knowledge: He is only accused of having neglected to be better informed. A severe Critic would find almost every where some unde as ill placed as that of Vossius.

[B] He composed other Books.] A Treatise περὶ τῶν ἐυρημάτων, de Rebus inventis, of which Strabo makes mention (20). Another, περὶ ἀγαθῶν καὶ κακῶν, de bonis ac malis, divided into Twenty four Books (21). Another, περὶ παραδόξων τῶν ἐκαστοῦ, de Rebus passim admirabilibus, divided into fifteen Books (22). Another, περὶ θεῶν καὶ πολιτισμῶν, de Civitatibus Ibraciæ. Harpocrat. quotes the fourth Book of it (23). Another, intitled ἐπιτομή, wherein he treats of his Native Country (24). Father Harduin ascribes to him a particular Treatise of the Origin of Cities (25), and another of the Increase of the Nile; but the Authors, he alleges (26), do not say any such Thing: For Polybius only pretends, that Ephorus explained very well in his History the Foundation of Cities, their Colonies, &c. And as for the Scholiast of Apollonius, his intent was only to quote what Ephorus had said concerning the Nile in the same History. It is not by particular Treatises of Geography that he deserved to have been ranked among Geographers (27), but because he had made it his Business to describe the Places which he was obliged to mention in the Series of his History (28). We must not doubt but that he published some Harangues, or some Treatise of Rhetoric, since Cicero has made use of the Words I am going to quote: * Omitto Iocratem discipuloque ejus Ephorum & Naucratem, quamquam orationis faciendæ & ornandæ autores locupletissimi, summi ipsi oratores esse debeant (29). — I shall pass by Iocrates, and his Scholars Ephorus and Naucratis; for though excellent at composing and embellishing an Oration, yet ought they to be perfect Orators. How can we doubt that he wrote Rhetoric, when we know that his Treatise περὶ λέξεως, de Dictione, has been quoted by Theon. * Eidem (Theoni) & laudatur Εφορος ἐν τῷ περὶ λέξεως. Cujus operis pene initio hexametrum effundere ait (30). — Ephorus's Treatise on Diction is quoted by Theon, at the beginning almost of which, he says, that he breaks out into an Hexameter. These are the Expressions of Vossius, who may be charged with a Fault of Commission, and another of Omission: for he affirms, that the Verse, which was found near the beginning of this Treatise, was an Hexameter. We see no such Thing in Theon; neither does he say, that That Verse was in the same Place where Ephorus condemned the Cadence and Numbers of Discourse: A Circumstance which Theon relates, and which is a Singularity not to be omitted. The Passage of that Sophist, related at length, will discover another Fault of Vossius. Συγνώμης δ' ἔστιν, ὅταν εἰς ἐκείνῃ τις ἐμπέσῃ ποτὶ τὰ μέτρα, ἅπερ ἔχει ὁμοίτητα πρὸς τὰ πεζῶν οἷον ἐστὶ τὸ ἰαμβικόν διὰ καὶ πάντες οἱ συγγραφεῖς, ἀνοητοὶ ἐμπέπτυσιν εἰς τὸ γυναικῶς τετοιοῦτον Εφορος ἐν τῷ περὶ λέξεως, δι' αὐτὰ τὰ ἀπαγορεύοντα λόγον, μὴ τῇ εὐρύθμῳ χρῆσθαι διαλέκτῳ, εὐδὺς ἐν ἀρχῇ στίχον εἰρηκεῖ, εἰπὼν πάντων δὲ περὶ τῆς εὐρύθμης διέξευμαι (31). Venia tamen dari solet iis qui forte in versu, qui quam proxime ad solutam accedunt orationem, incidunt: (32) quales iambici, quod omnibus fere scriptoribus invitis evenire solet. Ephorus certe in libro de sermone, eo ipso loco, ubi nimis numerosam usurpare elocutionem vetat, statim initio versum ipse extulit, hoc modo, Posthac modos orationis inquiram.

It is excusable to fall into such numbers as have some affinity to Verse, such as Iambic, since all Writers are prone to make those slips unawares; as Ephorus in his Treatise upon Diction, when he is declaiming against the soft flow of words, at the very setting out stumbled into Metre.

The modes of Diction must the next be scanned.

Theon had just before without mercy condemned Prose, wherein are found high-sounding lofty Verses, and then he excuses the Verses that resemble Prose, such as are the Iambics; and says, that most Writers run, in spite of themselves, into the Fault of making that sort of Verses. He instances in our Ephorus; but he does not say, as Vossius pretends, that That Verse was almost in the beginning of the Treatise. Note, that what Ephorus has said of Homer (33), was not in a particular Treatise upon that Poet, but in that he composed about his own Native Country (34). His Treatise περὶ ἐυρημάτων was confuted by the Philosopher Strato, as we learn from Pliny; Stratoque qui contra Ephori ἐυρήματα scripsit (35). Thus Father Harduin has corrected the Passage, where we read, contra Ephori Theoremata; which Correction is insinuated by Jonfius (36). Note, that mention is made of an EUPHORUS Author of a Book περὶ τῶν ἐυρημάτων, de Rebus inventis. Vossius (37) pretends that Athenæus has quoted him (38), and that one ought to correct Εὐφορος by writing Εφορος; for, says he, the Author, that Athenæus quotes in that Place, is quite different from the Historian. That might be; but I do not think that the least Proof can be given for it. Father Harduin (39) thought we ought to read Εφορος, just as in the twelfth Chapter of the eighth Book of Athenæus, whose two Passages he applies to Ephorus the Historian. The two Places of Clemens Alexandrinus (40), alleged by Vossius, may very well belong to that same Historian; and therefore there is Reason to believe, that the Transcribers have writ there Εὐφορος instead of Εφορος. This Fault they have committed in the Great Etymologicon (41), where they quote Εὐφορος ἐν τῇ Εὐρώπῃ. There should have been Εφορος; for we learn from Strabo (42), that the fourth Book of Ephorus the Historian was intitled Εὐρώπη. It is Vossius makes this Observation: Why should we not believe that the same Fault is crept into Diogenes Laërtius, according to the Conjecture of Aldobrandinus and Jonfius (43)?

Mr Menage

(10) Vossius ubi supra, pag. 36.

(11) Theophil. Prolegomena, cap. 2, pag. 25.

(12) These Words have been omitted in the Translation, which Herfius has corrected.

(33) See Plutarch. de Homero, & Tatian. ad Græc.

(34) See Scaliger, in Euseb. n. 1101, pag. m. 62.

(35) Plin. lib. 7, in indice, lib. 7.

(36) Jonfius de Script. Hist. Phil. pag. 44.

Whether there has been an Author called Euphorat.

(37) Vossius, ubi supra, pag. 367.

(38) Athen. lib. 4, cap. 25, pag. 182.

(39) Harduin. in Indice Autorum Plinii.

(40) One is in lib. 1. Stromat. pag. 306. The other, ibid. pag. 339.

(41) In voce Εὐρωπῆς apud Vossium, ubi supra.

(42) Strabo, l. 7.

(43) See Mr Menage, in Diogen. Laërt. lib. 1, n. 41, pag. 23.

played [C]. All this is lost. I have spoken elsewhere (f) of the Judgment passed on the long Speeches he inserted in his History. He was very much ridiculed for the manner

(f) In Remark
(g) of the Article
THEOPOM-
PUS.

(44) Ibid.

(45) Scaliger, Anim. in Euseb.
ad ann. 1101,
pag. m. 62.

(46) Euseb. n.
1101.

(47) Euseb. in Iliad. lib. 2, fol. 275, apud
Jonium de Scrip.
Hist. Philol.
pag. 44.

(48) Steph. de vrbis voce Αἰσώτης.

Mr Menage (44) chuses to follow Vossius's Opinion; but this is meer courtesy, since Vossius has not proved his Assertion. The great Scaliger (45) affirms, that in Clemens Alexandrinus, they have written twice Εἰσορῶ instead of Εἰσορῶ; and that by the like Mistake we find Εἰσορῶ for Εἰσορῶ in Diogenes Laërtius, in the Life of Thales. He believes also that the Euphorbus in the Chronicle of Eusebius (46) is no other than our Ephorus, who has first been changed into Euphorbus, and then into Euphorbus. It is certain that Eusebius (47), grounded on the Testimony of Stephanus Byzantinus, has quoted one Euphorbus, who is called Ephorus in the Book of that Stephanus (48). I should readily adopt Scaliger's Opinion; for we must never multiply Authors, no more than any other thing, without necessity.

Here are many trifling Things, will some body say to me. True, say I: But which, at the same time, are found in the Writings of the most learned Men of this Age. It is a Fatality inseparable from Criticism, and with Submission to the Critics I shall make another Remark of the same kind. When the Name of an Author is written so differently in a Book, that there is some ground to think there is more than one Person intended thereby, we must not always accuse the Transcribers; for the Fault may very well be in the Original: No doubt but Athenæus may have written sometimes Εἰσορῶ, sometimes Εἰσορῶ, though he had the same Author in his Thoughts. None will deny but there may be Writers now a-days, who, being often obliged to mention Father Bouhours in a Work of great length, would name him sometimes Bours, sometimes Bouhours, and sometimes Bobours. I have seen Letters written by learned Men, wherein proper Names were spelt sometimes one way, sometimes another. As for Instance: Sometimes Bordeaux or Tholose, and sometimes Bourdeaux or Toulouse. See the Remark [B], of the Article DEMETRIUS, and the Article DURER towards the end.

[C] They wrote a Book, wherein his Plagiarisms were displayed.] Eusebius has preserved us a valuable Fragment of the first Book of Porphyrius, περὶ τῆς φιλολογίας ἀκρίβειας, de erudito auditu, wherein we meet with a Dispute between two learned Men, one of whom preferred Ephorus to Theopompus (49), and the other called Ephorus a Plagiary, and accused him of having transcribed 3000 Lines, Word for Word, from Daimachus, Callisthenes, and Anaximenes. Αὐταὶς λέξεσιν εἰσὶν ὅτε τετραχίλις ὅλως μετατίθεντο στίχους. Τρία nonnunquam versuum millia totidem verbis in sua transferunt (50). I do not find that his Adversary denied the Facts: He contents himself with recriminating, and says only, that Theopompus was a great Plagiary. We shall see in another Place (51) what is meant by that. Porphyrius some Pages after affirms, that there were two Books of one Lyfimachus, περὶ τῆς ἑφόρου κλοπῆς, de furto Ephori, and that Alcæus, a satirical Poet, had exposed and ridiculed the Plagiarisms of that Historian.

Here occurs a small Difficulty. Daimachus, one of the Authors, who according to Porphyrius were pillaged by Ephorus, was sent upon an Embassy to the Court of the Son of Androcottus, King of the Indies: By which it appears, that he lived after Ephorus, and consequently that Porphyrius is mistaken. This is a Chronological Argument, which Vossius (52) has made use of to confute Casaubon (53), who thought that the Daimachus, robbed by Ephorus, is he who was a Native of Plataea, and whom Plutarch (54) and Athenæus (55) have quoted. It is certain that the Author, Athenæus quotes, has written an Account of the Indies, and was of Plataea (56); and therefore that he, of whom Casaubon speaks, is the same with that Daimachus who was sent to the Indies (57), in the Reign of Allitrochades, Son to Androcottus (58). Now the Question is, Whether Ephorus could be the Plagiary of that Daimachus? Chronology, some say, is against it; for Androcottus was King of the Indies when Seleucus laid the Foundation of that Power to which he arrived afterwards (59). Vossius lays no great Stress upon this Reason: Cave igitur putes, says he (60), after having alleged the same, Ephorum plerumque hujus Daimachi in historiâ suâ totidem verbis transcripsisse. . . . nam Ephorum tanto esse antiquiorem satis ex his quæ supra diximus liquet. — Be cautious

VOL. II.

therefore how you believe that Ephorus took a great part of his History, Word for Word, from this Daimachus; for from what has been said above, it is sufficiently proved that Ephorus was the more antient. For my part, I lay no Stress upon it. Ephorus studied Eloquence under Isocrates at the same time with Theopompus. The latter was but Forty five Years old (61) when Alexander restored him to his Country. He saw Ptolemy on the Throne of Egypt. Why then may not we believe, that Ephorus lived to the perfect Establishment of Seleucus's Monarchy? Nothing hinders us from supposing that Androcottus's Reign was not long, and that Daimachus was advanced in Years when he was sent into the Indies. He might therefore have published Histories before he went upon his Embassy; Ephorus might have perused them, and have scrupled no more to collect from them, than he did from those of Anaximenes his Cotemporary. It must not be pretended that Porphyrius believed that Ephorus pillaged the History of the Indies written by Daimachus: For undoubtedly he meant some other Work, such as might be the History of the Greeks, plainly ascribed by Plutarch to the same Daimachus (62), who made also a Treatise De bellicis machinamentis (63), and perhaps also a Treatise of Religion (64). If Mr Menage (65) had well examined all these things, he would not have adopted Vossius's Opinion. It has likewise been adopted in the Collection of Plagiaries (66), wherein it was expected a Method would have been found to clear Porphyrius, of which he has no manner of need. Eadem reprehensio in Porphyrium cadit ad quem provocat Casaubon, nisi vel doceant eruditi alium quendam fuisse Daimachum Ephoro supparem aut antiquiorem, vel nomen Daimachi apud Porphyrium fuisse corruptum (67). — The same charge will lie against Porphyry to whom Casaubon appeals, unless the Learned can shew there was another Daimachus cotemporary with or more antient than Ephorus, or that the Name of Daimachus in Porphyry has been corrupted.

For the rest, all the Curious are obliged to Eusebius for having saved from Shipwreck so fine a Fragment of Porphyrius; but methinks he ought not to have made use of it in a Work, intitled Preparatio Evangelica: for of what Advantage is it either to advance Christianity, or to confound the false Deities, that Greek Authors have been Plagiaries one upon another? Is not this a Custom of all Countries, and of all Ages? Did not the Fathers of the Church themselves take things one from another? Is not the same daily practised between Catholic and Catholic, and between Protestant and Protestant? Eusebius was more judicious when he shewed, that the Greeks had played the Plagiaries with the Barbarians (68): For this serves, in some manner, to support the sacred Histories. From whence we may infer by the Way, that it was less disadvantageous to the Greeks to steal from one another, than to plunder Foreign Riches. This Disadvantage however is an Exception to the general Rule. Marin said, to take from those of one's own Nation, was a Theft; but to take from Strangers was a Conquest; And I think he was in the Right. We study only to learn, and we learn only to shew that we have studied. These are the Words of Mr Scuderi (69). 'If I have taken something, continue he, from the Greeks or Latins, yet I have taken nothing from the Italians, Spaniards, or French; esteeming that what is Learning among the Ancients, is Theft among the Moderns.' La Mothe le Vayer is of the same Opinion; for see what he says in one of his Books. 'To take from the Ancients, and make one's Advantage of what they have written, is like pirating beyond the Line; but to steal from one's Cotemporaries, by appropriating to one's self their Thoughts and Productions, is like picking Pockets in the open Street (70).' I believe all Authors agree upon this Maxim, that it is better to rob the Ancients than the Moderns; and that, amongst the latter, we ought rather to spare our Countrymen than Strangers. Literary Piracy is not in all things like that of Privateers. The latter think themselves less criminal when they commit their Piracies in the New World, than if they did it in Europe. Authors, on the contrary, go more boldly a privateering in the Old World, and have Reason to hope they will be commended (61) See his Article.

(62) Plutarch, ubi supra.

(63) Πολορκητικὰ ὑπομνήματα. See Stephanus Byzantinus. Voc. Αἰσώτης.

(64) See Plut. in Vita Lyandri, pag. 439.

(65) Menagius, Not. ad Diogen. Laërt. lib. 1, n. 30.

(66) Thomasius, de Plagio Literario, pag. 180.

(67) Id. ibid.

(68) Euseb. Prep. Evang. lib. 10, cap. 5.

OBSERVATIONS upon the various Ways of Plagiarism.

(69) Scuderi's Preface to Alastor.

(70) La Mothe le Vayer, Letter 139, pag. 261, of the twelfth Tome.

9 K

(g) Plut. de Repugn. Stoic. pag.
1043. D.

(b) Lib. I, cap. 9.

manner in which he mentioned his Native Country [D]. He left a Son, of whom I shall say something [E]. He might have followed the Court of Alexander, where he was invited; but he refused that Honour (g). Diodorus Siculus (b) does not approve what he owns, that the Barbarians were ancients than the Greeks.

(71) Scuderi,
ubi supra.

commended for the Prize they shall make in it. ' He ' who has made Annotations on the Jerusalem of ' Tasso, thought he did him Credit, by marking in ' his Poem two or three Thousand Places imitated
' from divers Authors: And the Commentators of *Pe-
' trarch* and Ronsard have also done the same (71).
' All Plagiaries, when it is in their Power, follow the Plan of the Distinction I have alledged; not out of a Scruple of Conscience, but rather that they may not be found out. If a young French Minister makes use of the Sermons of Mr Daille, or some other Minister of his Nation, how shall he conceal his Theft? Ought he not to fear, that his Auditors will soon find where he took that Booty? It is Prudence therefore for him to lead them into an unknown Country, and to set himself off with the Spoils of an English Preacher. Woe to him however, if there happen to be too great a Disproportion between his Theft, and what he racks to it of his own (72):
for it gives good Judges occasion to think, not only that he is a Plagiary, but likewise an awkward one.
They perusew themselves he has spoiled excellent Matter, and that he stole it, since he has put it in so ill a Form (73). The best Remedy for this is good for nothing: It would be, to deliver what one borrows without changing any Things; but this is the highest Crime, in things of this kind. ' We may ' steal, after the manner of Bees, without wronging
' any Body: but the Theft of the Ant, which takes ' away the whole Grain of Corn, is not to be imitat' ed (74). If you like this Thought best in Latin, read what follows. ' Multum interest apum more cir-
' cumvolantibus agilis Thynea ex variis floribus odorem
' excerpas, an vero ignavium fucos pecus imitando
' mel ex alveariis suffuseris.' It is what Frischlin represented to his Antagonist.

(72) Purpureus late qui splendeat unus & alter
affuitur pannus.
Horat. de Arte Poet.

(73) Qui bene
vertendo & casdem describendo male, ex Græcis
bonis latinas fecit non bonas. Terentius, in Prologo Eunuchi, ver. 7.

(74) La Mothe
le Vayer, ubi
supra, pag. 260.

[D] He was very much ridiculed for the manner in which he mentioned his Native Country.] In those days, says he, the City of Cumæ was quiet. Σκῆπτται δὲ καὶ ὁ Ἔκτορος Διὸς τῆς πατρίδος ἐκ ἔχον ἐργὰ φράζειν ἐν τῇ διατριβῇ τῶν ἀλλαντοφάρων, ὃ μὴ ἔδαν ἀμνημονεῖν αὐτὴν εἶναι θέλον, ὥςτος ἀποφάνει. Κατὰ δὲ τὸν αὐτὸν καὶ τὸν Κυμαῖοι τὰς παύχας ἦνον. Epborus notatur false, quid in rerum gestarum enumeratione cum nihil haberet quiddā sibi diceret aetium & tamen patriae vellet mentionem facere, ita acclamaverit: Eo tempore quieti erant Cumæi (75). Had it not been much better to have said nothing of that People, than to bring them upon the Stage to so little Advantage?

(75) Strabo, lib.
13, pag. 428.

[E] He left a Son, of whom I shall say something. This Son was called Demophilus; who, being a Man of Learning, was thought to have put the last Hand to his Father's History, that is, that he finished, toward the end, what his Father Ephorus left imperfect. Hence it is, that Ateneus (76), being obliged to quote the last Book of that Work, seems uncertain whether he ought to ascribe it to Ephorus, or to Demophilus. Father Harduin does not well understand this; for he supposes (77) that Ateneus doubts whether the thirty Books, which that History contained, were the Work of the Father, or of the Son. Junius's Conjecture appears to me to be solid. ' Causa quare ita dubitet, (Ateneus) says he (78), est quod Ephorus scripsit non ita pridem confecti historiam imperfectam filio pertendamus forte reliquerit — The reason of this doubt of Ateneus is this, that Ephorus might possibly leave an imperfect History of the late War, to be finished by his Son. Five or six Lines after, he speaks no more dubiously, but affirmatively, grounding himself on the Authority of a famous Historian. ' Brevi autem post . . . historiam suam Ephorus imperfectam nequid absolutum Demophilus filio tradidit pertendamus, teste Diodoro. Ut ita Ateneus historiam belli Phocici à patre & filio simul descriptam; utrique eorum dubie non immerito tribuat (79). . . . Soon after Ephorus left his History unfinished to his Son Demophilus to be completed as Diodorus testifies. So that Ateneus may justly doubt whether to ascribe the History to the Father or Son, since it was wrote jointly by both. I do not find that Diodorus Siculus observes, that Ephorus charged his Son to supply what was wanting in his History; and methinks, if Junius had read it in Diodorus Siculus, he ought not to have spoken sometimes dubiously forte, sometimes in a decisive Tone.

(76) Athen. lib
6, cap. 4, pag.
232.

(77) Harduinus, in indice Auto-rum Plinii.

(78) Jonsius, de Scriptor. Hist.
Philos. pag. 43.

(70) Id. ibid.
pag. 44.

EPICURUS, one of the greatest Philosophers of his Age, was born at Gargettium [A] in

[A] He was born at Gargettium.] For this Reason Statius call him Gargettius Auctor (1), and Senior Gargettius.

(1) Stat. lib. 2,
Silva 2, ver. 113

Deliciæ quas ipse suis digressus Athenis Mallet deserto Senior Gargettius horto (2).

(3) Id. lib. 1,
Silva, 3, ver. 93

*Joys, which the old Gargettian Sage approv'd,
From his own Athens to his Grot remov'd.*

Cicero had shewn him the Way. Catius . . . quæ ille Gargettius, etiam ante Demetrius εἰσάγα, bis spectra nominat (3). Elhan (4), and several others, have made use of the same Surname, when they speak of our Epicurus. I wonder therefore how Crucius could believe, that Stobæus, by using this Surname, meant another Epicurus. Neuerbelski, says he, Stobæus often mentions a certain Epicurus, whom he also surnames Gargettius. People do not speak of, when mention is made of the Great Epicurus; or if they do, they deserve to be exploded as a silly Country Squire was, who said, One Turanne (5). Let Crucius take his Choice; and whatever side he takes, he will be guilty of a blunder. If he says, that he thought that the Gargettius Epicurus of Stobæus is the Founder of the Epicurean Sect, he will own he has spoken impertinently; the Terms of Epicuri cujusdam, are not to be used when one speaks of that Founder (6). If he says, he knew not that the Epithet

(3) Epist. 16,
lib. 15, ad Famil

(4) Lib. 4, cap.
13, Var. Histor

(5) Menage, Anti-Baillet, Tom. I pag. 39. I hear him say it in one of his Assemblies upon occasion that a Person, there present, had said, That a certain Mr Co^{pe} had done certain Thing.

(6) See, above, Rem. [F] of the Article ARNAULD (ANTONY), Doctor of the Sorbonne.

ject of this Article. I believe, that, remembering that there have been several Persons of the Name of Epicurus (7), he fancied that he, to whom Stobæus gives the Epithet of Gargettius, is one of those that differ from the Founder of the Epicurean Sect. That my Reader may judge whether my Conjecture be well grounded, I shall set down the whole Passage of Crucianus; which I take out of his Commentary upon these Words of Horace, Gallis banc Philodemum, that are in the 121st Verse of the second Saire of the first Book. 'Fuit hic Philodemus Epicurus (ut Strabo scribit) patria Gadaraeus, quem Alconius Pedianus in Oratione Cic. pro Lucio Pione scribit Epicureum fuisse eamque notissimum: sed arbitratur apud Alconium legendum esse pro Epicureum, Epicurum didicim, ut habet Strabo, vel hunc ex illo restituendum: tamen Epicuri cujusdam (quem etiam Gargettium nominat) frequens est mentio apud Stobæum. — Tibi Philodemus Epicurus, as Strabo writes, was by Birth a Gadaraene, whom Alconius Pedianus, on Tully's Oration for L. Pison, makes to have been the same with Epicurus: the most renowned Philosopher of his Age: but I fancy we ought to read in Alconius, instead of Epicurus, Epicurus, as Strabo has it, or that the latter should be restored by the former. There is however frequent mention made, in Stobæus, of a certain Epicurus, whom he first names Gargettius.' This tamen shews, that the Author had rather that they should put the Word Epicurus in Alconius Pedianus, than the Word Epicureus in Strabo; and I do not even know whether he would not insinuate, that the Epicurus Gargettius of Stobæus, and the Epicurus Gadaraeus of Strabo, differ only because the Transcribers have mis-spelt their Names. However he manifestly insinuates, that since Stobæus has mentioned a Gargettian Epicurus, it is very pro-

(7) Diogenes Laërtius, lib. 10
n. 26, reckons
four. Mr Menage, ibid. reckon-three more; beside which Gassendus
Præfat. de Vita & Moribus Epīcuri, speaks of an Epicurus, a Maker of Plasters, mentioned by Galen.

in Attica, the third Year of the CIXth Olympiad (a) [B]. His Father Neocles, and his Mother Cherefrata [C], were among those Inhabitants of Attica, whom the Atthenians sent into the Isle of Samos (b). This is the Reason why Epicurus passed his Youth in that Island, and did not return to Atbens till he was eighteen Years old (c). He did not design to settle there; for at the Age of twenty three, he went to his Father, who lived at Colophon, and afterwards he travelled and sojourned in several Places before he fixed at Atbens, as he did, being about thirty six Years old (d). He set up a School in a fine Garden which he purchased (e), and there passed his Time with his Friends

(a) Diog. Laërt. in Epicuro, lib. 10, n. 14.
(b) Ibid. n. 1.
(c) Ibid.
(d) Gassendi de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 1, cap. 3.
(e) Laërtius, ubi supra, n. 16.

Let the lean Hag her Eggs and Sulphur bring,
And, round the Bed-place, walk the magic Ring.

This Trade of an Exorcist was not accounted honourable. The Orator Æschines, Son to a Woman who had practised it, was ignominiously reproached with it by Demosthenes. Epicurus's Case was the same; for they had both afflicted their Mother in that Ceremony: And as Demosthenes reproached the one with it, so did the Stoics the other. Here is what one of the modern Commentators of Laërtius (16) has remarked upon these Words, 'καθαρμὸς ἀναγινώσκων. Eadem exprobat Æschini Demosthenes in Orat. de Coron. (17). Τῇ μητρὶ τέλει τὰς βίβλους ἀναγινώσκων καὶ τὰλλα συνεσκευάσας, &c. Nempe Epicuri mater dicitur fuisse anicula patriæ quæ domos circumibat, & pialulo aliquo contactus solvebat aut totam domum expiabat. Epicurus vero matri præbait carmen piacular: utrumque ministrum ἀτιμῶν. Note, that some famous Authors have composed such Forms of Expiation (18). It may be objected to me, that it does not appear that the Forms of Cherefrata, and her Son Epicurus, were Exorcisms of Hob-goblins: But nevertheless, Mr du Rondel had Reason to advance what he did; for it is unquestionable that the Ancients had certain Rites to drive away Spectres. Lomeierus has quoted Ovid (19), Valerius Flaccus (20), and Lucian (21). Now see how the Turn Mr du Rondel gives the Thing is advantageous to Epicurus. That Philosopher professing to believe, that the Gods did not concern themselves with human Affairs, was thereby suspected of Impiety, which rendered him odious and infamous: Therefore nothing can be more effectual to preserve his Reputation, than to say, that from his tender Infancy he went from House to House to read Prayers for the Service and Comfort of his Neighbours; which was an Act of superstitious Piety.

II. The second curious Thing, which might have been said of Cherefrata, is, that, according to her Son's Opinion, she had in the Composition of her Person that quantity of Atoms, whose concurrence is necessary to form a Sage. 'Ἡ δὲ μήτηρ ἀτόμους ἔσχεν ἐν αὐτῇ ποσάνας, οἱ αὖτε συνελθόντες σοφὸν ἀν' ἐγγίνυσαν. Matrem quoque suam in se tot tantisque habuisse atomos quarum congressu sapiens ederetur (22). Plutarch mentions this as a Proof of Epicurus's Vanity. This Proof is not ill chosen; for indeed it is great Presumption in a Man to believe that he was formed of choice Atoms, and that Nature has taken care to gather in the Body of his Mother all the Ingredients necessary for the Formation of a Sage. I know no Body that has related faithfully this Passage of Plutarch: For every Body imagines that it was Neocles, Brother of Epicurus, who said such a thing of his Mother. Gassendus, who understood Greek very well, would not have committed that Fault (23), if he had had recourse to the Original; but because he supposed the Translations to have been faithful, he gave himself no further Trouble. The Latin Version, and that of Amiot, are such, as one cannot say but that they contain the meaning of the Original: Nevertheless they are defective, because they are both equally capable of two Interpretations. They may as well signify that Neocles said This, as that Epicurus said it. From whence we may infer, by the by, that the Vaugelas's and the Bonhours's have more Reason than it is generally thought to recommend such a Structure of the Words, as may exclude the minutest Ambiguities. Naudæus had committed this Fault before Gassendus. Neocles, says he (24), said in Praise of Epicurus, his Brother, that at the Time he was begot, Nature had assembled in the Belly of his Mother all the Atoms of Prudence. It is plain, that this is a very loose Paraphrase, or rather a Falsification of the Greek of Plutarch. Father Rapin is still more out of the Way. 'Epicurus, says he (25), was naturally bable that Strabo speaks of a Gadarean Epicurus; which, methinks, is as much as to distinguish those two Epicurus's from him who was the Founder of a Sect. Several other Things might be criticized upon in Craquius. I. That Philodemus of Horace is not the same with him of Alconius Pedianus: For the Maxims of Horace's Philodemus, in Matters of Love, are directly opposite to those of Pedianus's Philodemus (8). II. It is not true, that one may read in Strabo (9) Epicurus instead of Epicureus. III. The Oration of Cicero is not for Piso, but against him, and a very violent one too.

[B] . . . The third Year of the CIXth Olympiad.] We must correct here an Error of Vossius, who places the Death of Epicurus in the CVIth Olympiad. 'At Epicurus est mortuus Olymp. CVII. quo tempore Philippus Alexandri M. parens, duodecimum regnabat annum (10). . . . But Epicurus died in the CVIth Olympiad, in the twelfth Year of the Reign of Philip, 'Father of Alexander the Great. We cannot excuse him, by saying he wrote Olympiad CXXVII, which is the true Time of that Philosopher's Death (11), but that the Printer left out two Numerical Letters. This Apology would avail him nothing in this Place; for it would throw him into an Error as palpable as that from which one would clear him, and charge him with believing that the twelfth Year of the Reign of Philip, Father to Alexander the Great, belonged to the CXXVIIth Olympiad. Let us therefore conclude, that the Fault was in his Manuscript. Now it is very strange his Memory failed him so far that Day, as to let him write, that Epicurus died before Alexander ascended the Throne.

[C] And his Mother Cherefrata.] I know not upon what ground Mr Moreri says, She was born of a very Noble Family. Laërtius and Gassendus, whom he quotes, say nothing of it. He calls her Cherecrata in the Article of Epicurus, which is his second Mistake. He may also be charged with Faults of Omission; for there were two curious Things to be said of this Woman.

I. She went with her Son, even into Houses that were uninhabited, to drive from thence Hob-goblins by Prayers. It is thus Mr du Rondel (12) has interpreted this Greek Passage of Diogenes Laërtius. Σὺν τῇ μητρὶ περιπλῖντα αὐτὸν ἐς τὰ οἰκίστρα καθαρμοὺς ἀναγινώσκων (13). He has explained the thing more at large in his Latin Edition, and always to Epicurus's Advantage. 'Certum est, says he (14), Epicurus ut pote pusionem & matris affectum hinc hausisse pietatem suam ineffabilem, ὁσιότητα ἀλεχτόν, ex illoque tempore fuisse Divis addiditissimum, ut patet ex illa portentificâ superstitione, quâ cum matre Epicurus circumuendo ædicularum carmina lustralia, καθάρματα, legeret, vel ad affectus moderandos, vel ad spectra abigenda; quasi Hecates diaconi fuissent, in cujus nomine pleraque patrare tum poterant miracula. — It is certain, says he, that from hence Epicurus, as being an attendant on his Mother, sucked in his unspeakable Piety, and from that time became intirely devoted to Religion, as is manifest from that Excess of Superstition, which appeared in his accompanying his Mother; and reading the expiatory Forms, either to soften the Disorders of the afflicted, or to drive away Spectres, as though they were Ministers of Hecate, in whose name they could then perform many Miracles.' When I say, he has turned the Thing to Epicurus's Advantage, I do not mean to charge him with pretending that Cherefrata's Employment was honourable. He has too much Sense and Erudition, not to know that the practice of those old Women was looked upon as mean and mercenary, who made it their Business to go and read certain Forms of Prayer, in order to purify Houses or Persons.

Et veniat quæ lustrat anus lectumque, locumque, Præferat & tremula sulphur & ova manu (15).

(8) See Mr Dacier, upon the 2d Satire of the 1st Book of Horace, pag. m. 176.

(9) Lib. 16, pag. 522. Diogenes Laërtius, lib. 10, n. 3, calls that Philosopher an Epicurean. See Stobæon Mr Menage, who agrees with the old Scholiast of Horace, that this Poet has spoken of that Philodemus.

(10) Vossius, de Histor. Græc. lib. 1, cap. 21, pag. m. 137.

(11) Laërt. ubi supra, n. 15.

(12) Du Rondel, in the Life of Epicurus, pag. 3, & 4.

(13) Diog. Laërt. in Epicuro, lib. 10, n. 4.

(14) Du Rondel, in Vita & Moribus Epicuri, pag. 3.

(15) Ovid. de Arte Amandi, lib. 2. See Lomeier de Illustrationibus Gentilium cæd. 13, pag. 119.

(16) Joachimus Kuhnus, pag. 544. Edit. Laërtii Amstel. 1692.

(17) See Lomeier de Illustrationibus, p. 119.

(18) Epimenides is one of them. See Vossius de Poetis Græcis, pag. 17.

(19) Fassor lib. 5, apud Lomeierum, ubi supra, pag. 231, 232.

(20) Argon lib. 3, v. 448. apud Eum. pag. 309.

(21) In Necyom. apud eund. pag. 313.

(22) Plut. in Tractatu quod non possit suavititer vivi juxta Epicurum, pag. 1100. A.

(23) De Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 1, cap. 8.

(24) Apologie des Grans Hommes, cap. 17, pag. m. 502.

(25) Reflexions on Philosophy, n. 20, pag. 361, Dutch Edit. 1686. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, May 1686. Art. 4, pag. 528, where in it is only insinuated, that this Passage of Plutarch is ill translated.

Friends in great Tranquillity, and taught a great number of Disciples. They lived all in common with their Master [D]; and there had never been a Society so well regulated

* naturally wise, being a Philosopher even in Pleasure: * He was so enlightened, that his Brother Neocles says in Plutarch, that Nature had assembled all the Atoms of Wisdom and Knowledge to compose his Person, whilst he says himself that he knows nothing. The best of it is, to see that he alleges, as a Proof of Epicurus's Modesty, what Plutarch had mentioned to convict him of Pride. Rapin supposes, that Epicurus, out of Humility, rejects the Praises his Brother offers him, whereas it is himself arrogates those Praises in the Author cited: so true it is, that when one ventures to apply Passages not taken in their Source, or to draw Inferences from them before one is certain of the literal and natural Meaning, he exposes himself to strange Blunders! Mr Chevreau has followed Gassendus's and Father Rapin's Error. See the second Page of the first Tome of the Chevreauana.

[D] His Disciples lived all in common with their Master.] Laërtius (26) says, that Epicurus had so many Friends, that even whole Towns could not have contained them. They flocked to him from all the Cities of Greece and Asia (27). And even Egypt sent him Disciples (28). The Town of Lampyrus, where he had professed Philosophy (29), furnished him with many. He would not imitate Pythagoras, who taught, That among Friends all things ought to be common; he found that such a Regulation denoted Distrust (30), and therefore chose rather to establish such a Society, wherein every one should freely contribute towards the Wants of others, when there was occasion. It is certain, that this Notion comes nearer Perfection than the Community of Goods; and one cannot sufficiently admire the Union of Epicurus's Disciples, and the Generosity with which they relieved one another, every one continuing Master of his own Inheritance. Here is a fine Passage out of Cicero. 'De qua (amicitia) Epicurus quidem ita dicit, omnium rerum quas ad beate vivendum sapientia com-paraverit, nihil esse majus amicitia, nihil uberius, nihil jucundius. Neque vero hoc oratione solum, sed multo magis vita, & moribus comprobavit. Quod quàm magnum sit, scilicet veterum fabulæ declarant, in quibus tam multis tamque variis ab ultima antiquitate repetitis, tria vix amicorum paria reperiuntur, ut ad Orestem pervenias profectus à Theleo. At vero Epicurus una in domo, & ea quidem angusta, quàm magnos, quantaque amoris conspiratione contententes tenuit amicorum greges? Quod sit etiam nunc ab Epicureis (31). — Of which (Friendship) Epicurus thus speaks. Of all things which Wisdom has found to make Life happy, nothing is greater, nothing is more fruitful, nothing is more agreeable than Friendship. Nor did he maintain this Doctrine in Words only, but much more in his Life and Conversation. How uncommon a thing this is, the Legends of the Antients declare, in which, though the greatest variety of Subjects occurs, scarce three couple of Friends are to be found in the whole Collection, from Theleus down to Orestes. Yet what multitudes of Friends, united by the sweetest Harmony, did Epicurus's little House contain? which harmony is still kept up by his Followers.' Now after all this, who will dare to affirm, that People that deny Providence, and lay their supreme Good in their own Satisfaction, are no way capable to live in Society, but must of necessity be Traytors, Cheats, Poisoners, Thieves, &c. Are not all those fine Assertions confounded by this single Passage of Cicero? Does not a Matter of Fact, such as Cicero is Witness of, overthrow a hundred Volumes of speculative Reasonings? Here is Epicurus's Sect, whose practical Morals about the Duties of Friendship have still been the fame for several Ages; and we are going to shew, that whereas the most devout Sects were full of Quarrels, and divided into Parties, that of Epicurus enjoyed a profound Peace. There they followed without Dissensions and Contradictions the Doctrine of the Founder (32). 'Dolet profecto mihi eos (Successores Platonis) omnia molitos non esse ut plenam sibi atque integram in omnibus cum Platone consensum defenderent. Et ea quidem Plato dignus erat, qui magno illo Pythagora ut melior non fuerit, non fuit tamen fortasse deterior: quem discipuli quod sequuti omnes ac venerati fuerint, id etiam egere potissimum, ut summo apud omnes in pretio habeatur. Hoc ipsum Epicurei, perperam illi quidem, sed tamen cum intelligerent, nulla unquam in re ab Epicuro diffidere visi sunt, sed potius eadem omnino se cum Sapiente suo sentire professi, jure propterea id nominis habuere. Quin etiam, qui longissimo deinceps intervallo consequuti Epicurei sunt, il nec abs se mutuo, nec ab eodem Epicuro tantillum, quod quidem meminisse attingat, discessere. Imo sceleris apud eos, vel potius impietatis ille damnetur, qui novi quippiam invenit. Quare nemo prorsus id audeat. Sed eorum dogmata ob constantem illam omnium inter se perpetuamque concordiam, in altissima quadam & tranquillissima pace versantur. Ita hæc Epicuri secta veræ cuidam Republicæ persimilis est, quam ab omni seditione remotissimam, mens quædam una communis, unaque sententia moderetur. Quam illi disciplinam & antea sequuti sunt multi peribenter, & sequuntur etiam nunc, atque adeo, ut simillimum veri est, in posteram sequentur. At Stoicos inter factiones extirpare, quæ ab ipsis eorum commissæ Principibus, ad nos uique propagatæ sunt (33). — I am heartily concerned that the followers of Plato have not strove to the utmost, to maintain a perfect compliance to his Principles. Plato indeed merited this, who, as he was not superior, so perhaps was not inferior to the great Pythagoras, whom his Followers, as they copied and adored him themselves, laboured likewise to make universally honoured. The Epicureans have done the same. They indeed are in the wrong, yet, when they had well considered it, they never appeared to deviate the least from Epicurus, but altogether professed the same Opinion with their wise Founder, and have therefore justly deserved that Denomination. The Epicureans also, who followed at the greatest interval of Time, had not the least material difference, either with themselves, or Epicurus. Nay, an Innovator amongst them would be condemned of Basileus, or rather of Impiety. For which reason no one is so hardy to attempt it. From that constant and uninterrupted Harmony, their Tenets enjoy the most profound Tranquillity. So that this Sect of Epicurus is like a well modelled State, which, secure from all Sedition, is governed by one common Consent and mutual Concurrence. Many have voluntarily embraced this Discipline, which they still pursue, and in all probability for ever will maintain. But amongst the Stoics, Factions have arisen, which, begun by the very Leaders of that Sect, have been propagated down to us.' This was said by a Man who lived in the 11d Century: The Union of Epicurus's Disciples had preserved it self till then, and seemed not threatened with any Interruption. This is what Numenius testifies: And I do not know that his Conjecture has been proved false.

I will perform in this Place a Promise I made in the last Lines of the Article CARNEADES. One Thing charged upon Epicurus, was his having spoken satirically of the most illustrious Philosophers. Diogenes Laërtius (34), to shew the senselessness of this Calumny, contents himself to say, that there were sufficient Proofs of Epicurus's Civility, and extreme Meekness towards every Body. He alleges the Statues of Bras erected to that Philosopher, the great number of his Friends, the unalterable Attachment of all his Disciples to him, and the perpetual Succession of his School. He says, that Epicurus's Lectures were a Syren's Song, that captivated all his Hearers, except Metrodorus of Stratonice, who left him to follow Carneades: Οἷτε γινώσκοντες πάντες, ταῖς δογματικαῖς αὐτῆς σιρήσι προκατασχέδοντες, πλὴν Μητροδόρου τῆς Στρατονικίας πρὸς Καρνέαν ἀπαρχοῦσαντος, τάχα βαρυνθέντες ταῖς ἀνυπερβλήτοις αὐτῆς χρυσίταισι. That is, according to the Latin Version, printed with the Greek of Diogenes Laërtius: Præterea omnes discipuli quos illius dogmaticæ syrenes occuparunt: præter unum Metrodorum Stratonicensem, qui ab illo se ad Carneadem contulit: cui forte gravis erat viri incomparabilis donitas. According to this Translation, Epicurus's unparalleled good Nature was the occasion of Metrodorus's going from him. This Sense, at first sight, shocks the Readers, but it agrees perfectly well with Diogenes Laërtius's Design; and when one seriously reflects on the odd Caprices of (26) Lib. 10, n. 9.

(27) See Gassendus ubi supra, cap. 7.

(28) Id. ibid. ex Plutarcho.

(29) During four Years according to Suidas.

(30) Laërt. ibid. n. 11.

(31) Cicero, de Finibus, lib. 1, cap. 20.

(32) Ea quæ Epicuro placerunt, ut quædam Solonis aut Lycurgi leges ab Epicureis omnibus servari. Theophrastus, Orat. 4, apud Gassendum, ubi supra, lib. 2, cap. 5. Apud istos quicquid dicit Hermachus, quicquid Metrodorus ad unum refertur, Omnia quæ quicumque in illo consensu loquutus est, unus ductus & auspiciis dicta sunt. Seneca, Epist. 33.

(33) Numenius, apud Euseb. Præpar. Evang. lib. 14, cap. 5, pag. 727.

(34) Laërt. lib. 10, a. 9.

regulated as this. The Respect his Followers paid to his Memory, is to be admired: For his School was never divided; and his Doctrine was followed, and revered as an Oracle (f). His Birth-day was still observed in Pliny's Time; and even the whole Month wherein he was born was a perpetual Festival. They put up his Picture every where (g). He wrote many Books, and valued himself on his making no Quotations [E]. He brought the Atomical System into great Reputation. He was not the Inventor of Man's Heart, it does not seem incredible, that some Men may be importuned and fatigued by the excessive Goodness and Complaisance of their Benefactor. Therefore if we suppose, that Diogenes Laërtius meant, that Metrodorus, who was the only Disciple of Epicurus that went from him, was perhaps prompted to it, because Epicurus's Excess of Goodness was troublesome to him, we shall find a conclusive Reasoning, and a Thing not impossible: Nay we shall find, that Metrodorus's Desertion serves to prove the incomparable Humanity, the Praise and Possession which were intended to be secured to Epicurus. But as it happens more frequently, without Comparison, that excessive Marks of Friendship do rather gain People than alienate them, there is an Interpretation of Laërtius's Words, a thousand Times more natural than that which has hitherto been current: Which is to say, That Metrodorus went from Epicurus to Carneades, perhaps because the Obligations he had to Carneades lay heavy upon him. This Interpretation is less favourable to the Scope of the Author than the first, and yet it does not cross it very much. For if you suppose that nothing got Metrodorus away, but the extraordinary Friendship and excessive Careless of Carneades, you cannot affirm that his Desertion destroys what has been said of Epicurus's Good nature, and which, amongst other Reasons, has been proved by the faithful Adherence of his Disciples to him. So that nothing hinders us from taking this new Interpretation of Diogenes Laërtius's Words for the most natural. It is not, perhaps, what he had a mind to say; for that Author being but little more exact in his Reasonings than in his Relations, one may very well be mistaken in ascribing to him such Thoughts as seem naturally to result from his Phrases. Whatever it be, let us acquaint the Reader, that Mr de la Monnoie is the Author of the fore-mentioned new Interpretation: I shall give you here an extract of one of his Letters. 'I am persuaded with Gassendus, that when Diogenes writes, That of all the Disciples of Epicurus, Metrodorus alone left him to follow Carneades, it is not to be understood, that Metrodorus had been a Disciple of Epicurus, but barely that he was the only Epicurean who changed his Sect, and renounced Epicurus's Philosophy, to follow that of Carneades. Mr Menage declares, that he would incline to that Opinion, were it not for these Words of Diogenes, τὰ χα βαρυνθέντος τῆς ἀνταρβλήτοις αὐτοῦ χρίσιν, by which, says he, it appears that notwithstanding all the Explanations of Gassendus, Metrodorus must have been cotemporary of Epicurus, since it was only to ease himself of the troublesome Affection of so good a Master, with which he was overwhelmed, that he ceased to be an Epicurean, and went from that Sect to that of Carneades. Neither Mr Menage nor Gassendus have observed, that the true Sense of Diogenes's Passage is, That if Metrodorus, from an Epicurean, as he was before, became a Follower of Carneades, the only Reason might be the latter's Excess of Goodness towards him. The Pronoun αὐτοῦ, which ought to be understood of Carneades, has hitherto been ill referred to Epicurus: And this has occasioned all the Perplexity (35).

Those, who refer the Pronoun αὐτοῦ to Epicurus, must agree that Diogenes Laërtius is guilty of a signal Mistake; that is, that he believed that Carneades and Epicurus philosophized at the same Time. Gassendus (36) shews very well, that this is a gross Error, and that Epicurus died before Carneades was born. He observes, that Metrodorus did not go from the Sect of Epicurus to the School of the same Carneades, of whom Cicero speaks, towards the end of the fifth Book De Finibus; for that Carneades himself was an Epicurean, Epicuri persimilioris. He proves also, that Metrodorus of Stratonice was not a Disciple of one Carneades, Cotemporary of Epicurus and Arcefilaus, but of that Carneades, who was the fourth Successor of Arcefilaus, and the Founder of the third Academy. We may add to his Proofs what Jonstius observes (37), that Metrodorus of Stratonice could not be a Friend of Epicurus, who died before the Foundation of the Town of Stratonice. Note, That Jonstius (38) and Mr Menage (39) agree, in saying that Diogenes Laërtius has expressed himself, as if he would give us to understand that Epicurus and Carneades flourished at the same Time. This is rejecting Gassendus's Explanation (40), which I do not wonder at, for it is extremely forced. He fancies that the Historian meant only, that Metrodorus was the only Epicurean that forsook his Party, because the good nature of Epicurus, who had been dead a pretty long while, was still living among those of his Sect. 'Quod bonitas verò Epicuri gravis illi (Metrodoro Stratonice) fuisse dicatur, intelligi potest de ea quam Epicurus tametsi mortuus spiraret adhuc in summa illa confessione, charitate, & sui memoria, apud sectatores (41). There is no occasion for such a bad Solution, when one explains the Passage as Mr de la Monnoie does. I must not forget that Mr Foucher (42) made use of these Words of Diogenes Laërtius to maintain his false Supposition, that Carneades and Epicurus were Cotemporaries. Mr Lantini answered him, among other things, that 'Diogenes Laërtius is not an Author one can depend upon, and that it is easy to find several Contradictions in his History, because he followed Authors that contradict one another (43). We shall find one of these Contradictions without leaving our Subject. We have observed that he affirms, that Metrodorus of Stratonice was the only Person that had renounced that Sect; and nevertheless he said a little before, that Timocrates, a Disciple of Epicurus, had left that School (44), and published afterwards many Calumnies against his old Master (45). I have read no Author that has taken notice of this Fault. If Gassendus had seen it, he would not have made use of the following Argument. 'Sane, says he (46), si Metrodorus à vivo Epicuro defecisset, quæstum non fuisset ex Arcefila (qui duodecim annis Epicuro superavit) cur homines à cæteris ad Epicureos, ab Epicureis verò ad cæteros non commigrarent. — Surely, says he, if Metrodorus had deserted from Epicurus still living, this Question would never have been put to Arcefila, who survived Epicurus twelve Years; Why do Men go from other Sects to that of Epicurus, but not from that of Epicurus to others? Is it not certain that Timocrates separated from Epicurus? Since then his Desertion did not prevent the Question which was put to Arcefila, viz. Why People went from other Sects to that of Epicurus, and not from this to the other? Metrodorus's Desertion could not have obviated the same Question, and consequently Gassendus makes use of a very bad Proof. The Proverb, One Swallow does not make a Summer, is the Solution of this; for though the Inconstancy of one of Epicurus's Disciple was known, it was rightly concluded in the main, that no Body left Epicureism.

[E] He wrote many Books, and valued himself on his making no Quotations. Diogenes Laërtius, speaking of the Philosophers who have written most (47), puts Cbryseppus in the first Rank, and Epicurus in the second: It is thus he disposes of Places in his Preface. But in his Tenth Book he says absolutely, and without Reserve, That, of all Authors, Epicurus had written most. Γέγονε δὲ πολυγραφώτατος ὁ Ἐπικουρος πάντας ὑπερβαλλόμενος πλείους βιβλίων. Scriptis autem Epicurus infinita volumina, adeo ut illorum multitudine cunctos superarit (48). His Works, continues he, amount to Three hundred Volumes, which contain nothing but what is his own; for he borrows from none, nor quotes any Body. As for Cbryseppus, who could not bear to be surpassed by Epicurus in the Number of Compositions, he did but heap up Quotations upon Quotations; inasmuch that if what he cites was taken away from him, his Papers would be as white as before he wrote. Καὶ Ἀπολλόδορος δὲ ὁ Ἀθηναῖος ἐν τῇ συναγωγῇ τῶν δαγμάτων βιβλιόμενος παρίστανει, ὅτι

VOL. II.

(f) See the Remark [D].
(g) Gassendus ubi supra, lib. 2, cap. 4, ex Cicero, lib. 5, de Finibus, inic. & ex Plinio, lib. 35, cap. 2.

(37) Jonstius, de Scrip. Hist. Philos. pag. 350.

(38) Id. ibid. pag. 111.

(39) Menag. in Diog. Laërt. lib. 10, n. 9, pag. 451.

(40) Gassendus ubi supra.

(41) Id. ibid.

(42) See the Journal des Savans, August 6, 1691, pag. m. 511.

(43) Journal des Savans, March 24, 1692, pag. m. 210.

(44) Id. ibid.

(45) Id. ibid.

(46) Gassendus ubi supra, pag. 205.

(47) Diog. Laërt. in Proemio, n. 15.

(48) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(49) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(50) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(51) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(52) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(53) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(54) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(55) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(56) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(57) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(58) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(59) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(60) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(61) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(62) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(63) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(64) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(65) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(66) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(67) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(35) La Monnoie's Remark, MS.

(36) Gassendus de Vita & Morib. Epicuri, lib. 4, cap. 8, pag. m. 205.

* Apud. Laërt. lib. 4.

(47) Diog. Laërt. in Proemio, n. 15.

(48) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(49) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(50) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(51) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(52) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(53) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(54) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(55) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(56) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(57) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(58) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(59) Id. lib. 10, n. 26.

(b) See the Article
LEUCIPPUS.

Inventor of it (b); but he made some Alterations in it, tho' not always for the better : For instance, he spoiled the System, in not retaining Democritus's Doctrine touching the τὰ Ἐπικύρου οἰκία δύναμις γεγραμμένα, καὶ ἀπαράδεκτα ὄντα, μὴδὲ πλείω ἐστὶ τῶν Χρυσίππου βιβλίων φησὶν ἕως αὐτῇ τῇ λέξει, 'Εἰ γὰρ τις ἀγέλοι τῶν Χρυσίππου βιβλίων, ὅς' ἀλλότρια παρατίθεται, κενὸς αὐτῷ ὁ χάρις καταλείβεται. Apollodorus quoque Atheniensis in collectione dogmatum, cum vellet asserere Epicurum viribus suis fretum conscripsisse & absque auctorum testimoniis, esse ejus incomparabiliter plura quam Chrysippi opera, sic ad verbum dixit. Nam si quis tollat de Chrysippi libris, quæ aliena sunt, vacua illi charta relinquetur (49). His Emulation was such, that as soon as Epicurus had published a new Book, he composed another (50); and that in such haste, not to be long behind-hand, that he did not read over his Composition; which engaged him in Tautologies, and made him advance many incorrect Things. Diogenes quotes in another Place (51) Apollodorus, who proved by that Argument, that Epicurus had composed more Books than Chrysippus. The latter had only copied what others had said, but Epicurus had drawn every thing out of his own Stock.

AN OBSERVATION upon Books full of Quotations.

(42) Naudé, Preface de l'Apolo-gie des Grands Hommes.

(53) See the first Part of the Prole-Chagrine of la Mothe le Vayer,
pag. 341, of the ninth Tome,
wherein it is said,
That Cicero, Seneca, and Plu-tarch, in their Philosophical Writings, never lose an Opportunity of bringing in what they had learned from the greatest Poets, Orators,
and Philosophers, that went before them, whose Works they endeavoured to imitate, and which they had reduced into Common-Places.

(54) La Mothe
le Vayer, Discours de l'Elo-quence Française,
pag. 84, of the fourth Tome of the Edit. in 12mo.

his own Cause; for he was the greatest Quoter in the World. Let People say as much as they please, that his Books would be better if they were not so fluffed with foreign Thoughts, yet no Man that has any Judgment or Taste will deny that he had a great Genius. People may say also as long as they please, that Coffar's Writings are too full of Authorities; they may, if they think fit, call him the Protector of Common-Places (55), yet they cannot rob him of the Honour of being a great Wit. Mr Ménage, who gives him that Praise, is himself one of those Authors that will do most Honour to France. I see but few Men who dispute him the Title of the French Varro (56). In a Word, he is a great Author; nevertheless, he said of himself, Madam Scuderi . . . has writ eighty Volumes out of her own Head, and I have gathered here and there all I have writ (57). Let us content ourselves with these Examples, without mentioning the Tiraqueau's, the Briffon's, the Servin's, and such other great Men of the Parliament of Paris. Let us pass over in Silence that they quoted prodigiously, and that the same was done in those set Pieces, which the first Presidents, or the King's Counsel, recited in that Age (58) at the opening of the Courts. Neither shall we speak of the excellent and admirable Pleadings of Mr Le Maître, the Ornament of the same Parliament in the following Age: Who does not know that they are full of Quotations? (§ a).

(§ a) Not that they were pronounced so, but Mr le Maître adorned his Pleadings with Citations, especially his last Edition. REM. CRIT.]

Therefore it is an incontestable Fact, that there are great Genius's and great Authors in the Sect of Chrysippus, and that it is not the distinguishing Character of Writers of that kind to quote little or nothing. Let us now examine the other Question, viz. Which way of writing is most laborious.

I think Authors who cite much may be reduced to two Classes. Some there are that content themselves with pillaging modern Authors, and collecting into one Body the Compilations of several others who have written upon the same Subject. These never verify any thing; or have recourse to the Originals; they do not even examine what goes before, or what follows in the Author, which serves them for an Original; they do not write out the Passages, but only refer the Printers to the Pages of such printed Books, whence these Passages are to be taken. It cannot be denied, that this Method of making Books is very easy, and that these sort of Writers can soon fill up ten great Volumes, without much fatiguing themselves. There are other Quoters who trust none but themselves; they are for verifying every thing; they always run to the Fountain; they examine into the Scope of the Author; they are not contented with the Passage they have occasion for, but consider attentively what goes before, and what follows. They endeavour to make fine Applications, and to connect well their Authorities: They compare them together, and either reconcile them, or shew wherein they clash. Besides, these may be Men who are religiously scrupulous in Matters of Fact, not to advance any thing without Proof. If they say, that such a Greek Philosopher believed this or that, that such a Roman Senator or Captain followed such and such Maxims, they presently produce Evidence for it; and because, upon some Occasions, the Singularity of the Thing requires several Testimonies, they therefore gather many. I will not scruple to say of this Method of composing, that it is a hundred times more laborious than that of our Epicurus; and that one would write in less time a Book of a thousand Pages, according to this last Method, than a Book of Four hundred Pages, according to the first. An Example will make this plainer. Let an able Man undertake to prove, that such a Father of the Church was of such an Opinion (59). I am sure he will bestow more Time in gathering the Passages necessary to his Purpose, than making a rambling Discourse upon those Passages. Having once found his Authorities and Quotations, which perhaps will not fill up six Pages, and which may have cost him a Month's Labour in collecting, he will make up in two Mornings Work twenty Pages in Reasonings, Objections, and Answers to those Objections: And consequently, what flows from our Genius, costs sometimes

(55) This is the Title Foreword given him in the Nouvelle Allegorique.

(56) He surpasses even Varro, who was learned without being polite. Mr Menage, with a great deal of Erudition, was Master of the trifling Delicacies of Wit.

(57) Ménagium,
pag. 250, of the first Dutch Edit.

(58) That is in the XVIIth Century.

(59) I do not mean all sorts of Opinions, but such as are only here and there introduced.

the Soul of Atoms [F]. What he taught concerning the Nature of God, is most impious [G]. As for his Doctrine relating to the Supreme Good, or Happiness, it was very

(60) See the new Letters of the Critic upon Maimbourg, in the beginning of the tenth Letter, pag. 298, 299.

(61) That Apology contains 264 Pages in 8vo.

(62) See St. Amand, Preface to his Moisé sauté.

(63) La Mothe le Vayer, Tom. IX, pag. 341.

(64) See the Abbrégé de Maroles, in the Preface to his Abbrégé de l'Histoire de France.

(65) La Mothe le Vayer, Tom. IV, pag. 83, 84.

(66) August. Epist. 56. I have quoted, before, this Passage of Seneca, in Citat. (107) of the Article DEMOCRITUS.

(67) Id. ibid. pag. m. 273.

times much less Time, than what we are obliged to compile (60). I am sure Mr Corneille would have written a Tragedy in less time than he could have answered the Criticisms made upon it, by collecting a great many Authorities, even supposing his Defence to contain no more Pages than his Tragedy. Heinsius, perhaps, bestowed more time upon justifying (61) against Balzac his Herodes infanticida, than a Spanish Metaphysician does upon a great Volume of Disputes, which he writes out of his own Stock. I believe likewise, that the Pleadings, wherein Mr le Maître gathered many Authorities, cost him more than the others, and were composed with more Pains than those of Mr Patru, who seldom quoted any thing.

I will not examine the Question, which of the two is to be preferred? I will content myself to say, That Authors, who borrow nothing from others, are generally less instructive than those who display their Collections. A good Thought, whoever be the Author of it, will still be better than an Absurdity of one's own Growth (62), with submission to those who boast finding every thing at home, and borrowing of no body (63). I add, that there is not less Wit, nor less Invention, in applying rightly a Thought one finds in a Book, than in being the first Author of that Thought. This appears in the Dialogues of Voiture. Cardinal du Perron has been heard to say, that the happy Application of a Verse of Virgil has deserved a Talent (64). I lay aside those who compare the first Production of a Thought with the Act of Generation, and the Art of applying old Thoughts with the Power of raising the Dead; this is being too partial for Collections. Nevertheless, I shall quote the Words of one who has been thus partial. 'As a great many commit a Fault in the immoderate Use of Quotations, there are not wanting others as ridiculous, by a foolish Affectation never to quote any body, and to fetch every thing from home; like that Ælian Hippias, who merrily boasted all he had about him was his own handy Work. For I easily ascribe to that Vanity the great Contempt some make of all Authorities, to shew that they produce nothing but what is their own; that fine Thoughts come out of their Head, as Pallas out of that of Jupiter, and that like him they procreate without the help of another. To which nevertheless it may be answered, That Generation is performed by so common an Action in all sorts of Creatures, that there is no reason to glory in so easy a thing; whereas it is a Miracle to raise the Dead, and make them speak again; inasmuch that it has been said by Divines, that the Bones of dead Saints had wrought more Miracles than the Bodies alive; it may likewise be affirmed by Rhetoricians, that those, who are now no more, have more Power to persuade us than the living (65).'

[F] He spoiled the System in not retaining Democritus's Doctrine touching the Soul of Atoms.] St Augustin puts it out of all doubt, that Democritus believed all Atoms to be animated. 'Democritus, says he (66), hoc distat in naturalibus questionibus ab Epicuro dicitur, quod iste sentit ineffe concursioni atomorum vim quandam animalem & spiritalem. . . . Epicurus vero neque aliquid in principiis rerum ponit præter atomos. — Democritus is said herein to differ from Epicurus in Natural Philosophy: the former imagines there is an animal or spiritual Nature in the Concourse of Atoms. . . . Whereas Epicurus allows nothing but Atoms in the Principles of Things.' To pretend that a Collection of inanimate Atoms can be a Soul, and can emit such Images as occasion Thoughts, is as confused an Hypothesis as Hesiod's Chaos: However, it is what Epicurus supposed. 'Quorum corpusculorum concursu fortuito & mundos innumerabiles, & animantia, & ipsas animas fieri dicit, & Deos quos humana forma, non in aliquo mundo, sed extra mundos, constituit, & non vult omnino aliquid, præter corpora, cogitare: quæ tamen ut cogitet, imagines dicit ab ipsis rebus, quas atomis formari putat, defluere, atque in animum introire subtiliores, quam sunt illæ imagines, quæ ad oculos veniunt (67). — By the fortuitous Concurrence of which Atoms he maintains, that innumerable Worlds, animated Beings, and Souls themselves, were formed, as also Gods, whom he paints under human Forms, and places not in any particular World, but beyond the Limits of them all, nor will he allow any thing but Bodies to think; and in order to make them capable of Thought, he says, that Images flow from those Substances which he supposed formed of Atoms, and insinuate themselves into the Mind, as being of a more subtle Contexture than those that present themselves to the Eye.' But if we once suppose that Atoms have a Soul, we may easily conceive that their several Combinations form divers Species of Animals, divers Manners of Sensation, and divers Combinations of Thoughts, and thereby we are sheltered from the thundering Objection of Galen. 'Cum Atomus una dolere non possit, quod alterationis, & sensus incapax sit, si dum caro acu pungitur, atomus una non sentiat, non sensuras duas, nec treis, nec quatuor, nec plures; perindeque fore, ut si adamantium, aliarumve rerum invulnerabilium acervus fodiatur. Et, ut digiti connexi absque dolore separantur; sic iri atomos diductum, absque ullo doloris sensu, cum sese mutuo solum contingant (68). As one Atom cannot be affected with Pain, since it is destitute of Sense, and unalterable; if then the Flesh is pricked with a Needle, one Atom feels not, neither will two, three, four, or more: it would be the same thing as if a Heap of Diamonds, or other impenetrable Bodies, was disturbed. And as Fingers linked together may be separated without any Un easiness, so might Atoms which touch each other be parted without any Sense of Pain.' Plutarch had made the like Objection to Colotes (69). Let People put their Wits upon the Stretch, and turn themselves which way they please, as Lucretius and Gassendus (70) have done, to resolve that Difficulty, they will never be able to touch it; and the best that can be said in this Matter is, That all the Philosophers, who acknowledge that the Principles of mixed Bodies are deprived of Sense, lay themselves open to the same Difficulty as well as Epicurus. To speak the Truth, the Hypothesis of the Soul of the World, or that of Automata, is the only way to get out of that Plunge; for it would be dangerous to acknowledge in Brutes an immaterial Soul, as in Man: And as for the Distinction of our Peripatetics, between Matter and the Material Soul of Brutes, it is a vain Subterfuge, no less exploded by Galen's Objection than Epicurus's Atoms (71). Moreover, is it not more absurd to suppose that Atoms are essentially animated, than to suppose they exist and move of themselves? See the Article LEUCIPPUS, Remark [A].

Those who have a mind to know the other Differences between Democritus and Epicurus, need but consult Cicero (72). [G] What he taught concerning the Nature of the Gods, is most impious.] It would be too great a Neglect of the sacred Laws of Equity, to charge Epicurus with believing that the Gods do not deserve our Worship, Respects, and Adorations: For he openly professed the contrary, and published excellent Books touching the Duties Men owe to the Gods. 'De sanctitate, de pietate adversus Deos libros scripsit Epicurus. At quo modo in his loquitur? Ut Coruncanum aut Scævolam Pontifices maximos te audire dicas (73). — Epicurus wrote of Sanctity, and of the Duty which we owe to the Gods. But how does he treat them? In such manner, that you would say you heard Coruncanus or Scævola, the High-Priests. I own that it was objected to him, that if he acted according to his Principles, he must have no Religion; but this Consequence did not destroy the Matter of Fact; for his outward Religion was never questioned. We cannot produce a more creditable Witness than Seneca, who speaks thus about it. 'Tu denique, Epicure, Deum inermem facis: omnia illi tela, omnem detraxisti potentiam. . . . hunc non habes quare verearis, nulla illi nec tribuendi nec nocendi materia est. . . . Atqui hunc vis videri colere, non aliter quam parentem: grato, ut opinor, animo: aut si non vis videri gratus, quia nullum habes illius beneficium, sed te atomi & istæ micæ tuæ forte ac temere conglobaverunt, cur colis? Propter majestatem, inquis, ejus eximiam, singularemque naturam. Ut concedam tibi: nempe hoc facis nulla spe, nullo precio inductus. Est

(68) Galenus dum interpretatur illud Hippocratis, si unus esset homo, non doleret, quia non foret unde doleret. Apud Gassendum Phys. Sect. 3, lib. 6, cap. 3. Oper. Tom. II, pag. 341. He quotes lib. de Const. Art. cap. 4, de Elem. 3, & 4.

(69) Plut. adversus Colotes pag. 1111.

(70) See Gassendus ibid.

(71) See the Remarks [C] and [L] of the Article DICEARCHUS, Disciple of Aristotle.

(72) Lib. 1, de Finib. Fel. m. 215.

(73) Cicero de Natura Deorum, lib. 1, cap. 41.

very liable to be misinterpreted, and it had such ill Effects, as discredited his Sect: But at the bottom it was very reasonable; and it cannot be denied that, allowing the Word Happiness to signify what he meant by it, Man's Happiness consists in Pleasure. In vain has Mr Arnauld censured that Doctrine [H]. The Stoics, who may be called the

(74) Seneca de Beneficiis, lib. 4, cap. 19.

* Est ergo aliquid per se expetendum, cujus te ipsa dignitas ducit: id est honestum (74). — In short, Epicurus, you disarm God, you divest him of his Thunder and his Power. You have no reason to fear him, since he is incapable of doing either Good or Hurt; and yet you would revere him as a Parent, from a Principle of Gratitude. If you do it not from this Principle, as being formed by a fortuitous Concurrence of Atoms, and consequently lying under no Obligation to him, why do you worship him? You answer, for the Majesty, and the Excellence of his Nature. Be it granted that neither Interest nor Expectations are your Motives. There is therefore something in itself desirable, by the Dignity of which you are influenced: It is generous.

(75) See what Cicero puts in the Mouth of the Epicurean Velleius, in the first Book de Natura Deorum, cap. 8, & seq.

(76) See Cicero, ibid. cap. 44, fin.

(77) See Gassendus de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 4, cap. 3.

(78) In the Remark [F].

(79) Cicero de Natura Deorum, lib. 1, cap. 30. See also cap. 17.

(80) Diog. Laërt. lib. 10, n. 123.

We see here, in few Words, what Religion Epicurus professed: He revered the Gods, because of the Excellence of their Nature, though he neither expected any Good, nor feared any Ill from them (75). He paid them a free unmercenary Worship, wherein he in no manner regarded his own Interest, but purely the Notions of Reason, which require that we should respect and honour all that is Great and Perfect. It may be those were not mistaken, who accused him of doing this out of Policy only (76), and to avoid the Punishment he would infallibly have incurred, had he overthrown the Worship of the Gods: But this Accusation would have been rash, though perhaps not without Ground: For we ought in Equity to judge of our Neighbour by his Words and Actions, and not by the secret Intentions we fancy he has. We must leave to God, the only Searcher of Hearts, to judge of what passes in every Man's Conscience. After all, why should we rob Epicurus of the Notion of a Worship, which our most orthodox Divines recommend as most lawful, rational, and perfect? They tell us daily, that though we should neither hope a Paradise, nor fear a Hell, yet we ought to reverence God, and do all Things we think will please him (77). I shall presently cite (78) the Testimony Diogenes Laërtius has given of Epicurus's Piety.

Therefore the only Proof of the Text of this Remark is, that Epicurus confined the divine Nature to a State of Inactivity; that he took from it the Government of the World, and did not acknowledge it as the Cause of this Universe. Authors disagree about the Question, Whether he taught that the Gods were composed of Atoms? If he had taught such a Thing, he had robbed the Divine Nature of its Eternity and Indestructibility; a monstrous and most blasphemous Doctrine! But which I think cannot be charged upon him; for one of his first Principles was, that God, being happy and immortal, hurts no body, nor concerns himself in any Thing. In illis selectis ejus brevibusque sententiis quas appellant κρυπτα δόξαι hæc, ut opinor, prima sententia est, quod beatum & immortale est, id nec habet, nec exhibet cuiquam negotium (79). We see that the first thing he proposed as a Subject of Meditation to his Disciples, was the Immortality and Felicity of God. Πρῶτον μὲν, τὸν Θεὸν, ζῶντα ἀθάνατον καὶ μακάριον νομίζον, ὡς ἡ κοινὴ τῶ Θεῶν νομισίς ὑπεργράφει μὴδὲν μὴτε τῆς ἀθάνασιος ἀλλότριον, μὴτε τῆς μακαριότητος ἀνοικεῖον αὐτῷ πρόσσπ' ἢ πᾶν δὲ τὸ φυλάττειν αὐτῷ δυνάμενον τὴν μετὰ ἀθάνασιος μακαριότητα, περὶ αὐτὸν δόξαζε. Primum quidem, Deum esse animal immortale ac beatum, puta, sicut communis de Deo dictat intelligentia; nihil illi aut ab immortalitate alienum, aut à beatitudine, applicans. Cæterum omne quod illius cum immortalitate beatitudinem servare possit, de eo opinare (80). — Look upon God, in the first place, as a Being, happy and incorruptible, such as the general Idea represents him; ascribe nothing to him repugnant to Bliss, or incompatible with Immortality. Therefore he did not believe, that the Gods were made like the World, by the fortuitous Concurrence of Atoms. He was sensible enough, that he would have thereby manifestly subjected them to Death. Idem facit in natura Deorum, dum individuorum corporum concretionem fugit ne interitus & dissipatio consequatur, negat esse corpus Deorum, sed tanquam corpus: nec sanguinem, sed tanquam sanguinem (81). — He proceeds on the same Principles when he treats on the nature of the Gods, by avoiding to form them from a concourse of Atoms, lest Death and Dissipation might be the consequence. He denies that the Gods have either Bodies or Blood, but something resembling each.

Tertullian (82) and St Augustin (83) maintain, nevertheless, that he affirmed the Nature of the Gods to be composed of Atoms; but Laërtius has better related the Opinion of that Philosopher. Deos, says he (84), aiunt incorruptos, æternos, beatos esse: solisque dant immunitatem, ne concursu atomorum concreti esse videantur: si enim Deos quoque ex illis constituissem, dissipabiles fierent, feminibus aliquando resolutis, atque in naturam suam revertentibus. — They affirm, says he, the Gods to be incorruptible, eternal, and happy, and they alone are excepted from their Hypothesis of all things being formed from a Concurrence of Atoms. For had they likewise formed them in the same manner, they would have been dissolvable, the constituent Particles being liable to be disjoined, and to return to their primitive Nature.

I end this Remark with censuring these Words of Mr Moreri: Epicurus's Opinion concerning the Soul and the Deity does not seem reasonable to some. Is it possible that a Priest should speak in this manner of an Opinion, which destroys the Immortality of the Soul, and the Providence of God?

[H] In vain has Mr Arnauld censured that Doctrine.] To render what I have to say the more intelligible, I observe first of all, that most of the ancient Philosophers, who have treated of the Happiness of Man, have confined themselves to an external Notion, and this has occasioned great variety of Opinions amongst them (85). Some placed the Happiness of Man in Riches, others in Sciences, others in Honours, others in Fame, others in Virtue, &c. It is plain, they fixed the Idea of Happiness, not to its formal, but to its efficient Cause; that is, they called that our Happiness, which they thought capable to produce in us the State of Blessedness, and that they did not define what is the State of our Soul when she is happy.

It is this State which I call the formal Cause of Happiness. Epicurus was not mistaken in this: He considered Happiness in itself, and in its formal State; and not according to the relation it has with Beings or Objects altogether external, such as are efficient Causes. This way of considering Happiness is undoubtedly the most exact, and the most worthy a Philosopher: Wherefore Epicurus has done well to chuse it; and he has made so good use of it, that it has brought him precisely whither he ought to go. The only Assertion that could reasonably be established by that Method, was, that the Happiness of Man consists in being at his Ease, and in having a sense of Pleasure; or, in general, Satisfaction of the Mind. This does not prove that the Epicureans place Happiness in good Cheer, and in the impure Intercourse, which different Sexes may have one with another; for at most, these can be no more than efficient Causes, which are not here in question. When there is occasion to speak of the efficient Causes of Content and Pleasure, they will mark out the best: On the one side, they will direct you to those Objects which are most capable to preserve the Health of your Bodies; and on the other, they will tell you what Occupations are the most proper to prevent the uneasiness of your Mind. Therefore they will prescribe you Sobriety, Temperance, and the checking of tumultuous and disorderly Passions, which deprive the Soul of its State of Felicity; that is, of the soft and quiet Acquiescence in its Condition: For these were the Pleasures or Delights wherein Epicurus placed Man's Happiness. People exclaimed against the word Pleasure: Those, who were already loose and debauched, made an ill use of it; the Enemies of that Sect took Advantage from it, and so the Name of Epicurean became odious. All this is accidental to the fundamental Opinion of Epicurus, which is grounded only on solid Philosophy; though it must be owned he committed a great Fault, in not acknowledging (81) Cicero de Natura Deorum, lib. 1, cap. 25, fin.

(82) Tertull. adv. Gentes, cap. 47.

(83) Quorum corporulorum concursu fortuito & mundos innumerabiles & animantia & ipsas animas fieri dicit & Deos. August. Epist. 56, pag. 273.

(84) Laërt. de Vita Dei, cap. 30, pag. 20, 53.

(85) Do not believe however what many People say, that according to Varro there were 288 different Opinions about the Nature of Supreme Good. This is a jest of Varro. See St Augustin de Civit. Dei, lib. 19, cap. 1.

the Pharisees of Paganism, did all that lay in their Power against Epicurus, both to render him odious, and expose him to Persecution. They charged him with destroying the Worship of the Gods, and introducing Debauchery among Mankind. He was not wanting to himself on this Occasion (i). He published his Sentiments to the whole World; he wrote Books of Devotion; he recommended the Veneration of the Gods, Sobriety, Continence; and it cannot be denied that he lived exemplarily, and according to the Rules of Philosophical Wisdom and Frugality (k): But nevertheless, some Calumnies were dispersed against his Morals [I], and a Defserter of his Sect said a great

(i) Rondelles, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, pag. 19, 20.

(k) See Remark [N].

ledging that God alone can produce in our Soul that State which makes it happy.

Let us now come to Mr Arnauld. He manfully opposed this Doctrine of F. Mallebranche, Every Pleasure is a Good, and actually renders him happy who enjoys it (86). The Author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, when he gave the Extract of Mr Arnauld's Book, declared himself in this Dispute for F. Mallebranche. 'There is nothing more innocent, says he (87), nor more certain than to say, That every Pleasure makes him happy who enjoys it during the Time he enjoys it; and that nevertheless we ought to shun those Pleasures that attach us to Bodies.'

(86) See the Reflexions Philosophiques & Theologiques sur la Nature de la Grace, lib. I, cap. xxi, pag. 407, & seq.

(87) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for August 1685, Art. 3. p. 876.

(88) Ibid. for Dec. 1685. Art. 1.

(89) Ibid. for January 1686, pag. 93.

But some will say, it is Virtue, Grace, the Love of God, or rather God alone, that is our Happiness. Right, as an Instrument or efficient Cause, as Philosophers speak; but as a formal Cause, it is Pleasure and Satisfaction which is our only Felicity. Thereupon Mr Arnauld attacked the Author of the Republique des Lettres, and addressed to him an Advice (88), wherein he confuted him from point to point, and according to his usual Method of disputing, which without doubt was such as argued an able Logician. The Journalist replied (89), and still maintained his Opinion, and made it his chief Business to remove the Equivocations that have been introduced into this Matter, by the variety of Tropological Phrases that have been used; most Writers having given the Cause the Name of the Effect, I mean, having called Happiness or Misery not what is so in effect, but what causes it. He went further; for he engaged to refute those, who imagine that the Pleasures of our Senses are not spiritual. He maintained, that if we consider them only with regard to their Physical Entity, they are purely spiritual, and that they cannot be called corporeal, but by Reason of an accidental and arbitrary Relation they have to the Body: For that Relation has no other Foundation than the Will of God, whereby the Action of certain Objects upon the Body of Man, is made and established the occasional Cause of those Pleasures. Mr Arnauld would not have the last. He confuted his Adversary again by a learned Dissertation (90), the last Part of which, in my Opinion, is the most important. It is intitled, Examination of a new Speculation, concerning the Spirituality and Materiality of the Pleasures of Sense; which he begins thus. 'I have no more to do now, Sir, than to tell you one Word concerning the most important Part of your Writing. It is a metaphysical Thought, so subtle and so abstracted, that I have a double Fear upon me: First, That I have not understood your Thought perfectly well: Secondly, That I shall not be able to express mine, so as to be understood by every Body. You pretend, Sir, that we must distinguish two things in the Pleasures of the Senses; their Spirituality, which you look upon as essential to them; and their Materiality, which you would have to be accessory and accidental to them. From whence you conclude, that a Pleasure of Sense might continue idem numero, (numerically the same), and yet have nothing material, because Materiality may be abstracted from it (91).'

(90) See the Bibliothéque Universelle, Tom. VI, pag. 379.

(91) Arnauld's Dissertation sur le prétendu Bonheur des Sens, pag. 108.

He afterwards very clearly unfolds the Doctrine of his Adversary, and opposes it in a manner most worthy of his Logic and Skill; but nevertheless I believe he is mistaken at the bottom, and that he has not sufficiently observed the Difference which is found between our Sensations, and our Ideas. The Relation between our Ideas and their Objects is essential; and he is in the right to say, that it is not possible for God to make the Idea of a Circle to be separated from its Relation to a Circle. But it is not the same with our Sensations. Our Soul might feel Cold without referring it to a Foot or a Hand, just as it feels the Joy of good News, or Grief at bad, without referring either to any part of the Body. And if, whilst it is united to a Body, it refers to some Parts of that Body some Pains and Pleasures, as the smart of Burning, the being tickled, &c. it is only by a free Establishment made by the Author of its Union with the Body, that it may the better watch over the Preservation of the Machine to which it is united. If this Reason ceased, it would no longer be necessary that it should refer its Sensations out of it self, and nevertheless it would still be susceptible of the Modification which is called Pain, Pleasure, Cold, Heat, and God might impress upon it all these Modifications, either without any Occasional Cause, or by means of an Occasional Cause, which should not be a Body, but the Thoughts of some Spirit. The Author of the Art of Thinking justly says, 'That it is possible for a Soul separated from the Body to be tormented by the Fire either of Hell or Purgatory, and to feel the same Pain one feels when burnt, since, even while it was in the Body, the Pain of burning was in itself, and not in the Body, and was no other than a Thought of Sadness she had, upon occasion of what passed in the Body to which God had united it (92).'

(92) Art of Thinking, Part I, chap. ix, pag. m. 86.

But he has no Reason to suppose, that it would be necessary that God should dispose a certain Portion of Matter, with relation to a Spirit, in such a Manner, that the Motion of that Matter should occasion afflicting Thoughts in that Spirit. A Being, altogether immaterial, might perform the Function of such an Occasional Cause, and, in that Case, our Soul might feel the same Pleasure we call sensual and corporeal; it might, I say, feel such a Pleasure without referring it to a Mouth, or an Ear, as we now do the Pleasure of good Cheer and Music. From whence it follows, that Pleasure, of what kind soever it may be supposed, may make the Soul happy, whether it be united to Matter or no. This would deserve a Treatise by it self. If the Author of the News from the Republic of Letters had not been sick, when Mr Arnauld's Dissertation came out, he would have confuted it: But he thought it was too late to do it, when his Health permitted him to write.

[I] Some Calumnies were dispersed against his Morals. He was represented as a Glutton, a leud Man, and a new Sardanapalus; and because, according to the custom of those Ages (93), he received into the Number of his Disciples some Women who loved Philosophy, his School was represented as a downright Brothel. It was reported, that the Courtezan Leontium being grown curious of Philosophy, and having applied herself to that Philosopher, did not give over her former Trade, but gratified with her Embraces the whole School, and particularly Epicurus himself, even openly. 'Η δὲ οὐχ ὅτε φιλοσοφεῖν ᾤχετο, ἐπαύσατο ἑταίρειαν, αὐτὴν τε τοῖς Ἐπικουρείοις συνὴν ἐν τοῖς κήποις, Ἐπικύρου δὲ καὶ ἀναφανδόν. Quæ Philosophia operam navare cum incipisset non ideo scortari desistit, sed Epicureis omnibus in bortis se prestituit, & palam quidem Epicuro (94). They were not contented to spread these Slanders in Conversation, but inserted them in Books; and, what was most unjust, they forged lascivious Letters, which were published in that Philosopher's Name. Διότιμος δὲ ὁ Στωικός δυσμενὲς ἔχων πρὸς αὐτὸν πικρότατα αὐτὸν διαβέβληκεν ἐπιστολάς φέροντας πονηρήντα ἀσέλγους, ὡς Ἐπικύρου καὶ τὰ εἰς Χρύσιππον ἀναφερόμενα ἐπιστολίαι, ὡς Ἐπικύρου συντάξας. Diotimus autem Stoicus infestus adversus illum animo, acerrimè infectatus eum est, quinquaginta circumferens lascivas, veluti ab Epicuro scriptas, epistolas, easque quæ Chrysippi feruntur, veluti sub Epicuri nomine componens (95). — Diotimus the Stoic, his inveterate Enemy, treated him very barbarously, forging fifty lascivious Letters, and published them, with those ascribed to Chrysippus, under the name of Epicurus. We have still a Letter fathered upon Leontium, but that is a forged Piece. They feign, that

(93) See Gassendus, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. vii, cap. 5.

(94) Athenæus, lib. xiii, p. 588.

(95) Diog. Laërt. lib. x, n. 3.

(1) This was written in 1695.

great many scandalous Things of him [K]. A very Learned Man maintained, about two Years ago (1), that this Philosopher did not deny a Divine Providence [L]. Tho' none that Leontium wrote to Lamia what Trouble she underwent with Epicurus, an old lousy Dotard of eighty Years, who was become as silly as a Child, and so cross, that he scolded at his Mistress, and teased her with his Suspicions. Οὐδὲν δυσχερὲς ἔσται, εἰ ἐοικέν, ἐστὶ παλιν μετὰ κινουμένην πρεσβύτην, οἷα καὶ Ἐπίκουρος ἔτ' εἰσὶν αἰὶν, πάντα λοιδορῶν, πάντα ὑποπτεύων, ἐπιστολὰς ἀδιαιλύτους μοι γράφων. ἐκδιδῶν ἐκ τῆς κητὸς καὶ τὴν Ἀφροδίτην, εἰ Ἀδωνίς ἦν, ἢ δὴ ἐγδοῖκα πάντα γεγῶσ' ἔτη· ἢ καὶ αὐτὴν ἠρσέχην, φθειμένην, καὶ πολυνοστήν, καὶ καταπεπιλημένην, εὐ μάλα πόκοις, ἀντὶ φίλων, &c. Nihil est, ut mihi videtur, repuerascente fene importunius: Quo sanè modo erga me Epicurus iste se habet, omnia improbens, omnia in suspicionem vertens, literas ad me ambagiosas scribens; abacturus sanè ex Horto ipsam Venerem, tamen Adonis foret, natus jam, ut est, annorum octoginta. Absit illius amore tener, qui & scatet pediculis, & planè morbidus est, contractus præ senio, nec injuriâ velleræ gellans pro pileis, &c. (96). — Nothing is more impertinent than an old Man in his second Childhood. How am I plagued with this Epicurus? He is always peevish and jealous, and writing unintelligible Letters to me. Were he an Adonis, whereas he is on the wrong side of fourscore, he would inevitably fright even Venus out of the Garden. I am quite sick of his Lice, his Dishevels, and his cargo of Fur-night-Caps. It is evident this Letter is forged, since Leontium died before Epicurus (97), and that Epicurus did not live much above seventy-one Years. It is certain, that Metrodorus, one of Epicurus's great Friends, lay with that Leontium, either as a Wife, or at worst as a Concubine. Now among the Heathens, Concubinage was not very scandalous. Danaë, Daughter of Leontium, was no chaster than her Mother (98). Some pretend, that Leontium lay with one Corniadæ, who might know how often he had enjoyed her; for he kept a Journal of his Debaucheries: and when he had a mind to call back to his Remembrance his amorous Adventures, and jolly Days, he consulted his Journal: 'Non inepte quis intelligat, thesæ are Gassendus's Words (99), ex hoc contubernio desumptum quod Plutarchus scribit Corniadem quasi ex Ephemeride repetere solitum quoties cum Hedæ & Leontio rem habuisset, Thasium bibisset, 'opipare cognasset.' Others pretend, that Gassendus has suffered himself to be deceived in this Place by the Latin Translator of Plutarch, and that the meaning of the Greek is, That modest People do not entertain in their Minds the Images of past Pleasures, and are not guilty of what made Corniadæ ridiculous; that is, they do not rehearse, as if they were reading in their Table-Books, or their Books of Accounts, how often they had to do with Hedæ or Leontium, &c. Those who can understand the Greek I quote, may judge of the true Sense. For my Part, I should rather follow that of Gassendus. Οὐτε τὸς μιστρίους καὶ σώφρονας εἰκὸς ἐνδιατρίβειν τῇ ἐπιποίᾳ τῶν τοιούτων, ἐδὲ ἀπερῆσθαι τὸν Κορνιάδην πράττοντα, εἶον ἐξ ἐφημερίδων ἀναλέγεσθαι, ποσάκις Ἡδῆα καὶ Λεοντίῳ συνῆλθον, ἢ πῶς δάσιον ἔπιον, ποίας εἰκάδας ἐδείπνησαν πολυτελέστατα, δεινὴν γὰρ ἐμπαίνει καὶ θνητὴν περὶ τὰ γινόμενα καὶ περὶ δόξα μὲν τῆς ἡδονῆς ἔργα ταχέως καὶ λύσαν ἢ τοσαύτην πρὸς ἀναμνήσεις βάρχευσις αὐτῆς τῆς ψυχῆς καὶ πρὸς ἑαυτὴν. Neque probabile est, modestos ac temperantes domines, hujusmodi cogitationibus immorari, aut ea facere, ob quæ Carneadem subfannat ille, tanquam ex ephemeridibus repetentem, quoties cum Hedæ aut Leontio rem habuisset, ubi Thasium vinum bibisset, quibus Idibus splendidissimè cœnasset. Atrocem enim ac belluinam in fruendis aut expectandis voluptatibus exagitationem animi ac rabiem designat tanta ipsius ad recordandum bacchatio atque adbæsis (100). See in Gassendus, in the seventh Book of the Life of Epicurus, a solid Confutation of the Calumnies I have mentioned. See likewise the Remark [N]. Note, That instead of Κορνιάδην, methinks we ought to read Καρπιδίην in that Place of Plutarch; for we know, that one of Epicurus's Friends was called Carneades. I have quoted upon this Subject a Passage out of Cicero in the Remark [M] of the Article ARCESILAUS.

(96) Ex secundo libro Alcibiadis apud Gassendus ubi supra, lib. vii, cap. ii.

(97) Metrodorus and Leontium his Concubine left a Son, whom Epicurus mentions in his Will as an Orphan whom he recommends. See Gassendus, ibid. cap. vi.

(98) Athenæus, lib. xiii, pag. 101. See the Article LEONTIUM, Remark [D].

(99) Ubi supra, lib. vii, cap. i.

(100) Plot. non possit vivi suaviter juxta Epicur. pag. 1029, C. ex versione Xylandri.

[K] A Defector of his Sect said a great many scandalous things of him.] That kind of People do generally slander most bitterly the Party they abandon: The Desire of revenging some Injury, or of making People believe that it is not out of Levity they leave it, prompts them to defame it; and though they ought to be suspected, yet they never fail to impose on the Credulity of many. I remember I have read somewhere, That a Nun, who came out of Port-Royal discontented, spread several little Stories, of which the Jesuits took Advantage in their Writings (101). But let us speak of the Defector here in Question: He was Brother to Metrodorus, and named Timocrates. He gave out, That there were Nocturnal Assemblies in Epicurus's Gardens, from which he had much ado to escape; and there being some Women among Epicurus's Disciples, I leave every one to judge how Timocrates's Words were commented upon by the censorious World. Εαυτὸν τε διηγείται μάλιστα ἐκρύβειν ἰσχύσαι τὰς νυκτερινὰς ἐκείνας φιλοσοφίας καὶ τὴν μουσικὴν ἐκείνην συναγωγὴν. Sequè ipsam narrat vix effugere potuisse nocturnas illas philosophandi consuetudines arcanamque illam conventiunculam (102). Some have not fluck to compare those Conventicles of Epicurus with the Midnight Revels of the Witches (103); and I do not doubt but they have been as much reflected on as the Assemblies of the Adamites: 'Præter comestiones & computationes possunt ea intelligi quæ in nocturnis Bonæ Deæ sacris patrari quondam objecta sunt' (104). — Besides their Feasts, there are other Matters, to be understood, such as were formerly condemned in the Nocturnal Solemnities of Cybele. Besides Gassendus, who that, Timocrates reported Epicurus to be a Glutton and a Drunkard, who through Excess of eating and drinking vomited twice a Day (105). Epicurus did not spare this Defector of his Sect; for he wrote against him, and treated him very severely. We find in one of Cicero's Pieces, that, in order to insult over that Philosopher, they supposed that his Quarrel with Timocrates was grounded on a Trifle: 'Cum Epicurus . . . Metrodori sodalis sui fratrem Timocratem, quia nescio quid in Philosophia dissentiret, totis voluminibus conciderit (106). — Epicurus unmercifully fell upon Timocrates, Brother to Metrodorus his Companion, making him run the Gantlet through whole Volumes for some insignificant difference between them in Philosophy.' There is no Equity in this Objection: For if upon any Occasion a Writer's Passion may be excused, it is when, like Epicurus, he contends with a fugitive Disciple.

[L] A very learned Man has maintained, that Epicurus did not deny a Divine Providence.] This learned Man is Mr du Rondel, who had been several Years Professor of Eloquence at Sedan, when the Academy there was suppressed in 1681. Some time after he retired to Holland, where his Merit being soon known, he was called to Maestricht to be Professor of the Belles Lettres; which employment he still discharges with great Reputation. Before he had left his own Country, he had obliged the Public with an Edition of Musæus, in Greek and Latin, with Notes (107); the Life of Epicurus, in French (108); and a Dissertation of Gloria (109). Since he has been out of France, he has published some Reflections on a Chapter of Theophrastus (110); a Dissertation on the Chenix of Pythagoras (111); and a Treatise de vita & moribus Epicuri (112). It is in this last Work he has undertaken to prove, that Epicurus did not deny Divine Providence. Those who have a mind to know the value of his Productions (113), and have not them by them, will do well to consult the Journalists that have mentioned them; where they will find the Praises due to his profound Learning, and his penetrating Genius. When he shall be pleased to bring forth the Treasures of his Closet, the Public will be convinced, that the Journalists ought to make use of the greatest Encomiums, if they mean to do him Justice. I would dwell longer on this Subject, if the Friendship which is between us had not taught me that it would not be acceptable to him. See the Preface to the Project of this Dictionary, which I addressed to him. No Man could maintain more learnedly or more subtly than he has done the Paradox of Epicurus's Orthodoxy concerning Providence.

(101) See the Letters, intitled, Les Imaginaires, & les Visionnaires.

(102) Lact. lib. x, n. 6.

(103) Our item illud sodalium comparetur gregi sociorum Ulyssæ, ac jam à nocturnis plerisque dicte Megaron Synagoge.

(104) Gassendus, ubi supra, lib. vii, cap. i.

(105) Lact. ubi supra.

(106) Cicero, de Natur. Deor. lib. i, cap. xxxiii.

(107) Printed at Paris for Antoine Collier, 1679, in 12mo. It was reprinted in Holland with a capital Title. See the Nouvelles de la Repub. des Lettres, January 1686, pag. 86.

(108) Printed at Paris for Antoine Collier, 1679, in 12mo. It was reprinted in Holland with a capital Title. See the Nouvelles de la Repub. des Lettres, January 1686, pag. 86.

(109) Printed at Leyden, 1680, in 12mo.

(110) At Amsterdam, 1689, in 12mo.

(111) At Amsterdam, 1692, in 12mo.

(112) At Amsterdam, 1693, in 12mo.

(113) I do not pretend to have given an exact List of them.

none of Epicurus's Works are now extant, yet there is no ancient Philosopher whose Sentiments are better known than his. We are beholden for it to the Poet Lucretius, and to Diogenes Laërtius, but much more to the Learned Gassendus, who, with great Diligence, has gathered all that could be found in ancient Books relating to the Doctrine and Person of that Philosopher, and reduced it into a compleat System. If ever there was Reason to conclude, that Time at last does Justice to oppressed Innocence, it is with respect to Epicurus; for so many Illustrious Persons have stood up in Defence both of his Practical and Speculative Morals [M], that at this time none but the opinionated and ignorant judge wrong of them. He died in great Torment of a Retention of Urine, with a singular Patience and Constancy, in the second Year of the CXXXVIIth Olympiad (m), when he was just entered into the Seventy second Year of his Age. One cannot sufficiently commend the Purity of his Morals, nor sufficiently condemn his Opinions in Religion. Infinite numbers of People are orthodox, and live ill: He on the contrary, and many of his Followers, taught a bad Doctrine, and lived well [N].

We

dence. He has not forgot to take advantage of, and improve the VIS ABDITA QUÆDAM of Lucretius (114). When Mr Minutoli was informed that this Book of Mr du Rondel was published, he wrote to me, That in the Collection of John Michael Brutus, there is 'a Letter from Peter Victorius to John della Casa, Archbishop of Benevento; which runs upon the Question, Whether Lucretius, who in the Beginning of his Poem invokes Venus, does not in that very thing clash with the Doctrine of Epicurus? And whether that be compatible with the inaction that Philosopher ascribes to the Gods.'

[M] So many illustrious Persons have stood up in Defence of his Morals. The learned Gassendus observes that upon the Revival and Restoration of Learning in the XVth Century, there were able Men who spoke for Epicurus, who for so many barbarous Ages was oppressed under a Load of Prejudices: 'Cum Epicurus infamis fuisset habitus tota illa penè sæculorum serie, quæ literæ bonæ sepulcræ jacerunt; vix tamen libros humaniores, pulvere excusso, rediisse in manus ante duo sæcula, quàm omnes penè eruditi symbolum pro eo contulerunt (115). — Though Epicurus had been branded with Infamy during almost the whole Series of Ages that Learning had lain buried; yet scarce had the polite Authors shook off their Dust, and appeared again in public, about two Centuries ago, before the greatest part of the learned World had declared in his Favour.' He names Philippus, Alexander ab Alexandro, Cælius Rhodiginus, Volaterranus, and Johannes Franciscus Picus (116). He observes, upon the Credit of Tribemius, that Baptista Guarinus made a Book of the Sect of Epicurus. He adds, that Marc Anthony Bonciarius had composed one, to prove, that of all the ancient Philosophers Epicurus came nearest to Truth (117). Lastly, besides Palingenius, of whom he quotes many Verses in Praise of Epicurus, he remarks that Andrew Arnaud of Provence has made an Apology for that Philosopher: 'Andreas Arnaudus Forcalquierensis in hac Provincia Profenecallus in libello, cui nomen Joci, Apologiam pro Epicuro inter cætera edidit, brevem illam quidem, & folioli paucis; sed in quâ tamen ea delibantur ex Laërtio præsertim, atque Seneca, unde convincatur, quod vir ille pereruditus initio proposuit, fuisse Epicurum injustus læssitum, & laniatum ab obsecratoribus (118). — Andrew Arnaud of Forcalquier, Deputy-Senescal of Provence, in a Treatise intitled Jests, among other things published an Apology for Epicurus, a short one indeed, containing but few Pages, which however gives us a sketch of those Passages, particularly from Seneca and Laërtius, so as to demonstrate what the learned Author at his setting out proposed, viz. that Epicurus had been maliciously attacked, and barbarously treated.' The Curious will not be sorry to find here a further Account of that Apology; for which I am indebted to the obliging and most learned Mr Minutoli (119). Here is what he wrote to me in November 1693: 'I found the other Day a little Book printed at Avignon, intitled, Andræ Arnaudi, Joci, Epistolæ, Rara, Epigrammata, Tumuli, Apologiae. This last Class of Pieces contains the Apologies for Bacchus, Epicurus, Phalaris, and Apuleius. . . . In the Collection of Epistles, there is one of Guirardus Arnaudus where, after having spoken in Commendation of Ravius Textor, whose Dialogues he sent to him as a Novelty, he tells him, In nono Dialogo miraberis Textorem, cujus scripta tantam doctrinam testantur, tam male de Epicuri voluptate testari, nec animadvertisse Epicurum opinionem Sardapalium, re Stoicissimum, Bacchanalia simulasse, & Curios vixisse. Epigr. 152.

Nam, licet illecebris hominem velit esse beatum, Stoicus interea moribus ipse fuit.

Ita Frufius, sed tu fufius nuper dicebas & docebas, cum non sine miratione opinionem quorundam rapiebas ad paradoxum de Baccho, Epicuro, Phalaride, & Apuleio. O nostri sæculi felicitudo, si omnes Epicuri essent, nulla hypocriſis, si Bacchi, nulla Bacchanalia, si Phalarides, nulla injustitia, si Apulei, nulla ineloquentia. — In the ninth Dialogue you will be surprized that Textor, whose Writings carry an evidence of so much Learning, should determine so wrongfully of Epicurus's Pleasure, not considering that he was by Profession a Libertine, in Practice a rigid Stoic, in Appearance a Debaucher, in reality abstemious.

His Practice with his Doctrine disagreed, Strict was his Life, tho' Pleasure was his Creed.

Thus Frufius; but you have lately given us a more full Information, when in a surprising manner you forcibly engaged the Opinions of the Readers to the Paradox concerning Bacchus, Epicurus, Phalaris, and Apuleius. How happy would our Age be, when if all were like Epicurus, there would be no Hypocriſis, like Bacchus no Revels, like Phalaris no Cruelty, like Apuleius no want of Eloquence?

I forgot to say, that Gassendus mentioned Ergicius Puteanus among those that have commended Epicurus. The famous Don Francisco Quevedo published, at Madrid in the Year 1635, an Apology for that Philosopher, in a Book intitled, Episteto Espanol en versos con consonantes, con el origen de los Estoicos y su defenſa contra Plutarcho, y defenſa de Epicuro contra la opinion comun (120). I have not seen that, which Sarrazin has written in our French Tongue, for the Morals of Epicurus; and which Mr Colomies mentions in the 125th Page of his Bibliothèque Choise: But I have read Mr St Evremont's Reflexions upon this Matter, which are curious and just. The Baron des Coutures published the Morals of that Philosopher with Reflexions in 1685; the same Year the Paris Edition was twice reprinted in Holland (121). That Book sets Epicurus in a good Light, and is as good as a Panegyric. He produces the Chancellor of the Church and University of Paris (122), under the Character of an Apologist for Epicurus. La Motte le Vayer (123), and Sorbiere (124), have acted the same Part; but I do not believe that any thing was ever writ in any Country, that can equal what our Gassendus has done in behalf of that Philosopher: His Performance being a Master-piece, and the most curious, well-digested, and judicious Collection that ever was seen. Sir William Temple, so illustrious by his Embassies and fine Productions, has lately stood up in Defence of Epicurus with marvellous Addreſs (125).

[N] He and many of his Followers taught a bad Doctrine, and lived well. Nothing is more capable of extinguishing Devotion in the Heart of Man, and to make him intirely renounce all Worship of God, than a Belief that God does neither good nor harm to Mankind; and neither punishes those that offend him, nor rewards those that serve him. The most devout Christians, if they speak with sincerity, will acknowledge,

(m) Diog. Laërt. ibid. n. 15 & 224.

(114) Page 79.

(115) Gassendus, ubi supra, lib. vii. cap. vii. pag. m. 224.

(116) I wonder he forgets Laërtius's Valla.

(117) See the Words of Gassendus, ab-ut, in the Article BONCIARIUS, Rem. [C], Citat. (6), where I found an Error.

(118) Gassendus, ubi supra.

(119) A Minister and Professor at Geneva.

(120) Nic. Antonio, Bibl. Script. Hispan. Tom. I, p. 354.

[* These Reflexions are falsely ascribed to St Evremont; they are Sarrazin's, and are inserted in that Author's new Works, printed at Paris, 1674. See the Life of St Evremont, by Mr Des Maizeaux, pag. 135, of the London Edit. 1728. REM. CRIT.]

(121) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, January 1686, Art. 9, pag. 86.

(122) Mr Cochin, in the Approbation of the Book, which contains four Pages.

(123) Traité de la Vertu des Païens, in the Fifth Tome of his Works, in 12mo.

(124) Letter xxxiii, in 4to.

(125) See his Miscellanies.

We must not forget, that he had very good Notions and Maxims, touching the Obedience acknowledge, that the most powerful Tie, that unites them to God, is the looking upon him under the Notion of a Benefactor; and the Consideration, that, as he distributes infinite Rewards to those that obey him, so he eternally punishes those that offend him. But here is a Man, who discharged the Duties of Religion, according to the Custom of his Country, (126) without any Motive of Interest; for he professed to believe, that the Gods neither bestowed Rewards, nor inflicted Punishments (127). 'He was very assiduous in frequenting the Temples; and the first Time Diocles saw him, he could not forbear crying out, What ravishing Delight it is to me to see Epicurus in a Temple (128)! All my Suspensions vanish, Piety resumes its Place, and I never was more convinced of the greatness of Jupiter, than since I see Epicurus on his knees! Ω πανήγυρις θεσπιδίων, &c.' To this I add Laërtius's Words, Τὴν μὲν γὰρ πρὸς θεῶν δεισιδαιμονίαν, καὶ πρὸς πατρίδα φίλιας ἀλεκτος ἡ δεισιδαιμονία (129). According to some they signify, That his Piety towards the Gods, and his Love of his Country, were beyond expression (130); but hitherto the several Editions of Laërtius furnish us with another Interpretation. The Greek Words there signify, that Epicurus was never remiss, either in the Worship of the Gods, or in his Zeal for his Country's Good. Nam quid de cultu in Deos, & de amicitia adversus patriam dicam quam constantissime usque ad finem tenuit. It seems as if the Translator read not ἀλεκτος, as it is in the printed Book, but ἀληκτος. Whatever the Translation be, this is a great Commendation of Epicurus's Piety.

To confute fully those who charge him with Gluttony, it is enough to refer to the Testimony which his very Enemies have given to his Frugality. See how Seneca, who, as a great Stoic, ought to have had a Fling at him upon all Occasions, if the Appearances were never so little against him, does nevertheless agree, that they made but indifferent Cheer in Epicurus's Gardens. 'Eo lubentius, says he (131), Epicuri egregia dicta commemoro, ut illis, qui ad illa confugiunt, spe mala industi, qui velamentum seipsum suorum vitiorum habituros existimant, probem, quocumque ierint, honeste esse vivendum. Cum adierint eos hortulos, & inscriptum hortulis, Hospes hic bene manebis, hic summum bonum voluptas est: paratus erit istius domicilii custos, hospitalis, humanus, & te pocula excipiet, & aquam quoque largi ministrabit, & dicit: Ecquid bene acceptus es? Non irritant, inquam, hi hortuli famem, sed extinguunt; nec majorem ipsis potionibus sitim faciunt, sed naturali & gratuito remedio sedant. — I mention, says he, the more willingly those golden Sayings of Epicurus, that I may thereby prove to those, who, out of an ill design, endeavour to shelter their own Vices under that cover, that wherever they went, they were enjoined Sobriety. When they went to the Gardens, where the Inscription was; Here, O Stranger, thou shalt find welcome, here pleasure is the greatest good; the keeper of this Place is generous and humane, he shall be ready to wait upon thee, he shall entertain thee with Bread, and furnish thee with Water in plenty, and will ask whether thy Entertainment has not been good. These Gardens, I say, do not inspire, but extinguish Thirst; instead of inflaming it aforesaid, they cool it by a cheap and natural Remedy.' By Seneca's own Confession, Epicurus's Guests fared little better than upon Bread and Water. You may see many such Authorities in the Book I quote (132). As for venereal Pleasure, not only Epicurus's Maxims and Counsels were extremely Wise (133), but he preached so much by his own Example, that Chrysippus, his constant Antagonist, was forced to explain that Phenomenon, by the insensibility and coldness of Temper, which he imputed to him. 'Scribit Stobæus quempiam fuisse qui & non iri captum amore virum sapientem dixerit, & ipsius Epicuri exemplo inter cæteros id probavit: Chrysippum autem contradixisse, & Epicurum quod attineret, excepisse nihil ex ejus exemplo concludi, quoniam foret ἀναιδὲς ἄνθρωπος, sensu carens (134). — Stobæus writes, that a certain Person said, a wise Man would never be a Slave to Love, and proved it by the Example of Epicurus amongst others: Chrysippus opposed it, and, as to Epicurus, he excepted against the validity of that Instance, alleging that no Consequence could be drawn from him since he was insensible.' I refer the Reader to Gassendus's fine Collections (135); but I cannot pass over these Words of Cicero: 'Ac mihi quidem, quod & ipse bonus vir fuit, & MULTI EPICUREI fuerunt, & hodie sunt, & in amicitia fideles; & in omni vita constantes & graves, nec voluptate, sed officio consilia moderantes, hæc videtur major vis honestatis, & minor voluptatis. Ita enim vivunt quidam ut eorum vita refellatur oratio, atque ut cæteri existimantur dicere melius quam facere, sic hi mihi videntur melius facere quam dicere (136). — In my Opinion indeed, as he himself was an honest Man, and MANY EPICUREANS have been, and at this Time are, faithful in their Friendships, constant and exemplary in their Lives, not guided by Pleasure, but governed by Prudence; in this case, Honour seems to have the Ascendant over Pleasure: for some live in such manner, that their Lives are a Confutation of the Charge against them; and as others are thought to speak better than they act, so these appear to me to act better than they speak.' You see here Epicurus, and several of his Followers, commended as good Friends, honest Men, and grave Persons, who strictly observed the Practice of Virtue. It is only objected to them, that they did not live according to their Principles: An Objection which is no less true against the Orthodox, and which, in respect to them, is a thousand Times more shameful. Cicero avers it as Matter of Fact, that no fault can be found with Epicurus's Morals; and that he is only blamed, for not having been so wise as to reconcile his Doctrine with his Conduct. 'Ratio ista quam defendis, præcepta quæ didicisti, quæ probas, funditus evertunt amicitiam, quamvis eam Epicurus, ut facit, in celum efferat laudibus. At coluit ipse amicitias, quæ si quis illum neget, & bonum virum, & comem, & humanum fuisse. De ingenio ejus in his disputatibus, non de moribus quaeritur (137). — The reason which you maintain, the Precepts which you have imbibed, and which you approve, sap the very Foundation of Friendship, however Epicurus may, as he does, extol it to the Skies. But he had the biggest Veneration for Friendship. Does any one deny him to be a good Man, generous and humane? In these disputes the question turns upon his Genius not upon his Morals.'

Some perhaps may wonder, how Epicurus, notwithstanding his fine Morals, is fallen into such an Infamy as has rendered both his Sect and his memory odious for many Ages wherever he has been heard of. Upon this, I make three small Observations: The first is, That in this, as in many other Things, we may see the Power of Fatality. Some Men are happy, others are unhappy: That is the best Reason can be given of their various Fortune. In the second Place, Epicurus's competition with the famous Philosopher, who was the Founder of the Stoics, must needs have had ill Consequences. The Stoics professed a great Severity in their Morals: Now to contend with those Men, was much the same disadvantage at that Time, as to quarrel in this Age with Bigots. They interested Religion in their Quarrel; they insinuated their Fears, that Youth would be perverted; they alarmed all good Men; their Accusations were regarded and credited; the People easily persuading themselves, that true Zeal and austere Maxims go always together. Now as there were no greater Defamers than these Men, it must not be thought strange, if by their Invektives against Epicurus, by their pious Frauds and forged Letters, they have made disadvantageous Impressions, which have lasted a long Time. I say, in the third Place, that it was an easy thing to give an ill Sense to the Tenets of that Philosopher, and to scare honest Men with the Word Voluptuousness, of which he made use. If People had spoken of it with the Explications he added to it, no body had been alarmed; But they carefully removed all the Explications that might be favourable to him: And after all, there were some Epicureans who made an ill Use of his Doctrine. They did not debase themselves in his School, but had the Cunning to shelter their debaucheries under the Authority of so great a Name. Non ab Epicuro impulsus luxuriantur, sed vitia dediti, luxuriam suam

(135) Ibid. & cap. v, vi, vii.

(136) Cicero, de Fin. lib. ii, cap. xxv.

(137) Id. ibidem, d. C.

AN ENQUIRY into the Causes of the ill Opinion People have had of Epicurus.

(126) He was constantly seen in the Temples, he made many Sacrifices and Offerings, &c. Du Rondel, Vie d'Epicure, pag. 29. See the whole Sequel of the Passage; and in the Latin Edition, see pag. 60.

(127) Id. pag. 34, the French Edit.

(128) See an Application of this in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for Dec. 1684, in the Catalogue of new Books, n. 2.

(129) Laërt. lib. 10, n. 10.

(130) Gassendus has translated: Nam sanctitatis quidem in Deos & charitatis in patriam fuit in eo affectus inextinguibilis.

(131) Seneca, Epist. 21.

(132) Gassendus ubi supra, lib. vi, cap. iii & iv.

(133) See Laërt. lib. x. n. 118.

(134) Gassendus. Ibid. lib. vii, cap. iv. H. quotes Stobæus, Serm. de ven. & am.

dience due to Magistrates [O]. His Reputation was much greater after his Death, than during his Life [P], as Seneca had observed, and as Metrodorus had foretold.

It will not be amiss to give here an Instance of the Malice and Disingenuity with which Epicurus was censur'd. He wrote a Book, intituled, The Banquet, and therein he treated the Question, Which Time is properest to embrace a Woman? His Censurers, greedy of a Pretence to slander him, represented unfaithfully his Proceeding, by changing the Circumstances of it. There is no doubt but he was innocent, since Plutarch has been so just, as to shew, that there was nothing in it unworthy of a Philosopher [Q]. The same Plutarch has written a Treatise on purpose to prove, that one * in philosophizæ sinu abscondunt: & eo concurrent ubi audiunt laudari voluptatem. Nec æstimatur voluptas illa Epicuri (ita enim mehercules sentio) quam sobria & sica fit: sed ad nomen ipsum advolant, quærentes libidinibus suis patrocinium aliquod ac velamentum (138). ----- Their Revels are not owing to the Infatigation of Epicurus, but being abandoned to Vice they hide their Luxury in the Bosom of Philosophy, and throw themselves into the Arms of that Set which espouses Pleasure. Nor do they consider how narrow and jejune, (for such indeed I took upon it) the pleasure of Epicurus is; but fly to the bare name, thinking to find a shelter and Protection under it. Consult Gassendus; who unfolds this marvellously well, and shews how many great Men, carried away with the Torrent, have, from Age to Age, followed the established Prejudices, without examining Things to the Bottom. This is the Case of several Fathers: But Gregory Nazianzen did not suffer himself to be imposed upon (139); and I remember I have read in Origen (140), that the Followers of Epicurus forbore Adultery as much as the Stoics, tho' upon a different Motive.

[O] He had very good Notions and Maxims touching the Obedience due to Magistrates. We have seen before (141), how he is commended on account of his constant Zeal for the Good of his Country. He did not abandon it in difficult Times, but shared the Miseries of his Country-men. He lived upon Beans, and fed his Disciples with them, whilst Demetrius besieged Athens, dividing the Beans one by one with them: Kυδρυς ἀπὸς ἀριθμῶν μὲν ἑκάστην διαμενόν, Εἰς αὐτὸν ἰπὶς ἀνὰ ἀριθμὸν παρίσταντο (142). Ebas cum ipsi ad numerum partium (142). He wished for good Sovereigns, but submitted himself to those that governed ill. A Maxim most necessary for the Public Good, and the Foundation of the Safety and Tranquillity of States. Semper vota fecit pro Reipublicæ prosperitate ac veteri regimine, acquievit vero temporis præsentis ac Dominis sorte datus. Donec iracundos habuit magistratus, patiens fuit ac docilis, quum verò bonos ac mites, gratus fuit ac obsequiosus. (142*).

He put up continual Vows for the Safety of the Commonwealth, and the ancient Form of Government, but complied with the present State of Affairs, and submitted to those who had the Fortune to govern. Whilst the Magistrates were severe, he was patient and peaceable, but when they were mild and indulgent, he was grateful and dutiful. I am a Witness, said a modern wise Man (143), and not a Judge of the Life of Princes; and though I should not approve their Conduct, I should stick fast to that old Oracle, Bona tempora voto expetere, qualiacunque tolerare. This is taken out of Tacitus (144), and is also to be found in a Speech which an Emperor made to his Soldiers: Χρὴ δ' ἀνδρας γενναίους τε καὶ σώφρονες εὐχεσθαι μὴ ὑπάρχειν τὰ βέλτιστα, εἶναι δὲ τὰ προσήκοντα. Decet autem viros fortes atque moderatos optima quidem optare, sed ferre quæcunque incident (145). — Brave and considerate Men ought to wish for the best, but to bear with what happens.

[P] His Fame was much greater after his Death, than during his Life. Seneca, speaking of several great Men, whose Contemporaries had not done them justice, does not forget Epicurus. Quam multorum profectus, says he (146), in notitiam evasere post ipsos, quam multos fama non excepit sed eruit? Vides Epicurum, quantopere non tantum eruditiores, sed hæc quoque imperitorum turba miretur. Hic ignotus ipsis Athenis fuit, circa quas delituerat. Multis itaque jam annis Metrodoro suo superstes, in quadam epistola, cum amicitiam suam & Metrodori, grata commemoratione cecinit, hoc novissime adjecit, nihil sibi & Metrodoro inter bona tanta novissimum, quod ipsos illa nobilis Græcia non ignotos

(138) Seneca, de Vita Beati, cap. xii, pag. m. 625. See the Penicils sur les Cometes, pag. 535.

(139) He acknowledged, that Epicurus's Morals were very regular, Iamb. 18. See Gassend. lib. vii, cap. iv.

(140) Origen, contra Celsum, lib. vii, pag. 375.

(141) Rem. [N], Citat. (129).

(142) Plot. in Demetrio, pag. 905: A.

(142*) Rondellus, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, pag. 126.

(143) Bolzac, Letter xxvii, of the fourteenth Book, pag. 613. Edit. in Folio.

(144) Hiſtor. lib. iv, cap. viii.

(145) Alexander Severus, apud Herodian. lib. vi, cap. iii, pag. m. 262.

(146) Seneca, Epist. lxxi, p. 8. m. 325.

solum habuisset, sed pene inauditos. Numquid ergo non postea, quam esse desiderat, inventus est? numquid non opinio ejus emicuit? Hoc Metrodorus quod in quadam epistola confitetur, se & Epicurum non satis eminuisse: sed post, se & Epicurum, magnum paratumque nomen habituros, apud eos qui voluissent per eadem ire vestigia. — How many have there been, says he, whose merits have not been known till they were almost forgot? How many have there been, to whom Fame gave at first a cool reception, and afterwards raised from Obscurity. You see Epicurus: how much is he admired not only by the learned, but also by the undisciplined Vulgar? He was unknown even at Athens. Having survived his Friend Metrodorus several Years, he wrote an Epistle, wherein he published a grateful Acknowledgement of their Friendship, and concluded with saying, that he and Metrodorus, amidst their great good Fortune, had received no Disadvantage from being not only unknown, but almost unheard of in Greece. But was not he found after he had ceased to be? Did not his Doctrine blaze forth? Metrodorus, in a certain Epistle, makes the same Confession, that he and Epicurus had not appeared with sufficient Lustre, but that they both should one day have a more noble Esteem from those who would tread in the same Paths. Note, That in Seneca's Time, not only the Learned, but also the Ignorant, had great Admiration for Epicurus. We have the Testimony of a Father of the Church, that Metrodorus did not feed himself with chimerical Notions, or vain Hopes, when he thought that the Sect of his good Friend Epicurus would make more Noise in the succeeding Ages, than it did during their Lives: For Lactantius declares that that Sect was ever more flourishing than the rest (147).

[Q] Plutarch has been so just, as to shew that there is nothing in his Banquet unworthy of a Philosopher. His Prejudices against Epicurus are sufficiently known, and therefore we may be assured that he does not favour him, and that when he justifies him, it is because he finds that he is wrongfully censured. He begins with saying, that They inveighed against Epicurus for introducing, in his Banquet, an impertinent and unseemly Discourse, about what Time was best to have to do with a Woman. For an old Man, at Supper, in the Company of Youths, to talk of such a Subject, and dispute whether after or before Supper was the most convenient Time, argued him to be a very loose and debauched Man (148). He says a little after, that Zopyrus, the Physician, a Man very well read in Epicurus, represented to those Critics, That they had not duly weighed that Piece; for he did not propose that Question at first, and as the beginning of the Discourse on purpose; but after Supper he desired the young Men to take a Walk, and then discourse and dispute upon it, abate their Desires, and restrain their Appetites: shewing them, that it was very hurtful at all Times, but especially after they had been eating and making merry. But suppose he had proposed this as the chief Topic for Discourse, does it not become a Philosopher to enquire which is the convenient and proper Time? Ought we not to time it well, and direct our Embraces by Reason? Or may such Discourses be otherwise allowed, and must they be thought unseemly Problems to be proposed at Table? Indeed I am of another Mind. It is true, I should blame a Philosopher, that in the middle of the Day, in the Schools, before all sorts of Men, should discourse of such a Subject; but over a Glass of Wine, between Friends and Acquaintance, when it is necessary to propose something besides dull serious Discourse, why should it be a Fault to hear or speak any Thing that may inform our Judgments, or direct our Practice in such Matters? And I protest, I had rather that Zeno had inserted his loose Topics of Po-(147) Epicuri disciplina celebrior semper fuit quam ceterorum. Lactant. Divin. Instit. lib. iii, cap. xviii.

(148) Plutarch, in the third Book of his Table-Talk, chap. vi.

one cannot live agreeably according to Epicurus's Principles. He shews, amongst other Things, that the Doctrine, which denies God's Providence, and the Immortality of the Soul, deprives a Man of a Thousand Comforts in Life [R], and drives him to Despair when he is near Death. I am not sorry that the Author has forborn examining, whether those, who denied a Providence, argued more consistently than those who acknowledged one: I mean, Whether supposing, as all Philosophers did, that Matter was self-existent, it was not a more solid Reasoning to maintain that the Gods did not actuate Matter, than to suppose they disposed of it (as they pleased). I say once more, I am not sorry Plutarch did not enter upon the Examination of that Question; for he was too much prepossessed against Epicureism, and too far engaged in certain Hypotheses, not to embarrass and embroil that nice and great Subject; but I am sorry I have met with no Book wherein this Matter was in some measure discussed. Methinks that, among so many Apologists for Epicurus, there should have been some, who, at the same Time that they condemned his Impiety, should have endeavoured to shew, That it was a Natural and Philosophical Consequence of the Error common to all the Heathens, about the Eternal Existence of Matter [S]. I shall make some Observations in some merry Discourses, and agreeable Table-talk, than in such a grave serious Piece of his Politics. The Greek is, Νὺ τὸν κύνα, καὶ τὸ ζῆ-νονος ἂν ἐβόλουν διαμεριστὸς ἐν συμποσίῳ τινὶ καὶ παιδίᾳ μᾶλλον ἢ σπεύδῃς τοσαύτης ἐ-χομένη συγγραμμάτων τῇ πολιτείᾳ καλῶν ἁγχῶν. *Per canem adjuro optare me suos illos diame-ris-

mos obsecrans Zenonem in convivio aliquo aut joco quam in tam serio de republica opere posuisse* (150). Here you see Epicurus justified, by a Writer who was not much his Friend; justified, I say, both in the Thing it self, and in the Manner of it, against a set of Slanderers, who after all were in the wrong, and who unfaithfully related the Circumstances. But here is another sort of Justification. Plutarch himself imitates him; he disputes at Table about the same Question; he turns it every way, and reasons like a great Master in these Things. He is nevertheless one of the gravest Authors among the Heathens, and one who constantly inveighed against Immorality: Which ought to teach our false Zealots and pretended nice Critics, that they are rashly, and without Reason, offended at the liberty the Author has taken, in this Dictionary, to relate what they call merry Stories. Do not our Christian Physicians, even those who carefully keep up the Character of Gravity, and shew a great Zeal for the Purity of Morals, handle the same Question, the handling of which was charged upon Epicurus as a Crime? Let their Style be never so clean, can they examine that Question without raking into Filthiness, and without presenting a great many obscene Images to the Mind? But would it not be ridiculous to pretend, under this pretence, that they ought not to discuss it, let the Rules and Cautions they give, and the Observations they make, be never so useful? Note, that Amiot, Bishop of Auxerre, and Great Almoner of France, made no manner of scruple to publish in French the whole Chapter, out of which I have taken some Passages: though it be stuffed with obscene Matters which he has ingeniously expressed. It must also be confessed, that the Morality of Plutarch in it is very fine; for he prescribes the Night for Love-Sports, out of a Principle of Religion. For, says he (151), all Men have not the Command of that happy Ease and Tranquillity, which Epicurus's Philosophy procured him; for many great Incumbrances seize almost upon every one every Day, or at least some Disquiets, and it is not safe to trust the Body with any of these, when it is in such a Condition and Disturbance presently after the Fury and Heat of the Embrace is over. Let, according to his Opinion, the happy and immortal Deity sit at ease, and never mind us; but if we regard the Laws of our Country, we must not dare to enter into the Temple and offer Sacrifice, if but a little before we have done any such Thing. It is fit therefore to let Night and Sleep intervene, and after there is a sufficient space of Time passed between, rise as it were pure and new, and, as Demonax was wont to say, with new Thoughts upon the new Day.

[R] The Doctrine which denies God's Providence, and the Immortality of the Soul, robs Man of a Thousand Comforts. Plutarch proves this so solidly, that after having read his Reasonings, one cannot sufficiently wonder at the powerful Influence the first Impressions of certain Objects have upon our Minds. The first Idea, which presents itself to those who will examine the Case of Irreligion, is the Idea of a Liberty most happy according to human Notions, wherein a Man may gratify all his Desires without either Fear or Remorse. This Idea takes so deep a Root in the Mind, and fills it up to that degree, that if any one tells us, that the Condition of a pious Man, in Point of temporal Advantages, is incomparably above that of an Epicurean, we reject that Assertion as a most absurd Lye. Nevertheless, this pretended Lye is supported by a vast number of strong Reasons, as Plutarch has very well made it appear. The Honesty of that Author, in this part of his Dispute, seems very considerable to me, in case he was sensible how far his Reasons might serve to justify Epicureism; for if it be certain, that by denying God's Providence, and the Immortality of the Soul, a Man deprives himself of a thousand Blessings and Comforts, it was not thro' Motives of Interest, through Self-love or Voluptuousness, that Epicurus chose the Philosophical Hypothesis he taught. He would rather have chosen the other, if he had been determined by such Motives. There are many Things to be said upon this Matter; but I chuse to refer them to another Book (152), wherein I shall likewise examine an Objection which Mr le Fevre has proposed against Plutarch. He accuses him of having contradicted himself; to prove which, he mentions what Plutarch, disputing against Epicurus, has said about the temporal Advantages and Comforts of Religion, and what the same Plutarch has maintained in another Place, that Superstition is worse than Atheism (153).

[S] Some of Epicurus's Apologists should have endeavoured to shew that his Impiety was a natural Consequence of the eternal Existence of Matter.] There was, among the Natural Philosophers of the Heathens, a great variety of Opinions, about the Origin of the World, and the Nature of the Element or Elements, of which they pretended particular Bodies to have been formed. Some maintained, that Water was the Principle of all things, others gave that Quality to the Air, others to the Fire, others to Homogeneous Parts, &c. but they all agreed in this Point, that the Matter of the World was unproduced. They never disputed among themselves upon the Question, whether any Thing was made out of Nothing. They all agreed, that this was impossible; and consequently the independent Eternity, which Epicurus attributed to Atoms, was not an Opinion which other Sects might condemn with respect to that necessary and increased Existence; for every one of them ascribed the same Nature to the Principles they admitted. Now I say, this Impiety being once supposed, to wit, that God is not the Creator of Matter; it is less absurd to maintain, as the Epicureans did, that God was not the Author of the World, and did not concern himself with the Government of it, than to maintain, as many other Philosophers did, that he had formed it, and did both preserve and direct it. What they said, was true indeed; but however, they spoke not consistently with their Principles. It was an intruding Truth, which had got into their System, not thro' the Door, but thro' the Window; and if they found themselves in the right Way, it was because they went astray from the Road they had first entered upon. If they had known how to follow it, they would not have proved orthodox; and

(150) Plut. in Sympos. lib. iii,
esp. vi, pag. 653.

(151) Plut. Ibid.
pag. 655.

(152) In the Sequel of the Penitences diversas far les Cometes.

(153) Tanay-Fabre, Preface to his Translation of Plutarch's Treatise concerning Superstition. See the same also towards the End of his Remarks upon that Treatise.

servations thereupon, which will shew, amongst other Things, I. That when a Man does not follow the System of the Holy Scripture, concerning the Creation, the more consequentially and therefore that Orthodoxy was a balked and monstrous Production, which by chance resulted from their Ignorance, and for which they were indebted to their Incapacity of reasoning well. This Reproach was yet much stronger with respect to those Philosophers who lived before Anaxagoras, since they explained the Generation of the World without the Intervention of the Finger of God (154). If after that they admitted a Divine Providence, they reasoned much worse than those, who did not admit it till after they had supposed that the Divine Intelligence presided over the Reduction of the Chaos to Order, and the first Formation of the Parts of this World.

If I should say no more, most of my Readers would imagine that I advance as impious a Paradox as the Doctrine of Epicurus itself. I must therefore explain this as clearly as possible: In order to that, I shall first lay down this Foundation, That, according to the System of all the Heathen Philosophers who believed a God, there was an eternal, increased Being distinct from God; to wit, Matter; which owed its Existence to its own Nature only, and had no Dependence upon any other Thing, either as to its Essence, Existence, Attributes, or Properties. Therefore it could not be affirmed, without contradicting the Laws and Notions of Order, which are the standing Rules of our Judgments and Reasonings, That another Being has exercised such a great Power over Matter, as to have made an absolute Change in it: And consequently those, who have advanced, that Matter, having eternally existed by itself, without being a World, began to be a World when God was pleased to move it in a thousand different Ways; condensing it in one Place, rarifying it in another, &c. have advanced a Doctrine that shocks the most exact Notions, to which those who philosophize are bound to conform themselves. If Epicurus had thus interrogated a Platonic Philosopher, Pray tell me by what Right God has deprived Matter of that State wherein it had eternally subsisted? What is his Title? Whence has he his Commission to make this Reform? What could the Platonic have answered? Could he have founded God's Title upon the superior Force with which he was endowed? In this Case, would he not have made God act according to the Law of the strongest, and after the Manner of those conquering Usurpers, whose Conduct is manifestly opposite to Right, and which Reason and the Notions of Order represent to us as unjustifiable? Would he have said, that God being much more perfect than Matter, it was just he should subject it to his Dominion? but even this clashes with the Notions of Reason. The most excellent Man of a City has no Right to make himself Master of it, and cannot lawfully govern there, unless that Authority is conferred upon him. In short, we know no other lawful Title of Dominion than that which either the Quality of Cause, or the Quality of Benefactor, or that of Purchaser, or a voluntary Submission, &c. can give. Now nothing of all this can have Place between an increased Matter and the Divine Nature: therefore we must conclude, That, without violating the Laws of Order, God could not make himself Master of that Matter, to dispose of it at his Will. If you allege what passes between Man and other Animals, and the Dominion he exercises over Beasts he has neither produced nor fed (155), I will answer (156), That either his Wants, or his Passions, being the Basis of that Dominion, that cannot serve to make us apprehend how God could assume the Command over Matter; he who wants nothing, and who finds in himself the whole Stock of his infinite Felicity; and who is capable of no Passion, and cannot do any Action that is not perfectly conformable to the strictest Justice.

Omnis enim per se divum natura necesse est
Immortali ævo summa cum pace fruatur

Ipse suis pollens opibus, nihil indiga nostri (157).

For what's her's Divine must live in Peace,
In undisturb'd and everlasting Ease,

From all Dependence on our Nature free,
Sufficient to its own Felicity.

A Platonic, thus pressed, would be obliged to say, That God exercised his Power over Matter merely from a Principle of Goodness. God, would he say (158), knew perfectly these two Things: the one, that he would do nothing against the Inclination of Matter, by subjecting it to his Dominion; for being insensible, it could not be capable of being grieved at the loss of its Independency: The other, that it was in a State of Confusion and Imperfection; a disorderly heap of Materials, of which an excellent Edifice might be made, and some of which might be converted into living Bodies and thinking Substances: Wherefore he was pleased to communicate to Matter a more beautiful and more noble State than that which it was first in. Is there any thing in this unworthy of a Being sovereignly just, and sovereignly good? This, methinks, is the most rational Answer a Platonic could make; but I think, at the same time, that Epicurus would desire no better than to see the Controversy brought to that Issue: For he would have many Difficulties to propose.

I. He would ask, in the first Place, whether a thing can be capable of a more convenient State than that it has ever been in, and in which it has eternally been placed by its own Nature, and the Necessity of its Existence. Is not such a Condition the most natural that can be imagined? Can that want any Reformation which has been regulated and determined by the Nature of Things, and by that Necessity to which all that exists by itself owes its Existence? Is it not necessarily to last a whole Eternity? And is not this a Proof that any Reformation would come too late, and consequently would be incompatible with the Wisdom of the Reformer?

II. But let us suppose the Maxim, Better late than never; Præstat sero quam nunquam: How will that Reformer do to change the State and Condition of Matter? Must he not produce Motion in it? And, in order to that, must he not touch and push it? If he can touch and push it, he is not distinct from Matter; and if he be not distinct from Matter, it is without Reason you admit two increased Beings: the one which you call Matter, the other which you call God: For since there is in effect nothing but Matter in the Universe, our Dispute is at an End; the Author of the World, that Director, the Divine Providence in Question, vanish into Smoke. If he be distinct from Matter, he has no extension: tell me then, how he can apply himself to Bodies to drive them out of their Places? The Platonic would answer, That Matter was ever in Motion, and therefore it was only necessary to direct that Motion: But it will be replied, that in order to direct the Motion of certain Bodies, it is necessary to move others. This appears in the working of a Ship, and in all machines: Wherefore the Divine Nature, unless it were Material, could with no more ease give a new Determination to a Motion already existing, than produce Motion originally. Note, That Aristotle has acknowledged the Supposition of the eternal Motion of Matter to be absurd: He solidly confutes Plato, who advanced, that before the Formation of the World there was a disorderly Agitation in the Elements. Ἦν γὰρ ἀτάκτως τὸν κόσμον ἐκινεῖτο τὰ στοιχεῖα ἀτάκτως. Elementa inordinata movebantur antea quam mundus esset (159). He convinces him of contradicting himself; and observes in general against those who taught, That the Motion that preceded the Existence of the World was irregular, that they advanced an Absurdity; since the Motion which agrees to most things, and for a longer Time, ought to be accounted natural: From whence it follows, that the Production of the World would rather be an Overthrow of the State of Nature, than an Introduction of the true natural State: Ἐπὶ τὸ ἀτάκτως, ἔδεν εἶναι ἕτερον, ἢ τὸ παρὰ φύσιν, ἢ γὰρ τάξις ἢ οἰκία, τὸν αἰσθητὸν κόσμον εἶναι. ἀλλὰ μὴν καὶ τὸτο ἀτοπον καὶ ἀδύνατον, τὸ, τὸ ἀπύρρον ἀτακτὸν ἔχειν κίνησιν. ἐπὶ γὰρ ἢ φύσις ἐκείνη τῶν πραγμάτων, οἷον ἔχει τὰ πλεῖστα, καὶ τὸν πλεῖστον χρόνον. συμπαύειν

(158) Note, That this Platonic, pressed by Epicurus's Objections, must be forced to abandon the Opinion which Plato ascribes to Plato, touching the Soul of Matter. See the Rem. [U] towards the End.

(159) Plato, in Timæo apud Aristotelem de Cælo, lib. iii, cap. ii, pag. m. 320. G.

(154) See the Article ANAXAGORAS, Rem. [F].

(155) I speak thus, because I consider Men and Beasts in general; and not a Man in particular, who buys, feeds, &c. such or such a Beast.

(156) I suppose, that it is Epicurus makes this Answer, and not a Man who has read, in Genesis, what is the lawful Cause of the Authority we exercise over Animals.

(157) Lucret. lib. i, ver. 57.

consequentially he reasons, the more he goes astray. II. That that System alone has the Causes in the World, the more he goes astray. II. That that System alone has the εἶναι κατὰ φύσιν, τὴν δὲ τάξιν καὶ τὸν κόσμον παρὰ φύσιν. καὶ τοὶ ἑδὲν ὡς ἐτυχὲ γίγνεται τὰ κατὰ φύσιν: Præterea inordinate quippiam fieri nil aliud est, quam fieri præter naturam: ordo enim proprius sensibilibus natura nimirum est. At verò hoc absurdum est ac impossibile, infinitum inquam inordinatum motum habere. Est enim ea natura rerum quam plures & majori tempore habent. Contrarium igitur istis accidit, inordinationem quidem esse secundum naturam, ordinem verò mundum præter naturam: & tamen nihil eorum, quæ sunt secundum naturam, sit fortè fortuna (160). Wherefore he observes, that Anaxagoras, who supposed that the Parts of Matter were at Rest when the World was first produced, had right Notions of the Thing. Εἰς δὲ τὸ γὰρ αὐτὸ καλῶς Ἀναξαγόρας ὑπολαμβάνει ἀκινήτων γὰρ ἀρχῆς κοσμοποιεῖν. Videtur autem Anaxagoras hoc ipsum bene accepisse: ex immobilibus enim incipit conficere mundum (161). Let us return to Epicurus.

III. Let us, if you please, reckon all my Reasons à priori for nothing, would he say in the third Place to the Platonist. Nay, I give up this Objection, viz. That Goodness is not to be commended, unless it be accompanied with Judgment. Now we do not see that judicious People, though never so good-natured, meddle of their own accord with the domestic Disorders of their Neighbours; they content themselves with settling Things in a right order at home (162). A wise Prince remedies Abuses in his State; but he does not trouble himself with reforming neighbouring Monarchies, leaving that Care to those to whom they belong. We might presuppose upon that Notion of Wisdom, that God could not undertake to remedy the Imperfections of Matter: He was not answerable for them, since he had no Share in the Production of Bodies; which 'twas the Work of Nature, and therefore she ought to dispose of it. I give up this Argument, would Epicurus say; and I give you Leave to make use of the Example of those Heroes, who have been ranked among the Gods for the great Services they have done human Kind.

Romulus, & Liber pater, & cum Castore Pollux,
 Post ingentia facta, Deorum in templa recepti,
 Dum terras hominumque colunt genus, aspera bella
 Componunt, agros assignant, oppida condunt (163).

Bacchus, Quirinus, and the Sons of Jove,
 Whose Virtues rais'd them to the Gods above,
 Whilst here they liv'd, check'd War's destructive Rage, Built Towns, made Laws, and civiliz'd the Age.

Let us consider in another Sense, if those Motives of Goodness you mention ought not to have been overruled by Reasons of Wisdom.

IV. A wise Agent never undertakes to employ a great Heap of Materials, without having first well examined their Qualities, and being assured they are susceptible of the Form he designs to give them; and if, upon examining their Qualities, he finds that they have incorrigible Faults, which would render their new Condition worse than the former, he will not meddle with them: He abandons them to themselves; and judges, he will act with more Wisdom and Goodness in leaving Things as he finds them, than in giving them another Form which would become pernicious. Now you Platonist agree (164), that there has been in Matter a real Defect, which was an Obstacle to God's Project; an Obstacle, I say, which has not permitted

God to make a World free from those Disorders we perceive in it: And it is certain, on the other side, that those Disorders render the Condition of Matter infinitely more unhappy than that eternal, necessary, and independent State in which it had been before the Generation of the World. All was insensible in that State: Grief, Pain, Crime, all Physical and Moral Evils, were then unknown. It is true, there was no Pleasure felt: But that Privation of Good was not an Evil; since it cannot be so, but as it is felt and lamented. You see therefore that it did not become a wife and good Being to change the Condition of Matter, to transform it into such a World as this is. It contained in it's Bosom the Seeds of all the Crimes and Miseries we now behold: But those were unfruitful Seeds; and in that State they did no more Harm than if they had not existed; nor were they pernicious and fatal, till after the Animals were hatched out of them by the Formation of the World. Thus Matter was a Camarina which should not have been stirred (165); it should have been left in it's eternal Rest: Well remembering, that the more one stirs a stinking Matter, the more it spreads it's Infection round. We must not doubt but the Divine Nature has acted by this Notion; and therefore it is not she has made the World.

V. It could not be answered to Epicurus, that God did not foresee the Malignity of the Souls that should be hatched out of those Seeds of Matter: For he would presently reply, I. That thereby we should ascribe to God such an Ignorance as would have had ill Consequences; II. That at least God would have foreseen things to their former State, after he had seen the ill Effects of his Work; and that so the World would not have lasted till the Time when he, Epicurus, disputed with a Platonist about the Doctrine of Providence.

VI. His last Objection would be the strongest: He would shew to his Adversary, that the most intimate, general, and infallible Notion we have of God is, that God enjoys a perfect Felicity (166). Now this is incompatible with the Supposition of Providence: For if he governs the World, he has created it; if he has created it, he has either foreseen all the Disorders that are in it, or he has not foreseen them. If he has foreseen them, it cannot be said that he made the World out of a Principle of Goodness; which destroys the best Answer of the Platonist. If he has not foreseen them, it is impossible that, seeing the ill success of his Work, he should not have been extremely grieved at it: he would have been convinced that he had not known the Quality of the Materials, or had wanted Power to overcome their Resistance, as without doubt he hoped to have done. There is no Workman that can see without Grief his hopes baffled, that he has missed his Aim, and that, having designed to work for the public Good, he had made a pernicious Machine, &c. We have indeed some Ideas, whereby we know that this can never be God's Case; but we have none whereby to know, that, if by an Impossibility it was his Case, he were not to be pitied, and most unhappy.

VII. If you suppose afterwards, that, instead of destroying such a Work, he obstinately resolves to preserve it, and continually to be employed either in mending it's Faults, or preventing their Increase; you give us the Idea of the most unhappy Nature that can be conceived. He designed to build a magnificent Palace for the Accommodation of animated Creatures, which were to come out of the shapeless Bosom of Matter, and there to bestow Felicity upon them; but it happened that those Creatures did but eat one another, being incapable to continue alive, if the Flesh of

(160) Aristotel. de Cælo, lib. iii, cap. ii, pag. 37, B.

(161) Id. ibid. C.

(162) See Erasmus upon the Proverb, Adibus in nostris quæ prava aut recta geruntur; which is in the 8th of the 11th Century of the first Cædars, pag. m. 222.

(163) Horat. Epist. I, lib. iii, ver. 5.

(164) Nota, Materiam inobsequentem, & ab eâ Præva esse. Plato sæpè hæc tangit, & hæc transit: ut cum dicit Materiam, aut in ea Ψυχὴν, ἀτακτὴν καὶ κακοταίον, Animam, incompotitam & mali auctorem, sive maleficam, iterumque, ἐναντίαν καὶ ἀντίπαλον τῇ ἀσάβερῳ φύσει: Adversariam & rebellem Beneficæ Naturæ, id est Deo. Animam sive Vim in Materia dicit: neque enim ipsam per se vult malam, sed latens in ea aliquid, quod in generatione se exerit & promit. Imò duas Mundi animas ab eo statui, natu jam grandiore, in Libris de Legibus; & cum diu fluctasset, Beneficam ac Maleficam; Plutarchus est auctor. — There is a Perverseness in Matter, which is the Cause of Depravity. Plato often touches upon this; to this he often has Recourse, as when he says that Matter has an inordinate Spirit which is prone to Evil, and, in another Place, stubborn and disobedient to the Beneficent Nature, that is, to God. He says there is a Spirit or Power in Matter, nor does he make it to be bad in itself, but some latent Quality therein which exerts and displays itself in Generation. In his later Years, in his Books of Laws, he asserted two Souls of the World, and after some wavering admitted one good, the other bad; as Plutarch assures us. Lipsius, Phys. Stoicor. l. 1. differt. 14. pag. m. 867. He quotes Plutarch, de Iside & Osiride. He ought to have quoted him also, de Animæ procreat. ex Timæo. See also Maximus Tyrius, Serm. 25.

(165) See Erasmus upon the Proverb, Movere Camarinam. It is the 6th of the 1st Century of the first Cædars. He quotes this Greek Verse: Μη μωραὶς καμάριναν ἀκινήτος γὰρ ἀμείβω. Ne moveas Camarinam, etenim non tangere præstat.

(166) See the Poets of Lucræ, quoted above Citat. (157), and in Rem. [N] of the Article SPINOZA, n. 5.

the Advantage of laying the solid Foundation of the Providence, and Perfections of God [7]. There is nothing more wretched than Epicurus's way of explaining the Liberty some did not serve as Food to others. It happened that the most perfect of those Animals did not spare even the Flesh of those of his Kind; there happened to be Cannibals among them: And those, who abstained from that Brutality, did not forbear persecuting one another, and were a prey to Envy, Jealousy, Fraud, Avarice, Cruelty, Diseases, Cold, Heat, Hunger, &c. Their Author struggling continually with the Malignity of the Matter productive of these Disorders (167), and obliged to have always the Thunderbolt in his Hand (168), and to pour down upon the Earth Pestilence, War, and Famine; which, with the Wheels and Gibbets with which Highways abound, do not hinder Evil from maintaining itself: Can their Author, I say, be looked upon as a happy Being? Can one be happy, when at the end of four thousand Years Labour he has made no further Progress in his Work than the first Day he undertook it, and which he passionately desires to finish? Is not this Image of Infelicity as lively as Exion's Wheel, Sisyphus's Stone, and the Tub of the Danaides?

I say nothing but what is very likely, when I suppose that Epicurus persuaded himself that the Gods would soon have repented the having made the World; and that the Trouble of governing so indocile and refractory an Animal as Man, would disturb their Felicity. Do we not see in the Scripture, that the True God, accommodating himself to our Capacity, has revealed himself as a Being, who, having known the Malice of Man, repented, and was sorry he had created him (169), and as a Being who is provoked, and complaining of the ill Success of his Labour (170)? He says to Israel, All the Day long I have stretched forth my Hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying People (171). I know well enough that the same Book, which teaches us all these things, teaches us likewise how to rectify the Idea they present to us at first Sight: But Epicurus, destitute as he was of the Light of Revelation, could not rectify Philosophy, and must of necessity follow the Path which such a Guide shewed him. Now, faithfully pursuing this Track, and supported by these two Principles; one, that Matter was self-existent, and suffered not itself to be managed according to God's Desire; the other, that the Felicity of God cannot admit the least Disturbance; he must have rested in this Conclusion, that there is no Divine Providence. We shall draw from thence some Consequences advantageous to the Truth of the Christian Religion. See the following Remark. Note, That if instead of engaging Epicurus with a Platonic, I had made him dispute with a Priest of Athens, he would have carried the Victory with more Ease. See also the following Remark.

[7] The System of Scripture alone has the Advantage of laying the solid Foundation of the Providence, and Perfections of God. Epicurus's Objections, which have been set forth in the preceding Remark, and were sufficient to nonplus the Heathen Philosophers, disappear and vanish away like Smoke, with respect to those whom Revelation has taught, That God is the Creator of the World, both as to it's Matter and to it's Form. This Truth is of the utmost Importance: For we draw from thence, as from a plentiful Source, the most sublime and most fundamental Doctrines, and one cannot lay down the Hypothesis opposite to that, without overthrowing several great Principles of Reasoning. From God's being the Creator of Matter, it results, I. That with the most lawful Authority that can be, he disposes of the Universe as he thinks fit: II. That he needs only a single Act of his Will to do whatever he pleases: III. That nothing happens but what he has placed in the Plan of his Work. It follows from thence, That the Conduct of the World is not an Employment that can either fatigue or trouble God, and that no Events whatsoever can disturb his Felicity. If some Things happen which he has forbidden, and which he punishes, they do not however happen contrary to his Decrees; and they are subservient to the Ends he has proposed to himself from all Eternity, and which are the greatest Mysteries of the Gospel. But the better to know the Importance of the Doctrine of the Creation, we must also cast our Eyes upon the inextricable Difficulties into which they involve themselves who deny it. Consider therefore what Epicurus might have objected to the Platonians, as we have seen before, and what may be said now-a-days against the Socinians. They have rejected the Evangelical Mysteries, because they could not reconcile them with the Light of Reason. They would have contradicted themselves, if they had agreed that God created Matter: For this Philosophical Axiom, Ex nihilo nihil fit, Nothing is made out of nothing, is as evident as the Principles by Virtue of which they have denied the Trinity and the Hypostatic Union. They have therefore denied the Creation: But what have they got by it? Why, the falling into one Abyss by avoiding another (172): For they have been obliged to acknowledge the independent Existence of Matter, and at the same time to submit it to the Authority of another Being. They have been forced to own, That necessary Existence may belong to a Substance which is besides full of Defects and Imperfection; and this destroys a most evident Notion, to wit, That what is eternally and independently self-existent, ought to be infinitely perfect: For what could have set Bounds to the Power and Attributes of such a Being? In short, they must answer most of the Difficulties, which I have supposed Epicurus might have proposed to the Philosophers who admitted the Eternity of Matter (173). From whence we may infer, by the by, That it is very advantageous to the True Religion, to shew that the Eternity of Matter draws after it the Destruction of Divine Providence. By this Means we shew the Necessity, Truth, and Certainty of the Creation.

VOL. II.

I am sure one of the greatest Philosophers of this Age, and at the same time one of the most zealous Writers for the Doctrines of the Gospel, will agree, that by making an Apology for Epicurus, such as you have seen it ex hypothesi in the preceding Remark, one does the true Faith no small Service. He teaches not only, That there would be no Providence, if God had not created Matter; but even, That God would not know that there is Matter, if it was uncreated. I shall cite his Words at large, wherein the Socinians will find their Condemnation: 'How stupid and ridiculous Philosophers are! They imagine the Creation to be impossible, because they do not conceive the Power of God to be so great as to make something out of nothing. But can they conceive how God's Power is able to move a Straw? If they consider it well, they conceive not the one more clearly than the other, since they have no clear Idea of Efficacy or Power; inasmuch that if they followed their false Principle, they ought to affirm, That God wants even the Power to give Motion to Matter. But this false Conclusion would engage them in such impertinent and impious Opinions, that they would soon become the Objects of the Contempt and Indignation even of the least understanding Persons: For they would soon be reduced to maintain, That there is no Motion or Change in the World; or else, that all those Changes are not produced by any Cause, nor regulated by Wisdom . . . (174). If Matter was uncreated, God could neither move it, nor form any thing out of it: For God can neither move Matter, nor wisely dispose of it, without knowing it. Now God cannot know it, unless He gives Existence to it: For God can have no Knowledge of any thing but from Himself. Nothing can act in Him, or enlighten Him. Therefore if God did not see in Himself, and by the Knowledge He has of His Will, the Existence of Matter, it would have been eternally unknown to Him: He could not therefore dispose it into Order, or form any Work out of it. Now Philosophers agree, as well as you, That God can move Bodies: And so, tho' they have no clear Idea of Power or Efficacy, tho' they see no Connection between the Will of God and the Productions of Creatures, they ought to acknowledge, that God has created Matter, unless they mean to make Him impotent and ignorant; which is corrupting the Idea we have of Him, and denying His Existence' (175).

Before I end, I will make another Observation. I have made Epicurus dispute against a Platonic Philosopher; which was not making the most of his Advantages: For he would have confuted all the other Sects much more easily than that of Plato. But his greatest Advantage

(167) Utrum . . . Deus quod vult efficiat, an in multis rebus illud tractanda destituant, & à magno artifice prave formentur multa, non quia cessat ars, sed quia id in quo exerceatur sepe inobsequens arti est. Seneca, in Prof. lib. i. Quaest. Natur.

(168) . . . neque Per nostrum patitur scelus Incedenda Jovem ponere fulmina. But still averse to Jove's Command We won't permit his lifted Hand To lay his angry Thunder down. Horat. Od. iii. lib. i. ver. 38.

(169) Gen. vi. 5, 6.

(170) Isaiah, v. & passim alibi, the Prophets and Psalms.

(171) Rom. x. 2.

(172) Incidit in Scyllam cupiens vitare Charybdim. See Erasmus, Chil. i. Cent. v. n. 4.

(173) Note. That it is affirmed, that some Socinians have turned Socinists, by reason of the Difficulties they have found in the Hypothesis of a material principle existing by itself, and distinct from God.

(174) Father Mallebranche, Méditations Chrétiennes, 12^e Méditation, n. 3, pag. m. 140.

(175) Id. ibid. n. 5, pag. 141, 142.

A FICTITIOUS Dispute between Epicurus and a Pagan Priest.

Advantage would have been to dispute with a Priest. Let us give a Specimen of it: Let us suppose that Epicurus told him, You call me impious, because I teach, That the Gods do not meddle with the Government of the World; and I charge you with not knowing how to reason, and, besides, with doing the Gods a great Injury. Is it consonant to the Light of Reason, to believe that Jupiter has an absolute Power over the Universe; he who is Son of Saturn, and Grandson to Heaven? Is it for an Upright-Deity, as he was, to govern Matter, which is an eternal and independent Being? Know that whatever has a Beginning, is as new as what was done yesterday and to day in comparison of Eternity. Do not therefore subvert all order, by subjecting the Matter of the Universe to so young a God. Let us come to the other Point: Answer me, pray; are the Gods pleased with their Administration, or no? Mind well my Dilemma: If they are pleased with what happens under their Providence, then they delight in Evil; if they are displeased with it, then they are unhappy. Now it clashes with common Notions, that they should love what is Evil, and that they should not be happy. They do not like Evil, would the Priest answer; nay, they look upon it as a great Offence, which they punish severely: And from hence proceed Plagues, Wars, Famines, Shipwrecks, Inundations, &c. I conclude from your Answer, would Epicurus reply, that they are unhappy: For nothing can make one's Life more unhappy, than to be continually exposed to Injuries, and continually obliged to revenge them. Sin never ceases among Men; therefore there is not one Moment in the Day wherein the Gods have not some Affronts put upon them. The Plague, War, and the other Evils you have mentioned, never cease upon Earth: For if they end from Time to Time in one Country, they never cease with respect to all Nations; and so the Gods have no sooner taken Revenge of one Nation, but they must begin to punish another: Their Work is never at an end. What a Life is this? Could one with a greater Torment to one's mortal Enemy (176) I had much rather attribute to them a quiet Condition, void of care. But, would the Priest say, you suppose then, that they see the Disorders of Mankind unconcerned, and without endeavouring to redress them: Does this Indifference do them much Credit? Are they not younger than the Heaven? would Epicurus reply; do not you say, that the most ancient of the Gods, who reigns at present, accounts the Heaven his Grandfather? They did not then make the World; and therefore it is not for them to concern themselves with what passes upon Earth, or elsewhere. They know that Matter exists from all Eternity, and that the fatal Necessity of self-existing Beings cannot be changed: They therefore let the Stream run on, and do not undertake to reform an immutable Order. Neither ought we to wonder that their Perfections are limited, since you confess that those of Matter, which exists eternally, are very small. Your Jupiter, and his Assistants in the Celestial Council, have little Reason to pretend to punish Leudness; since they themselves are so unfaithful to their Wives, and have deflowered so many Virgins. You cannot deny however (would the Priest answer) but the Doctrine of Providence is of great Force to keep the People in their Duty. That is not the thing in question now, would Epicurus reply: Do not change the State of our Dispute. We seek not what may have been established as an useful Invention, but what truly flows from the Light of Reason.

(176) Hostibus
eveniunt talia
dona meis.

[U] There is nothing more wretched, than Epicurus's way of explaining the Liberty of human Actions. There is no System, from which the fatal Necessity of all things flows more inevitably, than from that which Epicurus borrowed of Leucippus and Democritus: For what they said, that the World had formed itself by Chance, or by the fortuitous Concourse of Atoms, did not exclude the Direction of an intelligent Cause; and did not signify, that the Production of the World was not a Consequence of the eternal and necessary Laws of the Motion of corporeal Principles. And indeed, it is certain that Democritus attributed all things to a necessitating Destiny: Quam duæ sententiae fuissent veterum philosophorum, una eorum qui censerent, omnia ita fato fieri, ut id fatum vim necessitatis asserret, in qua sententia DEMOCRITUS, HERACLITUS, EMPEDO- cles, ARISTOTELES fuit: altera eorum, quibus viderentur sine ullo fato esse animorum motus voluntarii: CHRYSSIPPUS tanquam honorarius arbiter, &c. (177). — There have been two Opinions amongst the ancient Philosophers; one that made every thing so dependant upon Fate, as to imply a necessity; on this side stood DEMOCRITUS, HERACLITUS, EMPEDOCLEAS, ARISTOTELIS: The other, which maintained that the Actions of the Mind were voluntary, and not influenced by Fate. EPICURUS not liking an Opinion which seemed to overthrow all Morality, and reduce the humane Soul to the Condition of a Machine, abandoned in that Particular the System of Atoms, and sided with those who admitted Freedom in the Will of Man. He declared against fatal Necessity, and even took unnecessary Precautions: For lest it should be inferred, that if every Proposition is either true or false, all happens by Fatality; he denied that every Proposition was either true or false (178). However, though he had granted that, no Body could have reasonably concluded from thence the Necessity of Fate. Consider well how Cicero shews him the Truth of what I have said: Licet enim EPICURUS concedenti, omne enunciatio aut verum aut falsum esse, non vereri ne omnia fato fieri sit necesse. Non enim æternis causis naturæ necessitate manantibus verum est id quod ita enunciat, Descendit in Academiam CARNEADES, nec tamen sine causis. Sed interest inter causas fortuito ategressas, & inter causas cohibentes in se efficientiam naturalem. Ita & semper verum fuit, Morietur EPICURUS, quum duo & septuaginta annos vixerit, Archonte PITHARATO: neque tamen erant causæ fatales cur ita accideret: sed quod ita cecidisset, certe casum sicut cecidit fuit (179). — Had EPICURUS granted that every Proposition was either true or false, there would have been reason to fear that all things must necessarily be determined by Fate. The Truth of this Proposition, CARNEADES entered the Schools, depend not upon Causes flowing from a Necessity of Nature, and yet some cause of it's Truth there must be. But there is a difference between accidental Causes, and Causes that carry with them a Nature of Necessity. Thus it was always true, EPICURUS will die, at the Age of seventy two, under the Administration of PITHARATUS; yet was there no Necessity why it should so happen; but since it did so happen, it is certain it was to happen accordingly. This Doctrine of Cicero has been fully explained in the Courses of Philosophy of the Jesuits, who of all Philosophers are the most zealous in maintaining that duarum propositionum contradictoriarum de futuro contingenti, altera est determinate vera, altera falsa. — Of two contradictory Propositions concerning a future Contingent the one is absolutely true, the other false. And nevertheless we see few Men that are greater Sticklers for the Doctrine of the Liberty of Indifference. From whence we may conclude, that there are means to reconcile the Free-will of Man with the Hypothesis, That every Proposition is either true or false. But because EPICURUS was not well assured of this Matter, he was afraid to intangle himself if he did not deny that Doctrine: He was not acquainted with all the Consequences of it; and therefore, to go upon sure Grounds, he chose to stand upon the Negative. CHRYSSIPPUS had no clearer Notions of it; for he believed, that unless he proved that every Proposition is either true or false, he could never prove that all things happen by the Force of Destiny: Contendit omnes nervos CHRYSSIPPUS, ut persuaderet omne æternum aut verum esse aut falsum. Ut enim EPICURUS veretur, ne, si hoc conceperit, concedendum sit fato fieri quæcumque fiant (si enim alterutrum ex æternitate verum sit, esse id etiam certum: & si certum, etiam necessarium: ita & necessitatem & fatum confirmari putat) sic CHRYSSIPPUS metuit, ne, si non obtinuerit, omne quod enuncietur, aut verum esse aut falsum, omnia fato fieri possint ex causis æternis rerum futurarum (180). — CHRYSSIPPUS labours with all his Might to evince that every Proposition is either true or false. For as EPICURUS feared, that if he made this Confession, he must likewise allow an absolute Fatality, (for if either side be eternally true, it must be certain: if certain, necessary: and thus be imagined Fate and Necessity would be established) so CHRYSSIPPUS was afraid, that, unless he gained this point, viz. that every Proposition was either true or false, all things would

(177) Cicero, de
Fato, cap. xvii.
Ser. bellus,
Citat. (183).

(178) See Cicero, de Naturæ
lib. i, cap. xii, & seq. de Academ.
lib. ii, cap. xlii.

(179) Id. de
Fato, cap. iii.

(180) Id. lib.
cap. x.

'would not be subject to Fate from the eternal Causes of future things.' Neither of these two great Philosophers apprehended, that the Truth of this Maxim, Every Proposition is either true or false, is independent upon what was called Fatum; and therefore it could not serve as a Proof for the Existence of Fatum, as Chrysippus pretended, and Epicurus feared. Chrysippus could not have granted, without doing himself Prejudice, that there are Propositions that are neither true nor false; but he got nothing by establishing the contrary: For whether there be free Causes or no, it is equally true that this Proposition, The Great Mogul will go to-morrow a hunting, or he will not go, is either true or false. It is with a great deal of Reason that this Discourse of Tiresias has been accounted ridiculous (181), viz. All I shall say, shall either happen or not; for the Great Apollo bestows on me the Faculty of prophesying!

O Laertiade, quicquid dicam aut erit aut non:
Divinare etenim magnus mihi donat Apollo (182).

*Ulysses, what I sing shall be the fate
Of Things to come, I read the leaves of Fate.*

If it was possible there was no God, it would nevertheless be certain, that whatever the greatest Fool in the World should foretel, should either happen or not happen: This was not observed by Chrysippus or Epicurus.

But let us see what Epicurus invented to extricate himself from the Inconveniences which arise from the Notion of Fate. He gave his Atoms a Motion of Declination, wherein he established the Seat, Source, and Principle of free Actions; pretending, that by this means there were Events independent of fatal Necessity. Before him, no other Motion was admitted in Atoms, but that of Weight, and that of Reflexion: the first of which was always in perpendicular Lines, and in the Vacuum was ever the same; nor was it changed but when an Atom struck against another. Now Epicurus supposed, that even in the midst of the Vacuum Atoms did somewhat decline from the direct Line, and from thence, said he, proceeded Liberty. Sed Epicurus declinatione atomi vitari fati necessitatem putat: itaque tertius quidam motus oritur, extra pondus & plagam, quum declinat atomus inter vallo minimo, id appellat εὐδύχλον: quam declinationem sine causa fieri, si minus verbis, re cogitur constiteri. . . . Hanc Epicurus rationem induxit ob eam rem, quod veritus est, ne, si semper atomus gravitate ferretur naturali ac necessaria, nihil liberum nobis esset, quum ita moveretur animus, ut atomorum motu cohereret. Hinc Democritus auctor atomorum accipere maluit necessitate omnia fieri, quam à corporibus individuis naturales motus avellere

(183) Cicero, de Fato, cap. x.

(183). — Epicurus by the Declination of Atoms thinks to escape the Doctrine of Necessity, for which reason he superadds a third Motion to that of Gravity, and Impulse, whereby the Atom deviates a little, as he expresses himself, from its direction; which deviation he is forced to confess, if not expressly, yet in reality to be without Cause. . . . Epicurus introduced this Argument, because he was afraid, lest, if the Atom should be always carried on by a natural and necessary Gravity, Liberty would thereby be entirely destroyed, since the Motion of the Mind would be necessarily determined by that of the Atom. For which reason Democritus, the Author of this System of Atoms, chose rather to admit the Doctrine of Fatality, than to deprive Bodies of their natural Motions. Let us remark by the way, that this was not the only Motive that induced him to invent that Motion of Declination: He likewise made use of it to explain the Concourse of Atoms; for he saw well enough, that by supposing that they all moved with equal Celerity in direct Lines, which all tended from higher to lower, he should never be able to explain how they could have met: And so that the Production of the World had been impossible. He therefore was obliged to suppose, that they declined from the direct Line (184). Lucretius describes this double use of the Motion of Declination.

(184) See Cicero, lib. i, de Finib. cap. vi.

Illud in his quoque Te rebus cognoscere avemus:
Corpora cum deorsum rectum per Inane feruntur,
Ponderibus propriis incerto tempore ferme,
Incertisque locis spatia decedere paullum:

Tantum quod Momen mutatum dicere possis.
Quod nisi Declinare solerent, omnia deorsum,
Imbris uti guttae, caderent per Inane profundum:
Nec foret Offensus natus, nec Plaga creata Principiis: ita nil unquam Natura creasset (185).

(185) Lucret.
lib. ii, ver. 216.

Denique si semper motus connectitur omnis,
Et vetere exoritur semper novus ordine certo,
Nec Declinando faciunt Primordia motus
Principium quoddam, quod Fati foedera rumpat,
Ex infinito ne causam causa sequatur:
Libera per terras unde hæc animantibus extat,
Unde est hæc (inquam) fatis avolsa Voluntas, Per quam progredimur, quo ducit quemque voluptas (186)?

(186) Id. ibid.
ver. 251.

Quare in Seminibus quoque idem fateare necesse sit Esse aliam præter Plagas, & Pondera causam
Motibus, unde hæc est nobis innata potestas:
De nihilo quoniam fieri Nil posse videmus.
Pondus enim prohibet, ne Plagis omnia fiant,
Externa quasi vi, sed ne Mens ipsa necessum
Intestinum habeat cunctis in rebus agendis:
Et devicta quasi cogatur ferre, patique:
Id facit exiguum CLINAMEN Principiorum
Nec regione loci certa, nec tempore certo (187).

(187) Id. ibid.
284.

Uncertain when or where,
But Seeds in downward Motion must decline
A very little from th' exactest Line.
For did they still move straight, they needs must fall
Like drops of Rain, dissolv'd and scatter'd all;
For ever tumbling thro' the mighty Space,
And never join to make one single Mass.

Besides, did all things move in a strait Line,
Did still one Motion to another join
In certain order, and no Seed decline,
And make a Motion fit to dissipate
The well wrought Chain of Causes and strong Fate;
Whence comes this perfect Freedom of the Mind?
Whence comes the Will so free and unconfin'd Above the Pow'r of Fate, by which we go Where'er we please, and what we will we do?

Therefore we must confess, as these things prove,
There is another Cause by which things move,
Besides dull Weight and Stroke, from whence is wrought
This Pow'r, for nothing can arise from nought.
For Weight forbids that things be only join'd
By Stroke and outward Force; and left the Mind
Should be by strong Necessity confin'd,
And, overcome, endure Fate's rigid Laws,
This little DECLINATION is the Cause.

CREECH.

If it was necessary to expose the Absurdities of this Doctrine, I could shew several: For, in the first place, what can be more unworthy of a Philosopher, than to suppose high and low in an infinite Space? This is nevertheless what Epicurus supposed; for he pretended that all Atoms moved from higher to lower. If he had supposed that they moved in all manner of right Lines, he had assigned a good Reason for their concourse, without being obliged to the pretended Motion of Declination. Secondly, That Motion forced him to contradict himself: For he taught, that Nothing was made out of Nothing, and yet the Declination of Atoms, according to him, depended upon no Cause, and therefore proceeded from Nothing. This Consequence is the stronger, in that we have seen (188), that Lucretius confesses, that the free Actions (188) Abstr.

Citat. (187).

Actions of our Souls would proceed from Nothing, if Atoms had not a Motion of Declination. He pretends that they depend neither upon the Motion of Weight, nor the Motion of Repercussion of Atoms; for in such a Case he would be forced to acknowledge, that they are comprehended in the Concatenation of eternal and necessary Causes; and consequently that they are subjected to the fatal Necessity from which he designs to free them. And the Reason why, according to him, they do not proceed from Nothing, though they do not any ways depend either on the Gravitation or Repercussion of Atoms, is because Atoms have a Motion of Declination. From thence I conclude, that this Motion proceeds from Nothing; or, which is the same, that it has no Cause (189), and so I throw Epicurus into the Abyss he endeavoured to avoid. If he answers, That it is as much the Nature of Atoms to decline, as to move downwards, and to strike one another as often as they meet: I reply, that their Declination is of no use to human Liberty, and does not hinder Fatality; and I maintain, ad hominem, that all the Fatality of the Stoics is preserved; for he owns that the Motion from Gravitation, and that of Repercussion, do inevitably introduce fatal Necessity. Thirdly, It is absurd to suppose, that a Being that has neither Reason, Sensation, nor Will, should deviate from a straight Line in a void Space; and that is does not always deviate from it, but at certain Times, and in certain undetermined Points of the Space (190). For a fourth Absurdity, I alledge the manifest Disproportion between the Nature of Liberty, and the Motion, whatever it be, of an Atom which neither knows what it does, where it is, or that it exists. What Consequence is there between these two Propositions, The Soul of Man is composed of Atoms, which moving necessarily in straight Lines, decline a little from the right Way: therefore the Soul of Man is a free Agent? Cicero has made a right Judgment of this Hypothesis of Epicurus, when he says, That it were less shameful to own we cannot answer our Adversary, than to have recourse to such Answers as these. 'Hoc per sepe facitis, ut cum aliquid non verisimile dicatis, & effugere reprehensionem velitis, afferatis aliquid, quod omnino ne fieri quidem possit: ut satius fuerit illud ipsum de quo ambigebatur, concedere, quam tam impudenter resistere: velut Epicurus cum videret, si atomi ferrentur in locum inferiorem suapte pondere, nihil fore in nostra potestate, quod esset earum motus certus & necessarius, invenit quo modo necessitatem effugeret, quod videlicet Democritum fugerat: ait Atomum, cum pondere, & gravitate directò deorsum feratur, declinare paululum. Hoc dicere turpius est, quam illud quod vult, non posse defendere (191). — It is a common thing with you, when you have advanced something that seems improbable, and would avoid Reproach, to alledge something which is altogether impossible, so that it would be much better to give up the Point in debate, than defend it in so bare-faced a manner: like Epicurus, who, when he saw, that if the Atoms were carried downwards by their own Weight, the Freedom of Action would be lost, since their Motion was determined and necessary, found out an Expedient which had escaped Democritus. He says, that an Atom, though carried directly downwards by its own Gravity, has a little Declination; which Subterfuge is more base, than to advance what he is not able to defend.' He has very happily described the Perplexity wherein that Philosopher found himself. 'Nec quum hæc ita sint, est causa cur Epicurus fatum extimecat, & ab atomis petat præsidium, easque de via deducat, & uno tempore suscipiat res duas inenodabiles: unum, ut sine causa fiat aliquid, ex quo existit, ut de nihilo quippiam fiat: quod nec ipsi, nec cuiquam Physico placet: alterum, ut quum duo individua per inanitatem ferantur, alterum è regione moveatur, alterum declinet (192). — Nor, as the Case stands, has Epicurus any reason to dread Fatality, or fly for Refuge to Atoms, endeavour to strain them to his Purpose, and plunge himself at once into two inextricable Difficulties; the one, that there may be an Effect without a Cause, from whence it would follow, that something may arise out of nothing, which is neither agreeable to himself, nor any Philosopher;

'the other, that when two Individuals are carried thro' the Vacuum, the one should move direct, and the other decline.' It was easy, methinks, to puzzle him. How can you pretend, might one have said to him, that the Liberty of Man is founded upon a Motion of Atoms, which is performed without any Liberty? Can the Cause give what it has not? Can a hundred Atoms, which decline without knowing what they do, form a Judgment, whereby the Soul may, with Knowledge, be determined to the Choice of either of two Things that present themselves? Epicurus might from thence have known, how much it concerned him to ascribe to each Atom an animated and sensitive Nature, as Democritus seems to have done (193); and as Plato had supposed, that Matter had a Soul, even before God had framed the World. 'Ἀνοσμία γὰρ ἦν τὰ πρὸ τῆς τῆ κόσμου γενέσεως: ἀνοσμία δὲ, ἐκ ἀσώματου, ἢ δὲ ἀνίμης, ἢ δὲ ἀψυχου. . . . Ὁ γὰρ θεὸς ἔτε σῶμα τὸ ἀσώματον, ἔτε ψυχὴν τὸ ἀψυχον ἐποίησεν. Fuit nimirum antequam mundus nasceretur, materies, non copris eo, non motus, non animæ expers. . . . Etenim Deus neque corpus de incorporeo, neque animam de inanimato redigit (194). . . . Before the Creation there was Matter, indigested indeed, but not void of Substance, Motion, or Soul. . . . For God did not create Body from incorporeal, nor Soul from inanimate Substance.'

We must not forget what Cicero mentions, to wit, that Carneades invented a Solution, much more subtle than all the Suppositions of the Epicureans; which was to assert, That the Soul had a free Motion, of which she was the Cause. 'Acutus Carneades, qui docebat posse Epicureos suam causam sine hæc commentitia declinatione defendere. Nam quum doceret esse posse quandam animi motum voluntarium, id fuit defendi melius, quam introducere declinationem, cujus præsertim causam reperire non possunt: quo defenso, facile Chrysippo possent resistere. . . . (195). De ipsa atomo dici potest, quum per inane moveatur gravitate & pondere, sine causa moveri, quia nulla causa accedat extrinsecus. Rursus autem, ne omnes à physicis irrideamur, si dicamus quicquam fieri sine causa, distinguendum est, & ita dicendum ipsius individui hæc esse naturam, ut pondere & gravitate moveatur, eamque ipsam esse causam cur ita feratur. Similiter ad animorum motus voluntarios non est requirenda externa causa, motus enim voluntarius eam naturam in se ipse continet, ut sit in nostra potestate, nobisque pareat, nec id sine causa. Ejus enim rei causa, ipsa natura est (196). — Carneades was more ingenious, who taught that the Epicureans might defend their Cause, without this imaginary Declination. For it is more easy to defend a Possibility of the Soul's having a voluntary Motion, than to introduce a Declination, of which no Cause could be assigned. This Point gained, they might easily withstand Chrysippus. . . . Of the Atom it may be said, that in being moved through the Void by Gravity, it is moved without Cause, since no exterior Force is applied. But again, that we may not all be the Jest of Philosophers, if we say anything is done without a Cause, a Distinction is to be made in this manner. It is the nature of that Individual to be moved by Gravity, and that this alone is the Cause of it's being moved. In the same manner, no external Cause is required to the voluntary Motion of the Soul, for this voluntary Motion does in itself contain that Nature, being in our Power, and subject to our Controul, and that not without Cause. For it's own Nature is it's Cause.' It is certain, that thus Carneades furnished them with an Answer, not only much more solid than what they made use of, but also the most ingenious and the strongest that human Wit can produce. I own one might have asked him, Do these voluntary Actions of the Soul, which are independant upon any external Cause, depend upon the Nature of the Soul, as the Motion from Gravity depends upon the Nature of Atoms, according to Epicurus? In that case you do not remove the Fatality of the Stoics; for you admit no Effect, which is not produced by a necessary Cause. Neither Carneades, nor any other Heathen Philosopher, was able to make any solid Answer to that Question.

(193) See the Remark [F].

(194) Plat. de Animæ Procreatione ex Timæo, pag. 1014. E.

(195) Cicero, de Fato, cap. xi.

(196) Ibid.

(189) The Ancients objected that to Epicurus. 'Ἐκινήσω μὲν γὰρ ὑδὲ ἀσάρκας ἑγκλίνας τὴν ἄπομον συγχωρεῖν, ὅς ἀνάγκη τὸν ἐκκλίνοντι κινήσιν ἐκ τῆ μη δυνάτος. Sane Epicurus ne momentaneam quidem atomi inclinationem concedunt, quod eum dicant motum absque causa ex non ente introducere. Plat. de Anima procreat. ex Timæo, pag. 1015.

(190) Id facit exiguum clinamen principiorum. Nec regione loci certa, nec tempore certo. Lucret. ubi supra, ver. 293.

(191) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. i, cap. xxv.

(192) Idem, de Fato, cap. ix.

EPISCOPIUS (SIMON) one of the most Learned Men of the XVIIth Century, and the chief Pillar of the Arminian Sect, was born at Amsterdam in 1583; and having having gone through his Classic Learning there, went to study at Leyden in the Year 1600. He took there his Degree of Master of Arts in 1606. Afterwards he applied himself to the study of Divinity, and made such Progress in it, that in a little Time he was judged fit for the Ministry. The Burgomasters of Amsterdam desired he might be advanced to it; but because, during the Disputes between Gomar and Arminius, he had sided with the latter, he found many Obstacles to his Reception: Whereupon he left the University of Leyden in disgust, and went to that of Franker in 1609. He did not stay long there; for he perceived, that, having disputed with too much Heat, he had thereby provoked the Professor Sibrandus Lubertus, a great Gomarist. He therefore left Franker, and returned into Holland, and was there received Minister in the Year 1610, and presented to a Village (a) in the District of Rotterdam. He was one of the Deputies at the Conference held at the Hague in 1611, before the States of the Province, between six Anti-Remonstrant and six Remonstrant Ministers; and there he displayed his Wit and Learning to great Advantage. The next Year he was chosen Professor of Divinity at Leyden, to supply the Place which Gomar had voluntarily quitted, and lived peaceably with Polyander his Colleague, tho' they had contrary Opinions about Predestination. The Duties of his Office, and the Studies of his Closet, were an easy Burden to him, in comparison of the Insults and Slanders to which he saw himself exposed, during the Troubles of Arminianism [A]: for the heat of Division and Hatred seized in a short Time the Minds of the People. The States of Holland having invited Episcopus to the Synod of Dort, that he might take his Place there as the other Professors of the Seven United Provinces, he was one of the First that repaired thither, accompanied with some Remonstrant Ministers; but the Synod would not suffer that any of them should appear in the Assembly as Judges, but as Persons cited. They were forced to yield to this Necessity; and having made their Appearance, Episcopus, in a set Speech, declared they were ready to confer with the Synod. He was answered, That the Assembly was not there to confer, but to judge. They excepted against it, and refused to acquiesce in a Decree the Synod had made, That they should explain and defend their Opinions, no farther than the Assembly should think fit. Upon their refusing to submit to those Terms, they were expelled the Synod, and they proceeded to pass Judgment upon them, by their Writings (b). They defended their Cause with the Pen; and it was Episcopus who composed most of the Pieces they produced on this Occasion, and which were made public some Time after. They were deprived of their Employments by the Synod; and because they refused to subscribe a Writing, containing a Promise not to exercise any Function of their Ministry in private, directly nor indirectly, they were banished the Dominions of the Republic. Episcopus stayed in the Spanish Netherlands as long as the Truce lasted [B]; and was not so taken up with the Concerns of his oppressed

[A] His Studies were an easy Burden, in comparison of the Insults and Slanders to which he saw himself exposed, during the Troubles of Arminianism.] The Dispute about Predestination began in the Universities, and soon got up into the Pulpits; from whence it spread into private Families, and carried the same Heat of Division among the Persons intrusted with the Government. 'Ab Academicis cathedris in Ecclesiis, rum primum ambores & postea in vulgus dimanasset, imo etiam Reipublicæ procures quorum erat tanto malo remedium asserre in studia contraria scidisset (1).' All was in an Uproar and Confusion; and in this Conflict, no Man was more exposed to the Imprecations of the Populace, than the most learned among the Arminians, because they were looked upon as the first Cause of these Disorders. 'Maximi tempestivum fluctus celeberrimos quoque doctrina inter Remonstrantes seriebant, quibus veri ignara plebs & affectu potius quam judicio duci solita omnem turbarum culpam imputabat (2).' Judge if they spared Episcopus, whose Abilities were eminently known. He was insulted at Amsterdam, both at Church and in the Street, the second Year of his Professorship at Leyden, because, assisting at the Christening of one of his Nieces, he had answered something to the Minister that officiated, who asked, Whether the Doctrine of his Church was not the true and perfect Doctrine of Salvation? Episcopus, instead of answering that Question, according to Custom, by a Sign of Acquiescence, used some Expressions, intimating, that he only acquiesced with a certain Restriction. The Minister flew into a Passion, and treated him as a presumptuous young Man. The People grew hot; and Episcopus, whom they loaded with Curies both in the Church and in the Street, hardly escaped being beaten, if not stoned to Death. If you ask me why he would explain himself, I will answer, that it was because Uytendagard, on a like occasion, having answered only yes, found not long after that he was reproached, in the Streets, with having renounced the Doctrines of the Remonstrants. This first Danger of Episcopus was soon followed by a second; for a Smith, seeing him go by one day, went out of his Forge with an Iron Bar in his Hand, and began to run after him, crying out, An Arminian, a Disturber of the Church: Episcopus would have been knocked on the Head by that brutish Fellow, if he had not run away, and if other People had not come to his Assistance. The Author I quote (3), says, that the nineteenth of February, 1617, the House of Episcopus's elder Brother was plundered by the Mob of Amsterdam, under the false Pretence that several Arminians heard a Sermon there. These are the inevitable Consequences of Disputes in Divinity, when the Spirit of Moderation does not confine them within the Compaſs of the Audience, and when People alarm and terrify the Populace. This ought to teach us a thing that will never be praſſified, viz. That we ought never to come to That, but in Cases of extream Necessity. This ought to be the Ancora sacra of the Ancients (4); which was never used but in the last Extremity.

[B] He stayed in the Spanish Netherlands as long as the Truce lasted.] Henry IV had mediated a Twelve-Years Truce between Spain and the United Provinces in 1609. As soon as it was expired, the War began again in 1621. Episcopus and his Colleagues were banished in 1618; and from that time till the renewing of the War they lived at Antwerp. The Reason they have given for it, and which is very probable, is, that they were thereby more at hand to take care of their Churches and Families. But some of their Enemies had the Malice to accuse them, that they chose that Dwelling-place only with design to plot with the Spaniards against the Reformed Religion, and the Liberty of their Country. It is a great Pleasure, and a great Convenience to be in the Party triumphant;

(1) Steph. Curcellæus, Pref. in Opera Episcopi.

(2) Id. ibid.

(a) Called Bleswick.

(b) Cum Synodus libertatem illam limitibus istis circumſcribere vellet, quæ tum ipsa satis esse posse & debere judicaret; ipsi vero tam iniquis conditionibus quibus cum iam suam proferrent, per conscientiam acquiescere non possent, tandem à Synodo sunt eiectioni, tamquam indigni cum quibus ipsa ulterius quicquam ageret Synodus, quæ se ad eos ex scriptis ipsorum judicandos accinxit. Steph. Curcellæus Pref. Oper. Episcopi.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Sic, in Eristis, the Prov. Sacram. ant. tam solvere, which is the 24th of the 19 Century of the 1st Ch. lib.

(c) Taken from the Preface to his Works, composed by Curcellæus. Note, that I do not warrant the Facts I borrow from thence, either in the Body, or in the Remarks of this Article.

oppressed Party, but that he wrote against the Church of Rome, in Defence of the Common Cause of the Protestants [C]. When the War between the Spaniards and the Dutch broke out again, he went into France; and, by his Writings, endeavoured as much as in him lay to strengthen and comfort his Brethren [D]: And at last, a more favourable Time being come, he returned into Holland in 1626, in order to be Minister of the Remonstrant Church at Rotterdam. Here he married the next Year [E], and removed to Amsterdam in 1634, to govern the College which those of his Sect had erected there. He died in that Employment the fourth of April 1643, of a retention of Urine, having lost his Sight some Weeks before [c]. He composed several Books after his return into Holland, wherein he did not always use that moderate Style, which his Principles of Toleration, joined to the Evangelical Duties, exacted from him in a most particular Manner. His Friends endeavour to excuse him in that Particular [F]. It is said his triumphant; but generally it lays an Obligation on one to calumniate the other Party: For, because the Victory we gain is attended with many Violences against the depressed Party, it is necessary, in order to justify them, and to hinder honest Minds from pitying the persecuted, to publish against them the most odious Accusations. I do not apply this to the Arminians, I DECLARE IT EXPRESSLY, AND IN CAPITAL LETTERS: But these are the Words of one of them. 'Antuerpiæ durantibus inter Hispaniarum regem & Ordines induciis domicilium eligunt, non ut cum patriæ hostibus consilia agerent, aut adversus religionem reformatam quicquam molirentur, quemadmodum malevoli quidam miserie illorum insulantes dictitabant: sed quia propinquus erat ille locus, & ex quo Ecclesiis suis dilectis & familiis commodius quam ex remotiore prospicere poterant (5). — They took up their Residence at Antwerp, whilst the Truce subsisted between the King of Spain and the States-General, not to cabal with the Enemies of their Country, or conspire against the Reformed Religion, as some, to insult over their Distress, maliciously gave out; but because the Place was near, and from thence they might keep a more commodious Watch over their dear Churches and Families.'

[C] He wrote against the Church of Rome, in Defence of the Common Cause of the Protestants. He not only, in concert with his Fellow-Exiles, composed a Confession of Faith, which was soon followed by a Book called, Antidotum adversus Synodi Dordracenæ Canones, but he disputed likewise with great vigour against Peter Wadingus. He was a Jesuit (6), who did him a thousand Kindnesses; and who, taking Advantage of his Discontent, endeavoured to draw him into the Bosom of his Church. He displayed the most captious Arguments of the Controversists of his Party; and, without being discouraged by the Answers that were made him, he changed their Dispute, which was by way of Conversation, into a Controversy in writing. He composed two Letters, the one upon the Rule of Faith, the other upon the Worship of Images, and sent them to the Refugee Professor; who did not fail to write a most solid Answer to them immediately (7). It was not published till after his Death, viz. in the Year 1644. It has, since that, been inserted in the Edition of all his Works, in Folio.

[D] He endeavoured by his Writings to strengthen and comfort his Brethren. I do not speak only of several private Letters which he sent into Holland, but likewise of the Works he composed for the Public during his stay in France. Of this Number are his Remarks upon some Chapters of St Paul's Epistle to the Romans; his Bodekerus ineptiens, his Examen Thesum Jacobi Capelli; and his Reply to Cameron, &c. (8).

[E] Here he married the next Year. It was with the Widow (9) of Henry de Nielles, Minister at Rotterdam, Brother to that Charles de Nielles, whom the Remonstrants looked upon as one of their chief Confessors. He was a long time in Prison; and several of his Letters are to be seen among those the Remonstrants have published. He recovered his Liberty, and was Minister at Amsterdam (10); Episcopus lost his Wife towards the end of the Year 1641, and never had any Children by her (11).

[F] His Friends endeavoured to excuse the Sharpness of his Style. Curcellæus not being able to deny, that Episcopus might have written some things with more Moderation (12), adds, that several Reasons prompted him to that way of writing. In the first place, says he, Episcopus was never the Aggressor;

he never attacked any body, but only repelled those that attacked him. Secondly, the Writings he confused were sometimes very violent; an Instance of which is the Book the Professors at Leyden published under the Title of Confessionis Remonstrantium Censura, and it is pretended they were obliged by very powerful Motives to speak in such a Tone. It was necessary to persuade the World, that the Anti-Remonstrant Doctors had justly condemned the Arminians in the Synod of Dort, and justly excited the Magistrates to use great Severity against that Party. This Synodical Condemnation, this fiery Zeal in exasperating the Magistrates, were two things that might blemish the Reputation of those Gentlemen, if it should appear that the condemned Party was only guilty of small Errors: And therefore, to save the Credit of the Judges, it was necessary to give an odious Character of that Party. Now because the World began to say, that the five famous Articles were not a sufficient Reason to persecute People, they were obliged to maintain, that the Confession of the Remonstrants was full of execrable Heresies; that every thing in it was corrupted from the beginning to the end, and that the very Title was a Sore; And thereupon to grow mighty angry. 'Quam (Confessionis Remonstrantium Censuram) acerbissimam esse, nemo qui vel obiter inflexerit negare potest. Nempe eximtionis suæ interesse putabant, ne injuste primum Remonstrantes in Synodo Dordracenâ condemnassent, & postea Magistratus ad eos persequendos instigasse crederentur. Jam enim vulgo dictitabatur non satis esse causæ in quinque illis decantatis de Prædestinatione articulis, cur ita eos sæviretur, cum in iis totum Christianum Orbem, excepta duntaxat Calvinii schola, Remonstrantes secum conspirantem haberent. Ideo persuasum omnibus voluerunt Professores isti Confessionem illorum horrendis hæresibus scaturire, nihil in ea à capite ad calcem, imo ne in titulo quidem, sani esse (13). —

Which (Censure of the Remonstrants Confession) every one at first Sight must allow to be very bitter. They thought it concerned their Reputation, to make the World believe, that in the first Place they had not condemned the Remonstrants in the Synod of Dort without Cause, nor, in the second place, spirited up the Magistrates to persecute them. For it was already publicly given out, that there was nothing in those memorable Articles concerning Predestination that deserved so harsh a Treatment, since the Remonstrants therein had the Concurrence of the whole Christian World, except the Calvinists. Wherefore those Professors laboured to persuade Mankind, that their Confession swarmed with dreadful Heresies, that from the beginning to the end, not even excepting the Title Page, there was nothing Orthodox to be found. Thus that Author insinuates, that the Professors of Leyden wrote so sharply out of meer Policy, and that their Anger was a feigned Passion, intended only to remove a public Scandal, and clear their own Reputation. Thirdly, he says, that Episcopus lost all Patience, when he saw that these Gentlemen pried into the secret Intentions, and most intimate Recesses of the Heart, when they found nothing to carp at in the Expressions of the Confession of Faith they censured. Here is an infallible way to make one's Adversary appear an Heretic; for tho' he speaks the Language of the Orthodox, it may be said, that he conceals in his Heart the Poison of Heresy (14). 'Imo quod omnes modestie limites excedit, cum in confessionis verbis & phrasibus nihil occurrebat quod cum specie aliqua admordere possent, in Dei nomen iura temerario ausu in-

(13) Ibid.

(14) See, against the Proceedings of such Men, several Passages of the Plantation du Jankefene, and the Preface to Janus Colonus Relecta.

(c) Steeph. Curcellæus, ubi supra.

(6) He was an Irishman. See Alegambe.

(7) See the Preface to that Work of Episcopus.

(8) Ex Prefatione, Steph. Curcellæi.

(9) Her Name was Mary Pefser.

(10) Ex Curcellæo, ubi supra.

(11) Ibid.

(12) Quia et si forte quædam lenius dici poterint, quam ab eo factum fuerit, gravissimas tamen ita scribendi causas habuerit. Ibid.

his Works have been approved in England by the Episcopal Party; but that there are now some Authors in that Kingdom, who make it their Business to run them down, as if they were dangerous Books. It cannot be denied, that the Distinction he observes, in saying, That certain Articles, which have always been accounted fundamental, are true, but that the Belief of them is not absolutely necessary to Salvation, may have very dangerous Consequences. The learned Father Mabillon has lately been censured, upon occasion of Episcopus's Works [G]. The Arminians made a remarkable Step in the Year 1690, which shews how much they are concerned for the Honour of that Minister: For it is known that they engaged one of their Professors publicly to charge Mr Jurieu with Calumny, for having spoken ill of Episcopus [H]. I forgot to say, that the Posthumous Works of that Learned Arminian were sent to Curcellæus by Francis Limborch, Son-in-law to Rembert Episcopus, Brother to our Simon (d); and that in the Preface, which has furnished me with this Article, there is no mention made of the

(d) Steph. Cur.
cel. ibid.

Journey

(15) Curcellæus,
ibid.
volantes suspicionem lectoribus ingerere studuerunt, an ita ex animo sentirent Remonstrantes prout oratione sua professantur. Nihil ergo mirum si adeo barbara & Christianis plane indigna agendi ratio D. Episcopium moverit ut duro nodo durum cuneum adhiberet, & sordida illa censura ulcera acriori apologiæ sale & aceto aliquando perficeretur: quod etiam adversus unum aut alterum Censoribus illis similem usurpavit (15). — Nay, what exceeds all Bounds of Modesty, when nothing occurred, either in the Words or Phrases of the Confession, which they could, with any shew of Reason, condemn, they endeavoured, by arrogantly assuming a Power which only belongs to God, the Searcher of Hearts, to make the Reader doubt whether the Remonstrants did, in their own Breasts, believe what they there professed. No wonder therefore if a Proceeding so barbarous and unbecoming Christians, should move Episcopus to apply a harsh Medicine to so rancorous a Sore, or practise the most proper Methods to defeat their Calumny, as he had done in the Case of others of the same Stamp with those Censors. Though these Excuses were better than they are, one might still say with Reason, that those who have need of them, are less to be commended than those that do not want them.

* Avis important à Mr Arnaud sur le Projet d'une Nouvelle Bibliothèque d'Auteurs Jansenistes.

(16) Pag. 16.

[G] Father Mabillon has been censured on account of Episcopus's Works. A Letter printed in 1691, with the Title of * Important Advice to Mr Arnauld, about the Project of a new Library of Janseist Authors, contains what follows (16). 'Father Mabillon, in his Treatise of Monastical Studies, has given a very great Encomium to Episcopus's Theological Institutions, wherein, you know, Socinianism is countenanced. Mr Nicole was no sooner informed of that fine Commendation, but he pressed that the Author might be advertised of it, that he might strike it out: But there was no Remedy, the Book being already published. Several young Abbots had already asked the Paris Bookellers for the Works of that Arminian, the reading of which was so expressly recommended by Father Mabillon. It is a great Happiness the Bookellers have none of them, there being no Divine so opposite to St Augustin's Doctrine, and even to that of the whole Church, as Episcopus, who has even introduced in his Party the Toleration of Religions. Here, Sir, is the Abstract of that Father. I cannot forbear saying in this Place, that if some Things had been retrenched out of Episcopus's Theological Institutions, which were so highly esteemed by Grotius, that he ever carried them about him, one might use them with Profit in Divinity. That Work is divided into four Books, whose Order and Method is quite different from what is commonly in Use. The Style is fine; the Manner of treating the Subjects is answerable to the Style; and one would not lose his Time in perusing it, if it was purged of some Places, wherein he speaks either against the Catholics, or in favour of his Sect. What Purgation, I beseech you, can one make of an Author, who calls in Question the Mysteries of the Trinity and Incarnation, not judging the Belief of those Mysteries to be necessary to Salvation, because, according to him, they are not clearly revealed in Scripture. He passes the same Judgment upon our other Mysteries: From whence he concludes, that there is no Reason to reject the Socinians from Communion. Father Mabillon would be more excusable, if he had not read Episcopus's Book: But he has owned himself, that he had borrowed it of the Library-keeper to the Archbishoph of Rheims (17), and that he kept it above two Months. The Author of the Advice speaks, two Pages lower, of a Regular Canon, who told his Friends, that the reading of Grotius had begun to open his Eyes. He is not the only Man of his Community that speaks thus: Several of them dogmatize; and there are some who read in private the Works of Curcellæus, which contain an Abridgment of the Theology of Arminius, and a good Part of that of the Socinians. It is much to be feared, that the excessive Praises Father Mabillon has given to Episcopus's Theological Institutions will set some Benedictines in quest of his Works, or of Curcellæus's Theology.

[H] The Arminians . . . engaged one of their Professors publicly to charge Mr Jurieu with Calumny, for having spoken ill of Episcopus. Mr le Clerc, Professor in the College of the Arminians at Amsterdam, and one of the most learned Men of this Age, was ordered, they say, by his Superiors, to publish a Letter addressed to Mr Jurieu, wherein he sets forth, That those who are never so little acquainted with Episcopus's Writings, and the Society of the Remonstrants, do not want a Justification of either: And as for those who have not read that Author, nor ever conversed with any Remonstrant, if they were so unjust as to judge upon Mr Jurieu's bare Accusation without enquiring further into the Matter in Question, they do not deserve that one should endeavour to undeceive them; they would be utter Strangers to Equity, and would, in all probability, have their Ears shut against all manner of Justification: That he is persuaded, that there is no equitable Person, either in the United Provinces or elsewhere, that is inclined to believe that Accuser upon his bare Word: That therefore it is not to undeceive the Public he addresses this Letter to Mr Jurieu, but only to endeavour, if possible, to make him reflect with himself, and engage him to ask Pardon of God for the Sin he has committed, in calumniating his Neighbour in so odious a Manner. That one thing might give hopes, that he would be induced to give Glory to God after the reading of this Letter, which is, that in what he says there appears more inconsiderate Zeal and Obstinacy, than Artifice and Premeditation: For, after all, to accuse without Proof a famous Author, whose Books are in every Body's Hands, of having entertained Opinions which he absolutely rejects, and which have no necessary Connexion with his Principles, is not the Way to persuade any Body.

After this Preamble, Mr le Clerc comes to the Point. You accuse, says he, Episcopus of two things: First, of being a Socinian; Secondly, of being an Enemy to the Christian Religion. This last Article is but a consequence of the other, according to your Way of Reasoning; so that if I should prove that the first is a gross Calumny, I shall, by your own Principles, convince you of accusing, without Reason, of the most detestable Hypocrisy that can be imagined, a Person who always professed to believe in JESUS CHRIST, and who has given signal Proofs of his Faith. The more heinous the Accusation is, the clearer the Proofs ought to be, and yet you bring none that has the least Probability. He shews afterwards, that as to the Trinity, and the Sacrifice of JESUS CHRIST, Episcopus's Opinion was very remote from that of the Socinians; He mentions several of his Books, wherein he has clearly explained

(17) Judge by this how scarce Episcopus's Works are in France, since the Benedictines are obliged to borrow them of a Prelate who has been very tedious in collecting such Books as are most difficult to be found. See the Catalogue of his Library, printed at Paris, in 1693, in Folio.

SOME Passages out of a Letter of Mr le Clerc.

Journey Episcopus took into France in 1615, about which his Enemies spread many false Reports [1]; but instead of mentioning that actual Journey, they only speak of an imaginary one about the Year 1610.

(18) Viz. Book VI, Sect. I, cap. ii, & iii.

REFLEXIONS upon that Letter, and the Consequences of it.

(19) This ought to be understood with relation only to common Practice; for otherwise the Canon-Law, as well as the Civil, subjects a Calumniator to the Lex Talionis.

explained his Sentiments about those two Capital Points, and confuted the Socinians: He proves, that Mr Jurieu has unfaithfully quoted two Passages of Episcopus; the one touching the Mystery of the Trinity, and the other touching the eternal Torments of the Reprobate: And having thus confuted the first Accusation, he as easily overthrows the second; not only because it is but a Consequence of the first, but because Episcopus's Morals and Writings are a most clear Evidence, that he was virtuous, conscientious, and zealous for the Christian Religion. He marks the Place of his Institutions (18), 'wherein the Truth of the Christian Religion is so clearly and strongly proved, that if Libertines weighed well his Reasons, it might be hoped that there would be no more of them in the World: And you treat him, Sir, as an Enemy to Christianity; it is thus Mr le Clerc speaks to Mr Jurieu, when it does not appear that you have so much as perused his Writings, or examined his Morals? In Truth, nothing but the Distracted of that blind Zeal, which has possessed you so long, can make me say, Forgive him, O Lord, For indeed you know not what you do. You could not have pitched upon a better way to pass for a Man little acquainted with the Duties, either of Christianity or Civil Society, than by speaking at that rate. There is none, except some few silly Women loaden with Sins, and who go to a Sermon without understanding any thing in it, or indeed in the Gospel, that can be imposed upon by you.'

This signal step of the Remonstrants is a manifest Sign that Episcopus had been calumniated; for there is no likelihood that Mr le Clerc would have put his Name to the Letter I mention, if he had thought it possible that Mr Jurieu could justify his Accusations; but what was only a Sign, or, if you please, a strong Presumption of Episcopus's Innocence, is become a clear Demonstration by the silence of the Accuser. Every Body knows how much he ought to value his Reputation; therefore nothing but the absolute Impossibility of maintaining his Accusation has obliged him to be silent, and patiently to suffer the public shame Mr le Clerc's Letter has cast upon him. After this, who will say that Mr Jurieu is so possessed with the Spirit of Revenge, that he never gave an Instance of Patience? The most easy Soul in the World would not have suffered, as he has done, without opening his Mouth, the atrocious Injury of the Arminian Professor: An Injury however, which, supposing Episcopus's Innocence, is but an Act of Justice. It may perhaps be wondered, that the Superiors of the Accuser did not interest themselves in his Honour, as much as all the Arminian Party have been concerned for the honour of Episcopus. As soon as the latter was accused, his Party stirred to manifest his Innocence to the Public; but no Body has obliged the Accuser to purge himself before the whole World, and to wipe off the infamous Note of being a Calumniator, with which Mr le Clerc has stigmatized him. But this different Conduct ought not to be surprising: The Honour of Episcopus is of greater Consequence to his whole Party, than the Honour of Mr Jurieu to the Walloon Churches. And besides, though according to Reason all the Infamy an accused Person should deserve, if he was justly accused, ought to redound to him who calumniates him; yet People judge otherwise according to the Canon Law (19). To find Heresies in a Book, tho' there be none, passes often for a sign of Zeal; a Man comes off with a Caution not to be so forward for the future; nay, sometimes he comes off without such a Reproof. It is therefore more necessary to fly to the Assistance of a Doctor unjustly accused, than to the help of a false Informer against Heresy.

Two solid Reasons have engaged me to make this Remark. First, It is the chief Design and Business of this Dictionary to correct false Matters of Fact; inasmuch, that without an Affection, and a Respect of Persons, which would very justly have been blamed, I could not have passed over in Silence the diffamatory Untruth which has been published against Simon Episcopus. Secondly, There being an Occasion to shew Mr Jurieu in a fair Light, I had been an ill Husband if I had neglected it. It is honourable in him to repair, by his Silence, the Injury he had done to the Memory of that learned Man. He might have invented a hundred Cavils, Tricks, and Equivocations, to maintain his Accusation; and he might have been sure, that abundance of People would have believed, upon his Word, all he had pleased to say of the Arminian Minister. Mr le Clerc was under an Obligation with the Public not to reply. Who therefore can deny, that Mr Jurieu deserves great Commendations for chusing to be silent, and to moderate his Resentment, rather than to take Advantage of his inventing Faculty, the favourable Prepossessions of his Readers, and Mr le Clerc's Promise? I own, he would still be more to be commended, if, instead of being silent, he had publicly acknowledged that he was mistaken: but a Man does not arrive at one Step to such a Pitch of Heroical Virtue: that is to be attained by degrees; and it is a good Beginning not to reply to the Apology of that Person one has calumniated.

[1] He made a Journey into France, about which his Enemies spread many false Reports. They said he had had secret Conferences with Father Coton, in order to contrive with him the Ruin of the Reformed Church, and of the United Provinces. They maintained he affected to have no Conversation with Mr du Moulin, Minister of Paris, and that he did not so much as pay him a Visit. He protests, that these are Impostures, and that he had never seen Father Coton but once, and that too by meer Chance, when that Jesuit coming from the King's Palace went into his Coach. 'Utinam Deus hoc illis non impu-
'tet! imprimis chorago ipsorum Plancius, qui eo impudentia devenit, ut qua clam qua palam affirmare non dubitaverit, secreta me & arcana consilia agita-
'tisse cum Patre Jesuitarum Cotone, in perniciem Reip. & Ecclesie nostrae: cum ego cum non nisi
'semel redeuntem à Rege & currum suum ascendente-
'tem, idque obiter & in transcurfu, viderim (20). —

'May God not lay it to their charge, more especially I wish it may not lie heavy on Plancius their Leader, who has had the impudence, both in Public and in Private, to affirm that I had secretly engaged with the Jesuit Coton in Councils pernicious to the Church and State, though I never saw him but once, and that accidentally as he came from the King, and was getting into his Coach.' Taking to witness the Person to whom he writes, he declares, that nothing is more false than the Affection he is charged with, in relation to Du Moulin; and he observes, that Plancius, one of the Ministers of Amsterdam, was the Author of those Calumnies. Lastly, he says, that every Body began to know the Falsity of the second Accusation. 'Neque hoc solum, sed & quod colloquium cum D. Molinæo studio declina-
'verim: neque unquam de compellendo eo cogitavi-
'rim: Quam rem falsam & vanam esse, tu, si ita videbitur, testimonio tuo confirmare potes, & quic-
'quid ea in re à te & me factum est verbulo signifi-
'ficare, etiamsi forte opus non sit futurum. Manifestum enim hujusmodi mendacium vanitate sua propria diffuit tandem, & sponte sua extinguitur atque evanescit (21).'

Without making any Application to the Subject in question, I observe, that, generally speaking, the Heads of Parties, in Disputes of Literature or Religion, do not spend Money enough in maintaining Spies. Not but that they are extremely curious to know whatever their Adversaries say or do; but they easily believe all Reports, and are too forward to confirm them with the Weight of their Testimonies. Zeal makes People often persuade themselves, that an Heretic is capable of the most infamous Plots; and from this Persuasion, they easily pass on to another, which is, that they fancy that he actually contrives all the Machinations of which they suppose him to be capable. As soon as they have got this in their Head, they practise what the Scripture says, From the Abundance of the Heart the Mouth speaketh (22), and change their own Suspicions and Surmises into public Discourses, and formal Accusations.

E P P E N D O R F

EPPENDORF (HENRY), a German Nobleman [A], would have been at this day altogether unknown in the Republic of Letters, if he had not had a great Dispute with Erasmus. He maintained that Quarrel with great Vigour; and perhaps never did the Great Erasmus meet with an Adversary that reduced him to so disagreeable Terms of Accommodation. The Articles of this Pacification not having been observed, Eppendorf made great Complaints of it; and published a Book, which contains the History of that Dispute [B]. Therein we learn, that he went out of his Country

(1) Apud Joannem Sererium.

(2) Erasmus, Epist. liii, lib. 30, pag. 1940.

(3) Mr Pachetier des Murs, born at Rheims, and dwelling at Paris, where he has a fine Library, has been so kind as to make them, and to send them to me in a most obliging manner by Mr Fannin.

(4) too for those of Basil, and 200 for those of Strasbourg.

(5) Cum tamen, says Eppendorf, vix ovum ovum simile efficit, sic per omnia referebat Erasmus.

[A] A German Nobleman.] Here is what we find about it in the Book he intitled, Ad D. Erasmi Roterodami libellum, cui titulus, adversus mendacium & obtestationem utilis Admonitio, justa Querela; and which he printed at Haguenau (1) in 1531. 'Natus sum in agro cui gens mea nomen dedit, non longe à Friburgo Urbe Misniae celebri: avos, atavos, parentes item (quibus & claris & optimis progenies sum) tam soleo jactare quam aliis suas laudes exprobro. Quid enim mea refert qua lena, quove aut Sacerdote aut Monacho, quibusve à heruiliis quis propeferit, modo ingenii dotibusdamna, quæ non sua culpa accidunt, pendat superetque? I was born in a Country to which my Family gave its Name, not far from Friburg, a famous City of Misnia; my Ancestors and Parents (tho' great and good) I as seldom boast of, as I reflect on others for the meanness of their Extradition. For what does it concern me from what Whore, what Priest, or Monk, or from what Dumb-bell a Man springs, if, by the Endowments of his Mind, he retrieve and surmount those Misfortunes for which he himself is not to be blamed. Methinks I see here a tacit Reflexion on Erasmus's being a Bastard. Note, that Eppendorf was accused of boasting of his Nobility, tho' he was Son to a Plebeian. 'Dux (Saxonie) non admittit hominem, negans se velle eum agnoscere qui non agnosceret patrem suum. Jactavit enim se nobilem quum sit plebeus (2). — The Duke (of Saxony) would not admit him; saying he would not own the Man who denied his own Father. For he boasted of his Nobility, tho' he is a Plebeian.'

[B] He published a Book, which contains the History of that Dispute with Erasmus.] You have seen the Title of it, and the Year it was printed in, in the foregoing Remark. It is a book I have not read, but I have had long Abstracts sent me out of it (3), which have acquainted me as fully with the State of this Dispute, as if I had used my own Eyes. Eppendorf was the Plaintiff in this Controversy; having made his Complaint against Erasmus before the Magistrates of Basil, who promised to do justice. The thing in question was an injurious Letter, of which he accused Erasmus of being the Author. He demanded three Things, besides the Retraction of the Letter: I. That Erasmus should dedicate a Book to him; II. That he should write in his Favour to the Duke of Saxony; III. That to repair the Injury he had done him, he should be obliged to give Three hundred Ducats to the Poor (4). Erasmus answered, that he disowned the Letter (5); and that if Eppendorf gave him Marks of his Friendship, he would not scruple to dedicate a Book to him. He promised to write to the Duke of Saxony; but would promise nothing as to the last Point. Here is more at large, and in Latin, what he answered. 'Ad quam postulationem sic respondit (Erasmus): Epistolam quam prælegit non agnosco, nec arbitror me scripsisse talia nec exemplar in meis schedis reperio, & epistola ducis, si proferatur, testabitur me talia non scripsisse, tantum admonui ducem, ut illum ad honestam functionem ab ocio revocaret, aut certe quietem mihi ab illo impetraret; de inscriptione libelli, si videro animum illius factum amicum, non gravabor, majora facturus amicitie nomine: quam sit illi princeps iratus nescio, aut quas irarum causas habeat mihi non constat: habebat Eppendorphius Emserum hostem capitale apud principem: si ex mea querela Princeps factus est alienor, non gravabor hoc meis litteris civiliter scriptis mitigare quatenus licet cum tantis principibus agere. De elemosynis ipse curabo cum mihi Deus in mentem miserit, nec mea refert quomodo hic aut Friburgi vixerit, quo sanctius vixit hoc magis gaudeo: de aureis quos postulet sibi dari præstat filere, ne videatur ob hanc causam intendisse litem; agat amice & destinat populum in me concitare, uberius illi prodesse possum officiis quam si dem 200 aureos. — To which demand Erasmus made this Reply. I disown the Letter which he read, nor do I imagine I wrote any such thing, neither do I find any Copy thereof amongst my Papers, and if the Duke's Letter be produced, it will witness that I did write no such thing; I only requested the Duke to give him some honest Employment, that he might have something to do, or at least prevail with him not to give me any future Molestation. As to the Dedication of a Book, if I find he has laid aside all Animosity, I shall not scruple to do it; I should not stick at greater things when Friendship is the Case; I am ignorant of the Prince's anger, and the Causes he may have are secrets to me; Eppendorf had an implacable Enemy with the Prince in Emser: but if my quarrel has been the Cause of his Disgrace, I shall not refuse by Letter to intercede for him in the best manner I can, so far as may be consistent for me to act with such great Princes. As to the Alms, as God shall please to direct my choice, I will be answerable; nor does it concern me how he lived here or at Friburg; the more uprightly he lived, the more am I rejoiced. With respect to the Ducats he demands, it were better to be silent, lest he should be thought to have founded his quarrel upon them. Let him act like a Friend, and cease to stir up the Multitude against me; my Services may be of more value to him than two hundred Ducats. Beatus Rhenanus, who took upon him the Office of Mediator in this Quarrel, put Erasmus's Answer into the Hands of Eppendorf. The latter finding himself wronged as to the second Article, since it was previously required of him, that he should promise his Friendship to a Person that had affronted him; Erasmus was forced to engage himself to dedicate a Book to him without any Condition, under this Form. 'Erasmus Roterodamus Henrico Eppendorphio S. D. Divites divitibus mittunt equos, auleas, gemmas & aurum, muta nimirum munera nec duratura, postremo quæ nec meliorem, nec ornatiorem reddunt eum cui mittuntur, & pauperiorem illum à quo proficiuntur: inter eos vero quos litterarum communis amor fœderavit aliud donorum genus commutare decet, quæ nec exhauriant largientem & fructum simul ac decus afferant accipienti. Proinde libellam mitto, tuo dicatum nominis litterarum societatis olim inter nos inite monumentum, quam ego perpetuum esse vehementer cupio, nec tantum permittemus malis linguis ut nostram amicitiam Musarum auspiciis conciliatam dirimant, utcumque moliti sunt nos inter nos committere: sed non te remorabor amplius, quo tibi vacet audire quid loquatur libellus. — Erasmus Roterodamus to Henry Eppendorf, Greeting. The Wealthy to the Wealthy send Horses, Tapestry, Jewels, and Gold, dumb Presents these and of short Duration, such moreover as make the Receiver neither better nor more valuable, and yet impoverish the Giver. But amongst those whom a common Love of Learning has united, there ought to be an Intercourse of a different kind of Presents, such as drain not the Giver, yet enoble and enrich the Receiver. To you therefore I send this Treatise, dedicated to your Name, as a Monument of that Literary Alliance, into which we formerly entered, and which I earnestly desire may be perpetual. Let us not pay so much regard to malicious Tongues as to suffer them to dissolve a Friendship so happily formed under the influence of the Muses, however some have laboured to sow discord between us. But I will not detain you any longer. Eppendorf, satisfied upon the two first Articles, was not so upon the third. He found a great deal of Artifice in Erasmus's pretending he did not understand to what use the Money was destined, which was exacted from him (6). Eppendorf complained, that he was accused of stirring up the Populace; three Days being spent in this Dispute, the Decision of it was at last referred to the Judgment of two Arbitrators, to wit, Bonifacius Amerbach, and Rhenanus; who, in the presence of Lewis Bersus, and Henry Glareanus, pronounced this Sentence: 'Quo-

VOL. H.

(6) Cum articuli mei habent propter impetum & innocentiam & simplicitatem meam pauperibus esse largiendam pecuniam. Too' it is expressed in my Articles, that, in regard of my unquestioned Innocence and Integrity, the Money should be distributed amongst the poor.

try to perfect himself in the Sciences; that he had been the Disciple of the famous Zasius, Professor of the Civil Law; That he had lived a long time at Straßburg; and, that niam ex consensu utriusque nobis jus fecistis dissidii inter vos amice componendi, visum est nobis ut D. Erasmus ad evitandam molestiam & alendam Christianam concordiam præstet duos articulos sicut scripto recepit: pro tertio eodem animo non gravabitur in subsidium pauperum dare florenos circiter viginti, nostro arbitrio dispensandos, & hæc facienda censuimus citra notam alterutrius, tantum ut utrinque offensis, querelis & suspicionibus abolitis, de integro certamen inter vos sit benevolentiae, cum oblivione Preteritorum omnium perinde quasi nihil esset aut dictum aut factum. D. Henricus Eppendorffus premit, si quid scriptum: & utrique liberum relinquitur, an vicissim aliquo benevolentiae symbolo an potius mutuo animo contenti esse velint. Actum Basilæ postredie purificationis anno MDXXVIII. — Since by mutual Consent you have empowered us to make an amicable determination of the Quarrel betwixt you; It appears reasonable to us, that Erasmus, to avoid Contention, and to promote Christian Concord, perform the two Articles which he received in writing, and from the same Motives, with respect to the third, he will not scruple to give about twenty Florins for the relief of the Poor, to be disposed of as we shall think proper; and these things we judge ought to be admitted by both Parties without Alteration, that so, all Animositities, Quarrels, and Jealousies being forgot on both sides, as tho' nothing of that Nature had ever subsisted, ye may enter afresh into a contest of good Nature. If Eppendorff has wrote any thing, let him suppress it, and we leave it free to both, to abuse the Exchange of some token of Reconciliation, or rest satisfied with the Assurance of each other. Done at Basil the Day after Candlemas-day 1528. The contending Parties acquiesced in the Sentence, and embraced one another as a Mark of their Reconciliation. The next Day they were brought to dine together; but the War was like to break out again: For, as they rose from Table, Eppendorff having desired Erasmus to get ready the Letter he had promised to write to the Duke of Saxony, and Erasmus answering he would write to the Chancellor only, there arose a high contest between them, and they parted that Day very ill satisfied with one another. However, the next Day Erasmus wrote to the Prince, and sent his Letter open to Eppendorff, who was well pleased with it. Not long after, some Reports were spread, injurious to Erasmus, as if had consented to a shameful Accommodation. You will see how he complained of the Rhodomontades of his Adversary. The Quotation is pretty long, because I have a mind to comprehend in it what belongs to the Agreement, according to Erasmus's Way of telling it. My Reader may compare together the Narratives of each Party. 'Opinor Dilectum tibi narrasse de reatu meo. Ego hac in re obsecundavi consilio Beati Rhenani, & Ludovici Berii. Alioqui sciebam illum nihil acturum. Fumos hominis jam olim novi. Sed Beati ingenio semper abusus est ad hujusmodi dramata. Turbam amoliti sumus qualibuscunque conditionibus, pacem iniquam æquo bello præferentes. Nihil omisum est, compromissum est. Adhibiti duo testes. Arbitri datis dextris stipulati sunt obsequium. Pronunciatum est de scripto arbitrium. Assensus utrique. Subscriptus manu utrique. Deinde bibimus ex eodem poculo, fracto inter nos pane, datæ dextræ. Ominatus sum amicitiam fore perpetuam. Annuat ille, & comprobavit. Exhibuit est omnibus convivium ἐξελίον. In habitu petiit epistolam ad Ducem. Id præter pacta præstiti, ne quam darem occasionem. Petiit præfationem in librum ipsi dicandum. Id, quamquam absurdum & ineptum, tamen autore Bonifacio feci. Quid consecutum est? Mox dicitur misisse famulum proprium, qui sub nundinas vulgaret atrocem rumorem, Erasmus esse damnatum Basilæ, conditionibus gravissimis, ut scriberet librum & epistolam contra seipsum, deinde daret pecuniam. Et hic ante abitum iactavit se adigisse Erasmus ad conditiones, ad quas ipse nollet descendere pro tribus millibus aureorum. Hic rumor mirum quantum exhilaravit pseudo-evangelicos. Qui triumphi! Quæ exultatio de nihilo! Hæc ego suspicabar futura, sed neque Beato, neque Bero potui persuadere, qualis esset artifex (7). — I suppose Disius has informed you of my

(7) Erasmus, Epist. xlvii, lib. 30, pag. 1033. It is dated from Basil, Apr. 1528.

Case. In this Matter I followed the Advice of Beatus Rhenanus, and Lewis Bero; otherwise I knew he would do nothing. I had long been acquainted with his Levity. But he has always abused the good Nature of Rhenanus on such Occasions. We sought a Pacification on any Terms, preferring an ignoble Peace to a just War. No Stone was left unturned: the Matter was made up. Two Witnesses were called. The Mediators in a friendly manner drew up the Articles of Reconciliation. The Award was read. We both gave our Approbation, and both subscribed it. Afterwards we drank out of the same Cup, broke Bread together, and joined Hands. I looked on that as an Omen of a lasting Friendship. He signified his Assent by his Behaviour. A Friendly Entertainment was provided for us all. At his departure he required a Letter to the Duke. Though not contained in the Stipulations, I wrote it, to avoid giving him a handle of Reproach. He demanded a Preface to a Book that was to be inscribed to him; This, tho' absurd and ridiculous, I consented to at the Instance of Amerbachius. What was the Consequence? he is reported to have sent his Servant soon after to publish a scandalous Rumour at the Fair, that Erasmus had been censured at Basil, and sentenced to write a Book and an Epistle against himself, and fined into the bargain. Even here, before his Departure, he boasted to have compelled Erasmus to such Terms as he would not submit to for three thousand Ducats. It is surprising how agreeable this Report was to the Pseudo-Evangelists. What Triumphs! What Rejoycings for nothing! I suspected all this would happen, but could neither persuade Rhenanus nor Bero, what a Shuffler he was.

This Peace was ill observed: For there was hardly ever a Cessation of Hostilities in Words and Manuscripts, and at last Books entered into the Quarrel. Erasmus having published one, wherein Eppendorff was ill treated, his Adversary confuted the same in the Book printed at Haguenau in the Year 1531, whose Title I have given. We may observe, that these Literary Wars much resemble those of Princes: Each of the contending Parties boasts of their having religiously observed the Treaty of Peace, and charges the other with a Thousand Infractions. Eppendorff sets forth, that after the Agreement he was informed Erasmus continued to defame him (8), and therefore he did but follow the Dictates of Prudence in defending himself. He would not believe any such Reports, till Erasmus's Letters were shewn to him. 'Respondi me nihil horum expectare ab Erasmo, nec putare eum bonorum & præclarorum virorum arbitrium violaturum: quid dicam, literas mittunt huius animi testes, quæ apud amicos, alterum item ex iudicibus coram appello: quid mihi post pactum accidat, injurias tam atroces diu sustinere non posse. Et tamen interim expectat Dominus Erasmus à me multas salutes, honorificam mentionem, literas amicas: nec saltem has efflagitat, verum etiam urgere me vult ut in omnibus conviviis eum per ora hominum veham. In Utopia forsitan offendentur qui pro tam insignibus maleficiis bonas gratias referunt. Officii ducat quod par pari non retulerim: post initam concordiam non scripsi unam litteram in Erasmus, & quæ ante concordiam ad tuendum nomen meum adornaram, concordia sic iubente suppressi. — I answered, that I expected no such treatment from Erasmus, and that I could not imagine he would have broke through the Determination of so good and so eminent Men. What shall I say? The Letters, which they send, confirm his Design: I complain to my Friends; Appeal to one of the Referees. I inform him what has happened since the Agreement; that I cannot long put up such glaring Affronts. Yet Erasmus expects from me a World of Complaisance, that I should speak of him with Honour, and write to him with Respect; nor does he only demand this, but would oblige me to extol him in all Companies above the rest of Mankind. In Utopia perhaps Persons may be found who return Civility for such notorious ill usage. Let him think I have used him civilly in not making a suitable return. Since the Reconciliation, I have not wrote one Letter against Erasmus, and what I had published before in my own Justification, for the sake

(8) Nomen meum ignominiose in libellum transfundere.

that he stood neuter between the violent Factions which Luther's Reformation raised in Germany [C]. It must be confessed, That, in order to get Satisfaction for an injurious Writing published against him, he made use of a most effectual Means to restrain the moft

(9) Qui videtur hac potissimum
de causa venisse Augustum ut in excelebritate hominum femina-ret sua mendacique non aliter ex-se gignit quam a-renam a filium. Erasmus, Ep. LIII, Libri XXX,
pag. 194C.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Id. ibid.

'of Peace I had suppressed.' Now if we consult Erasmus, he will tell us, that his Adversary broke the Peace even before they went out of the Place where it was signed; and that he was a noted Liar, who had been at the Diet of Ausburg in the Year 1530, with Design only to vent his Falsities there (9). Scriptis ad me Dux, ut Julii literis fidem haberem. Julius scripsit amantissime doctissimeque multa, quorum hæc erat summa, ut præfationi adderem libellum Epiphendorpio dicatum, veluti ex fœdere, quoniam ille multis modis violavit fœdus, priusquam exiret Basileam, nec post deflitterat de me hostiliter & scribere & loqui, subinde recitans furiosum librum, nesci in me scripsit. Nec in aliud querebat librum, nisi ut iterum glorietur, ad quas condiciones adegisset Erasmum. Sperabat ex arbitratorum sententia nonnihil prædæ: id quoniam fessellit, factus est ex inimico inimicior, & quum nemo nesciret, illum omnia fecisse contra pacta, tamen perinde petit suum jus, quasi omnia præstiterit, nec pudet quicquam. Decreveram omnia perperit potius, quam levissimi hominis nomine meas chartas contaminare, sed posteaquam ille nullum facit mentiendi finem, causæ summam perstrinxit excusulo libello, nè toties fatigem amanuenses meos (10). — The Duke wrote to me to give credit to the Letters of Pflug, which indeed contained many things full of Learning and Friendship, of which this is the Sum: that in Compliance with the Pacification I should write a Preface to the Book which was to be dedicated to Epiphendorf. The reason of all this is; Epiphendorf, even before he left Basil, had violated the Treaty in several Respects, and had not from that time ceased, either in Writing or Conversation, to treat me like an Enemy, every now and then mentioning what a furious Treatise he had wrote against me. Nor had he any other Design in demanding this Treatise and Dedication, than to have an Opportunity of boasting, to what Terms he had again reduced Erasmus. He hoped for some Booty from the Determination of the Arbitrators; but, failing in that, he was the more exasperated; and tho' every one is sensible that he has done every thing contrary to the agreement, yet he impudently demands Justice to be done him, as if he had performed all that was required of him. I was determined to abide the worst rather than fully my Papers with the Name of so trifling a Man, but since he makes no end of misrepresenting the Cause, I have published the whole State of the Matter, that I may not be obliged to give my Amanuenses a second trouble. To understand the Beginning of this Passage, we must know, that Epiphendorf, not having been able to speak to the Duke of Saxony, nor willing to tell his Reasons to Simon Pistorius, to whom that Prince had referred him, obtained that he might tell them to Julius Pflug. Tandem improbitate sua perfecit, ut Dux causam delegaret Julio Pflug, cujus aures Epiphendorpius noster explevit innumeris mendaciis, quod erat illi bonum atque commodum, quod Julius nec Epiphendorpius nosset, nec causam (11). — At last by his unjust Artifice he obtained of the Duke to refer the management of the Affair to Julius Pflug, whose Ears Epiphendorf had filled with a multitude of Lies, as best suited with his own Interest, Pflug being neither acquainted with him nor the Matter in Debate. He made the best of his Case known to him, and by the Favour of a thousand Lies (according to Erasmus's Assertion); after which the Duke of Saxony wrote to Erasmus, to give Credit to the Letter of Julius Pflug.

[C] He stood neuter between the Factions . . . which the Reformation raised in Germany.] Without doubt he was of the Opinion of those who believed, that the Church of Rome wanted Reformation, and that the Protestants did not reform it well: So that he displeased both Parties, and they went so far as to charge him with being a Pensioner to the Papists and Lutherans at the same time. He represents himself as a Man who, not knowing well as yet which Party had most Justice on their Side, expected that Time would clear the Matter. These are his Words: Oblatae sunt nuper literæ scriptæ ad principem quendam virum, ubi nephandissimus scurra scripserat me quingentos aureos habere à Lutheranis totidemque à Pontificiis, ut vocant, utroque à me emungi auro atque haberi ludibrio, me enim neque novum neque vetus Evangelium curare. Quid facerem? Risi impudentiam nebulonis: nec ita multo post in colloquium accersitus rogatusque ab eo qui Romanæ sedis plurimum favebat quidnam mihi de præsentium statu videretur? Prodidici libere quæ tum in animo haberem: Rursum Evangelicis aperui quæ mihi pro meo plusquam juvenili capto, temere aut exigi aut novari viderentur, non admodum bonam gratiam apud utroque iniens. Volui in hunc usque diem ab negotio illo quod Evangelicum vocant esse integer, precans saltem ut in fatali nunc illa & memorabili rerum immutatione nobis miseris mortalibus eveniat quod fastidium scilicet bonumque sit. Nec nomen alicuius scilicet daturus nisi novus aliquis Solon huc me perperurit, tum scias me saniori subscripturum parti etiam si vita impendenda sit. — Letters were lately shown me which had been written to a certain great Man, wherein a most scurrilous Scophant had affirmed, that I received five hundred Crowns from the Lutherans, and the same Sum from the Papists, as they are called; that I bought them both of their Money, and made a jest of them, since I had no regard for either Religion. What could I do? I laughed at the Fellow's Impudence. Soon after being invited into Company, and asked by one who zealously espoused the Church of Rome, what my Opinion was of the present State of Affairs? I freely discovered my Sentiments: I have likewise declared to the Evangelists what Demands or Innovations, according to my weak Apprehension, they seemed too unwisely to insist on, nor did I carry any extraordinary Favour with either. I have chose to this Day to keep my self clear of those Engagements which they call Evangelic, praying however that in this fatal and memorable Change, we poor Mortals may only reap the good Effects thereof, nor would I enlist myself in any Sect, unless some new Solon should arise; then should I not fail to declare for the sounder Party. To judge of things according to the Principles of natural Light, the Course Epiphendorf took was the most reasonable. He had a Mind to see the End of this Affair, before he sided either with the Party that maintained Abuses, or with the Party that opposed them. He thought both too hot, and the Storm too fierce; so that he said with Cicero, Quem fugiam habeo, quem sequar non habeo (12); and he loved Peace too well, to embark in this religious War. But it was in vain that he hoped to stand upon the Shore a quiet Spectator of the Boisterousness of that Sea: For he found himself more exposed to the Storm, than if he had been in either of the Fleets. This is the inevitable Fate of those who pretend to keep a Neutrality during the Civil-Wars, either of Church or State. They are exposed to the Insults of both Parties at once; they get Enemies without procuring themselves Friends: Whereas by espousing with Zeal either of the two Causes, they have Friends as well as Enemies. A deplorable Destiny of Man, a manifest Vanity of Philosophical Reason! It makes us look upon the Tranquillity of the Soul, and the Calmness of the Passions, as the end of all our Labours, and the most precious Fruit of our most painful Meditations; and yet Experience shews, that as to the World, there is no Condition more unfortunate, than that of Friends who will not devote themselves to the Waves of Factions: Nor any Condition less uneasy, than that of such Men as howl with the Wolves, and follow the Torrent of the most boisterous Passions. Among other Advantages, they have that of not knowing that they are in the wrong: For no Men are less capable of seeing the Faults of their Faction, and the Good that may be found in the other Party, than those who are transported with a fiery Zeal, and a quick Resentment, and under the Power of strong Prejudices. Beati pacifici, says the Scripture (13), Blessed are the Peace-makers: Which is most true as to the other World, but in this they are miserable: They will not be a Hammer, and therefore they are an Anvil, upon which both Sides beat continually.

[H] He

(12) Cicero, ad Atticum, Epist. VII, lib. viii.

INCONVENIENCES of a State of Neutrality and Moderation.

(13) Matth. v, 9.

most slanderer Authors [D].

[D] He made use of a most effectual Means to restrain the most slanderer Authors.] He brought an Action before the Judges; and, among other Reparations of the Injury done him, demanded that the Aggressor might be adjudged to pay a Fine for the benefit of the Poor. This is a most efficacious Remedy against the Spleen of many Writers. They are more quarrelsome, and more difficult to be reconciled than Soldiers. It is, say they, because Soldiers decide their Quarrels with Sword in Hand at the hazard of their Lives; but Authors that quarrel, do not expose themselves to the hazard of spilling their Blood; it costs them only some Paper and Ink. If they exposed their Skin to the Point of a Sword, as they do to the Point of a Pen, they would be more pacific. We may say likewise, that if their Purse ran any hazard for every Affront they should give, their Style would be more civil, and therefore our Eppendorf had recourse to a good Method. Authors ought to be allowed to criticize one another, as to Erudition, or a false Reasoning: For these are Things out of the Cognizance of Civil Judges. But it were to be wished, that they would put the Rigour of the Laws in Execution, and at least inflict Pecuniary Mulcts on such Authors who attack the Reputation of their Neighbours, and do them other Injuries. This would banish out of Books an infinite number of diffamatory Expressions, and introduce Moderation into the Controversies of Parnassus, where it is but little known.

ERASMUS (DIDIER, in Latin, DESIDERIUS) was born at Rotterdam the twenty eighth day of October 1467 [A]. It cannot be denied that he was a Bastard [B]: And it was an ill grounded Scruple not to dare to publish it in the Beginning

[A] He was born . . . the twenty eighth of October 1467.] I fix Erasmus's Birth to this Year, not because I am ignorant that many place it in the Year 1465, but because I chuse to conform myself to the Inscription of his Statue at Rotterdam, wherein it is probable they have not put 1467, rather than 1465, without a due Examination which of the two was properest. Mr Joli has made use of the same Observation. 'It is not likely, says he (1), that he was born in 1465, as some hold, because in his Epitaph, which is at Basil, it is said, that he died, being above seventy Years old (2), the twelfth of July 1536, which could not be if he was born in 1467; for that Inscription of Rotterdam is to be more depended upon than any thing else, it being to be supposed that the Time of his Birth was better known at Rotterdam, which was his native Place, than at Basil, where he was a Stranger; especially considering that one can gather no Certainty about it, either from his Writings or even from his Letters; by which it appears he was not truly informed of it himself, and that some Errors have been committed as to the Date of those Lettets, by those that have copied and printed them.' The last Part of this Passage is necessary to the first: For if Erasmus had known exactly the Year of his Birth, it had been as easy to set it down right on his Tomb at Basil, as on his Statue at Rotterdam. I am inclined to believe, he did not know it precisely, but only in such a Manner as he thought he knew the Day of his Birth; which, in the Beginning of his Life, he contents himself to fix on the Eve of St Simon and St Jude (3), in vigilia Simonis & Jude. But on the other Hand, I do not doubt but he placed his Birth before the Year 1467. Hence it is that Bonifacius Amerbach, his Heir, Jerom Frobenius and Nicolas Episcopus, his Executors, chose in his Epitaph the undetermined Expression of Jam Septuagenarius, which is more proper for a Man that died the twelfth of July 1536, when he is supposed to have been born before the Twenty eighth of October 1467, than when he is supposed to be born that Day. Beatus Rhenanus sufficiently intimates, that Erasmus's Friends could not learn any certain Information from him about it: He intimates it sufficiently, I say, though not without ascribing to David, what Moses said of the Duration of our Life. 'Vixit ad septuagesimum annum quem communem humanæ vitæ terminum regius propheta David statuit, aut certe non multum est supergressus, nam de anno quo natus est apud Batavos nobis non constat: de die constat qui fuit ad quintum Kalend. Novembr. Apostolis Simoni & Judæ sacer (4). — He lived to the Age of seventy Years (which the Royal Prophet David fixes as the common Limit of human Life) or however could not much exceed it. The Year, in which he was born, is not certainly known to us, tho' we are certain with regard to the Day, which was the Twenty eighth of October, the Festival of St Simon and Jude.' The Passage following will be a Confirmation of it. I have taken it out of a Letter which Erasmus wrote to a Professor (5), who defamed him in a cruel manner. Erasmus declares to him that if he attacks him publicly, he will let him know that though he be near seventy Years old, he has still good Teeth and Claws. 'Quod si cognovero, quod equidem non spero, te vel tantillum contra me publicare, experieris (ni fallor) Erasmus jam 70 annos natum neque edentulum esse omnino neque exunguem.' This Letter, dated the ninth of January 1535, is the Sixty eighth of the thirtieth Book of the London Edition. It may be objected, that this Month of January belongs (6) to the Year 1536. Well, let it be so; it will remain true however by this Passage, that Erasmus thought he was born before the Year 1467. I own he was not always of that Opinion; for in the nineteenth Letter of the second Book, dated February 1516, he says, he is only in the Forty ninth Year of his Age, annum ago non plus quam undequingagesimum. The first Letter (7) he wrote to James de Horn the seventeenth of April 1519, says, that he was in the Fifty third Year of his Age, which shews he was born Year 1537, in 1466.

Erasmus's Birth does not only run upon the Years 1465, and 1467, but is tossed up and down through the Mistakes of Printers, if not of Authors themselves. Chytraeus (8) fixes it to the Year 1466; Magirus (9) (10) to the Year 1467; see the Chronological Index of Bucheler on the Year 1465: And Father Theophilus Raynaud has placed it in the Year 1469 (10). Nor are the Opinions less various about Erasmus's Death: Konig (11) places it in the Year 1526; the Author of the Notes upon Priolo in 1546; Moreri in 1516, the eleventh of July. Du Verdier Van Privas (12), and Hofman, commit this last Fault. Melchior Adam fixes it to the sixth of the Ides of July, (which is the tenth). They have put under the Print of Erasmus, which is before his Epistles, printed at London, that he died the thirtieth of July. In the Edition of his Life, in 120, there are some Pieces in the Beginning, and among the rest the Story of the pretended Relinquish of the Money that was taken from him at Dover (13); at the End of which it is said, that he died on the Day of the Ides of July, which is the fifteenth. We must no more trust Inscriptions, either in Marble or Brasse, since People falsify so many Ways that of Erasmus's Tomb, which contains in large Characters the Date of the fourth of the Ides of July, that is, the twelfth of that Month. It shews also, that Bonifacius Amerbach was Heir to Erasmus; and that Jerom Frobenius and Nicolas Episcopus were his Executors: Therefore Melchior Adam (14), Swert (15), Magirus (16), and Bullart (17), do not truly copy the Epitaph; for they bestow equally upon those three Persons the Quality of Heirs. Freberus does the same in his Theatre, pag. 848. and Catherine in the Art of Printing, pag. 6. It is a vexatious thing that the Mistakes of Transcribers should extend even to sepulchral Inscriptions; for in other Matters such Mistakes might occasion Disputes very hard to be determined. There are some Writers, such as he who composed Les Delices de la Hollande (18), who are mistaken as to the place of Erasmus's Death: they say, that it was at Friburg in Alsace.

[B] It cannot be denied that he was a Bastard.] He owns himself that his Father and Mother were never married. It is true, he says, that his Mother granted

(1) Joli Voyage de Munster, pag. 144.

VARIOUS Opinions concerning the time of the Birth and Death of Erasmus.

(2) He is mistaken: The Epitaph says, Jam septuagenarius, almost seventy Years old; a Title which belongs to a Man, as soon as he is past sixty nine Years of Age. However, the Objection remains good, since the Inscription of the Epitaph is inconsistent with Erasmus's Birth on Oct. 28, 1467, as it is set down in the Inscription of the Statue.

(3) That is the 27th of October, and yet most Authors place his Birth-day on the 28th of October, according to the Inscription at Rotterdam.

(4) Beatus Rhenanus, Epist. dedicat. Origin.

(5) His Name was Peter Curtius, and he taught Rhetoric at Rome.

(6) The Year did not always begin in January; but since Erasmus's Will is dated Febr. 12, 1536, he has followed our way of reckoning, else his Will must be referred to the Year 1537.

(7) This is the XXXIId of the Vth Book.

(8) Chron. Saxo.

(9) Eponymol. pag. 317.

(10) See Remark [D].

(11) Biblioth. Vet. & Novæ, pag. 277.

(12) Protopogon. Tom. III, pag. 242.

(13) See Remark [B].

(14) In Vita E.

(15) Athen. Belg. pag. 207.

(16) Eponymol. pag. 319.

(17) Academiæ Sciences, Tom. II, pag. 162.

(18) Pag. 156. Edit. 1685. See also Il Coronamento Polico, Tom. V, pag. 763.

gining of the XVIIth Century [C]; for the Thing was then too well known. But one may well deny some odious Circumstances, which Erasmus's Enemies have published concerning CIRCUMSTANCES concerning Erasmus's Father and Mother.

(19) Erasmus, in vita sua, à Merula anno 1615. vulgata.

(20) In Tractatu de libera hominis Nativitate, seu de Liberis Naturalibus.

(21) It is a Town in Brabant, three Leagues from Breda.

(22) Dated the 18th of October, 1606, and thro' an Error of the Press it is marked the 27th, instead of the 28th of the 11th Century, in the Edition in 1650.

(23) Baudius uses the Word Eutrapelia, which answers to that; witness this Passage of Mr le Camus, Bishop of Bellai, in his Poems against Mr. Dreincourt: Truly that Phraic, of Blants given to the Virgin Mary, is so facetious, that it seems that, in gathering those fine Pearls, you study to practise the Virtue of Eutrapelia.

(24) There is a false Story current about these three Authors; to wit, That they were Bastards of the same Mother, who thought she had no Occasion to repent, by reason of the Services they had done the Church.

(25) Valer. Andr. Biblioth. Belg. page 175.

(26) Theatre-urbium Holl. pag 284.

the last Favour only upon Hopes, and, as some pretend, upon a Promise of Marriage: Clam habuit rem cum dicta Margareta, spe conjugii, & sunt qui dicant intercessisse verba (19). But whatever it be, he was born illegitimate, and was never legitimated per subsequentem matrimonium: Therefore, as long as the World endures, he will be justly ranked among the number of illustrious Bastards. Pontus Heuterus has not forgot him in the long List he has given us of that sort of Bastards (20), and so far he cannot be accused of having followed the passionate Humour which appears in his Writings; but he ought to have explained himself a little more exactly than he has done, on the Character of him to whom Erasmus owed his Life. He calls Erasmus a Priest's Son: That is true in a certain Sense; as it is true that a Person, that becomes a Monarch, communicates the Quality of Royal Issue to the Children he has already. However since, according to the Maxim of the Civilians, we ought to extend whatever is favourable, and contract whatever is not so; we ought never to call one simply and absolutely a Priest's Son, that is not begot by a Man actually a Priest at the Time of the Generation: For it is a greater Dishonour to be an illegitimate Son of a Man actually a Priest. This is Erasmus's Case: Nay, he pretends, that his Father's going into Orders was occasioned by his Grief upon the false News he received at Rome, that his Mistress was dead: that having found out the cheat at his return, he lived very chaffly in relation to that Damsel; who, for her Part, had no other Thoughts than to give a good Education to their common Son, without desiring to marry.

This is what we find in a Life of Erasmus, which some pretend was composed by himself, and published by Merula in 1607, from the Original which Erasmus had entrusted with Conradus Goclenius, Professor in the Latin Tongue at Louvain. This is a Piece composed with the utmost Negligence, and wherein we find nothing but a great Simplicity, without any particular Detail. The only thing you learn there, touching Erasmus's Mother, is, that her Name was Elizabeth; that she was of Sevenberghen (21), and Daughter of a certain Physician called Peter, Filius Medici cujusdam Petri. As for the Father, one cannot learn from thence from whence he came, nor where he dwelt; Wherefore the Reader will do well to have recourse to a Letter of Baudius (22), wherein we find, I. That Erasmus's Father was a Burgher and Inhabitant of Torgou, of an honest Family, tolerably learned considering those Days, and of a merry, facetious Humour, which got him the Surname of Praet, or Facetious (23). II. That the Time of his Mistress's Lying-in drawing near, it was thought fit to send her to Rotterdam, the better to conceal the Matter; and that the Father gave his Name of Gerard to the Child. III. That, bating this Irregularity, Erasmus's Mother was blameless; and might with Dido say,

Huic uni forsan potui succumbere culpæ.

This only Error stains my spotless Life.

It is certain that her Sin, very different however from those committed by profligate, leud, Women, has produced to excellent a Man, that, if she had lived long enough to see the extraordinary Merit of her Son, she would have had more Reason than the Mother of Peter Lombard, of Gratian, and of Comestor (24), to use the Answer which is ascribed to the latter: For twenty Authors like those three are not worth one half of Erasmus. But she died of the Plague, when her Son was in the thirteenth Year of his Age.

According to Baudius, the good Man, Gerard, took Care of his Son's Christening: However Erasmus's Life says, that Gerard, not being able to change the Resolution of his Father, Mother, and Brothers, who would have him by all means turn Priest, he withdrew privately out of his Country, sent them Word they would never see him again, and went to Rome, leaving with Child the Person he designed to marry. Valerius Andreas Desfelius (25) copies very exactly what Baudius had said in Praise of Erasmus's Father; but Boxhornius (26) makes a notable Alteration in it; for he would have that good Priest to have been fir-named Praet on account of his eloquent Sermons. To justify this Alteration of Baudius's Passage, it had been requisite to bestow on the Sermons of Erasmus's Father the Character of those of Menot, Maillard, Barlette, the little Father Andrew, &c. For the Term of Facundia, which Boxhornius uses, does not answer the Virtue of Eutrapelia. I would fain know where he has learned, that Gerard was of Sevenberghen? Erasmus's Life says this of his Mother only; and Baudius contents himself to assure us, that the Father was a Burgher and Inhabitant of Torgou. Valerius Andreas joins what they affirm separately: Patrem habuit, says he, Gerardum Septimontanum, civem & incolam urbis Gaudanæ. Mr Sackendorf is mistaken, when he says (27), that a young Man of Rotterdam was Erasmus's Father.

VOL. II. No. LVI.

[C] It was an ill grounded Scruple not to dare to publish it in the beginning of the XVIIth Century.] The forementioned Letter of Baudius shews, that Merula had great Scruples to contend with, before he fully resolved to publish the Writing entrusted with Goclenius; he was a long time under an Apprehension of wronging Erasmus's Memory, and, by the Discovery of this Secret, of incurring the Indignation of the Partisans of that great Man. Baudius represented to him, by solid Reasons, that the best Way was to print it: 'Nec est quod in eo pertimeas offensam' 'cujusquam probi, quasi scilicet invidiosa proditiōe' 'detexeris quædam arcana digna sacro silentio'

'nec ipse alio animo seriem vitæ suæ penes principem' 'amicorum deposuit, quàm ut se rebus humanis' 'exempto posteritas hujus horribilis secreti particeps' 'esset' (28). — You have no Reason to be afraid of thereby giving offence to any honest Man, as if by a malicious Discovery you had brought to light Things which ought not to have been revealed. . . . Nor did he with any other design deposit the History of his Life in the Hands of his most valuable Friend, than that after his Death, Posterity might be informed of the infamous Secret. But since he forgets the Reason I am going to mention, it is likely he was ignorant that Erasmus had already been reflected on for being a Priest's Son. That Reason is, that there was nothing got by the Suppression of that Life of Erasmus; and that, on the contrary, its Publication might serve to extenuate the common Report, about his Father's and Mother's Miscarriage, which had already been made public with aggravating and false Circumstances. There is no doubt but Baudius would have made use of that Reason, if he had known what was in Loofius's Catalogue, printed in 1581; and in Pontus Heuterus's Book printed in 1600. I do not mention what Desfelius quotes from Paulus Jovius; and I do not wonder Baudius was not acquainted with the Contents of the Letters of Julius Cæsar Scaliger. You will see presently what I mean. Baudius was not obliged to know a Book of Desfelius, which was not yet printed; and I think he deserves to be excused for not having believed that Paulus Jovius had said any thing of Erasmus's Illegitimacy: For a very learned Man has assured me, I. That no such Thing is found in Paulus Jovius's Works, and that therefore Desfelius misquotes him. II. That the first Man that divulged this Secret in a public Writing, concerning the Birth of Erasmus, is the Author who concealed himself under the Name of Philalethes (29). 'John Herold, in his Philopseudes, or Apologetical Answer, in Opposition to the Dialogue published under the Name of Philalethes against Erasmus's Memory, about five Years after his Death, finds himself very much embarrassed about the Objection touching Erasmus's Birth; and not being able to get clear of it, he seems at first to yield, by saying, Ut donemus te verum dicere, per Christum dic, rogo, an parum videatur tibi homo ille optimus a te toties lacessitus, nisi hanc quoque notam addas. — Suppose we grant that what you say is true: For Heaven's sake, do you think that good Man has not been sufficiently reviled by you, but you must likewise fix this mark upon him. His Adversary, without calling Erasmus positively a Priest's Son, said, that he was ex condemnato concubitu natus. Herold protests against the enormity of the Slander, and says, That among all those who had till then written against Erasmus, none had ever

(27) Histor. Lutheran. lib. 1, pag. 142.

(28) Baudius, Epist. xxviii, Centur. II.

(29) That is, in his Opinion, Hortensio Landò. See the Article LANDO, Reh. [A].

concerning his Birth D]. Being nine Years old he was sent to Deventer, where he made a very considerable Progress in his Studies; for it is not true, as many believe, that he was slow in learning [E]. At fourteen Years of Age, having lost both Father and Mother,

(30) These Words are taken from a Memoir of Mr de la Moignon; I shall quote it again in the Remark [L].

(31) Reverfius (Roma) facris initiatus est: unde parente paracho, Gaudane civitatis vicino, natum fuiffe, præpoftere Jo- vius fcriptit. Valer. Andr. ubi fupra.

Note, That Erasmus fays in his Life, That his Father turned Priest before he returned into his Country. Bullart, Académ. des Scien. Tom. II, pag. 160, fays the fame thing with Valerius Andreas.

(32) I believe it is that which was made by a Priest a Native of Tergou, called Cornelius Loofen, printed at Mentz in 1581.

(33) Th. Rayn. Erotem. de Libris, pag. 25.

REFLEXIONS on the Alterations of Transcribers. Faults of the Bernardine Friar St Remuuld.

(34) He fould have faid Raynaud.

(35) Abreg. du Thref. Chron. Tom. III, ad Ann. 1536, pag. 289 & 290, Edit. 1660.

PATIN quoted and censured.

(36) Letter 277, Tom. II.

‘thought to reproach him with any fuch Thing. He ‘was in the right (30).’

[D] One may deny some odious Circumstances concerning his Birth.] Erasmus's Enemies have made his Birth much more scandalous than indeed it was. Several Roman Catholics acknowledge it: Among the reft, Valerius Andreas, who having faid, that Gerard went into Orders upon his return from Rome, concludes from thence, that Paulus Jovius was very much in the wrong, to write that Erasmus was Son to one that was a Curate near Tergou (31). Father Theophilus Raynaud has published the fame Falſity, upon the Credit of a Catalogue of the illuſtrious Writers of Germany (32). ‘Erasmus ſi joculari de joculari homine in ſcelere licet, non fuiſſe filium Regis, licet is, qui eum genuit, fuerit coronatus, ut de alio quodam dixit Petrus Bleſ. Epiſt 21, fuiſſe, inquam, Erasmus patre Gondani (read Goudani) in Batavia oppidi prope Roterodamum, Parocho genitum, ex famula, catalogus illuſtrium Germaniæ Scriptorum prodiit, &c (33). That is, If it may be allowed, in a criminal Matter, to jeſt upon a Jeſter, we may ſay, that Erasmus, though he was not a King's Son, had nevertheless a crowned Head to his Father; that is to ſay, a Curate of Tergou, a Town in Holland, near Rotterdam; who having got his Maid with Child, in order to conceal the Crime, ſent her to Rotterdam, where ſhe was delivered of Erasmus in 1469. We ſhall ſee, by and by, that Scaliger ſays yet worſe of Erasmus's Father.

To give an Inſtance of the Alterations which Accounts of Facts undergo, by paſſing from hand to hand from one Compiler to another, I ſhall ſhow here how Peter of St Remuuld has copied a Paſſage of that Jeſuit. ‘Erasmus, ſays he, was not a King's Son, tho' he that got him was crowned; for the Curate of his Birth-Place was his Father, who got him by his Maid, if we may believe Father Theophilus Regnaud (34). He was called at firſt Gherardus Gherardi; but he would be called Defiderius Erasmus, taking a Pleaſure in changing his Name, to which he was invited by ſeveral others; particularly by Capnio, who was called before Reuchlin, which ſignifies Smoak; by Peter Martyr, called before Vermilius; by Martin Bucer, who diſguiſed himſelf under the Name of Aretius Felinus, &c (35). That honeſt Bernardine Friar does not ſo much as know the Name of the Jeſuit he copies; but beſides, he falſly aſcribes to him the having ſaid, that Erasmus was born in his Father's Pariſh. The Inſtances he gives, of the changing of Names, contain ſeveral Miſtakes. If the Word imitatus has been miſprinted inſtead of imitated, as it is very likely, the Author quotes Reuchlin very prepoſterouſly; Reuchlin, I ſay, who lived before, not after, Erasmus. If this be not an Error of the Preſs, Peter Martyr and Martin Bucer are miſquoted as Precedents, ſince Erasmus lived before them. Add to this, that Peter Martyr did not change the Name of Vermilius into that of Martyr: For all his Life-time he was called Petrus Martyr Vermilius; the two firſt being his Chriſtian Names, the other the Name of his Family. It is true, that either for Brevity ſake, or for other Reaſons, he has oftener been quoted by the Name of Martyr, than by that of Vermilius. As for Bucer, he never took the Name of Aretius Felinus, but in the Title of ſome Books: And therefore there is no Conformity between what he has done, and our Erasmus's changing his Name.

Theophilus Raynaud's Words have diſpleaſed his great Admirer, Guy Patin: ‘I wonder, ſays he (36), how a learned Man, ſuch as Father Theophilus Raynaud, can be guilty of the ſame Slanders. It is true that Erasmus was a Baſtard, and a Priest's Son, as it is eaſy to be ſeen in his Life written by himſelf: Nevertheless the Friars are not the firſt that have reproached him with the Miſfortune of his Birth; but Scaliger in his Ciceronianus, and after him the whole Brotherhood of the Cows.’ That Author had ſaid before, ‘That Erasmus was never a Monk, but only a Novice in a College of Regular Canons of St Auguſtin; where his Guardian had ſent him at fourteen Years of Age, with Deſign to keep him there, and to enjoy his Eſtate: But the Spark, ſays

‘he, had no mind to be a Friar: Though ſome ſay he entered himſelf into that Order.’

There are ſome Things to be cenſured in this: I. It does not become a Man, who takes Erasmus's Part with ſo much Heat as that Phyſician, to own, without the Explanation I have given before, that That great Man was a Priest's Son. II. It is true indeed that Juſtus Caſar Scaliger has reproached him with it; but not in his Ciceronianus, or rather in the two Harangues he has made againſt Erasmus's Ciceronianus (37). III. Laſtly, It is moſt true that Erasmus entered himſelf into the Order of the Regular Canons of St Auguſtin. I own he had a great mind to get out of their Hands before the end of his Noviciate; and that his entering into Vows was much leſs an Act of his Free Will, than the Effect of his natural Baſhfulneſs, which hindered him from defeating, by his Knowledge and Inclination, all the various Arts they uſed to blind his Mind: But at laſt he yielded his Neck to the Yoke, as he owns it himſelf in his Life (38), and in a long Letter to Lambert Grunnius. ‘In ſumma, vicerunt improbitate. Adoleſcens & animo abhorrens & verbis reluctans coactus eſt capſtrum accipere, non aliter quam bello capti vincienda manus victori præbent, ut diutinis victi tormentis faciant, non quod volunt, ſed quod collabuit potenti- (39). — In ſhort, their importunity prevailed. The Youth, notwithstanding his Averſion, notwithstanding he declared his Reluctance, was forced to ſubmit his Neck to the Yoke, as Slaves taken in War ſtretch forth their Hands to their Conqueror, and receive his Chains, as thoſe who are wearied out with continual Torments do, not what they chuſe, but what a ſtronger is pleaſed to command.’ And when Providence ſent him a Deliverer, who freed him from his Cloyſter, I mean a Biſhop of Cambray, who had a mind to have his Company in his Journey to Rome, he did not content himſelf with his Biſhop's Leave, but added to it that of his Prior (40), and kept the Habit of his Order for ſeveral Years: ‘Nec horum quicquam fatum eſt, ſays he (41), ſpeaking of himſelf to Grunnius, niſi permiſſu atque adeo juſſu Epilcopi ordinarii, permiſſu Præpoſiti, tum domeſtici tum generalis, denique cum pace totius Sodalitatis. Quamquam autem eſſet libera conſcientia, ſciſtæque ſe voto adacto non teneri, illud tamen interim dedit . . . ne veſtem mutaret.’

[E] It is not true that Erasmus was ſlow in Learning.] There is a Tradition current in Holland, which ſeems to me to be ill grounded, and which is, That Erasmus was at firſt ſo heavy and ſlow an Underſtanding, that it was many Years before they could make him learn any thing: And People make uſe of this Inſtance to comfort the Parents of ſuch Children as do not improve. This puts me in mind of Moliere's Play, called, Le Malade Imaginaire; where Monſieur Dyſcours ſays of his Son Thomas, ‘That when he was young, he was not what People call brisk and ſprightly; that he always appeared ſedate, quiet, and ſullen; that he never ſpoke a Word, and never minded boyiſh Play; that they had much ado to teach him to read, and that he was nine Years old when he could ſcarce tell the Letters. Good, ſaid the Father to himſelf; Backward Trees bear the beſt Fruit: It is harder to engrave on Marble, than to write on Sand; but then the firſt retains Things much longer: And this ſlowneſs of Apprehenſion, this Heavineſs of Fancy, is a ſign of a ſound Judgment to come (42).’ It is ſaid, that Thomas Aquinas, who has been ſo vaſt and penetrating a Wit, was accounted a great Blockhead while he was at School, and that his School-Fellows called him the mute Ox. Suarez, who was one of the moſt ſubtle School-Men of the XVIIth Century, went through his Courſe of Philoſophy with ſo little Succeſs, that he thought he ſhould never be able to attain to any competent Knowledge in it (43). Therefore, though what ſo many honeſt People ſay of Erasmus ſhould be true, there would be no Reaſon to be ſurprized at it; but the Queſtion is, if this be not a Fable? For my Part, I believe it is; and the Ground I go upon, is what I have read in an Harangue of David Chytraus (44), beſides ſome other Teſtimonies.

Chytraus

(37) Theſe two Pieces of Scaliger are intitled, the one, Pro M. Tullio Cicerone contra Deſid. Erasmus Roterodamum, Oratio I. The other, Contra Deſid. Erasmus Roterodamum, Oratio II.

(38) Parochem abire ante profeſſionem parum pudor humanus, parum neceſſitas coarctat. — I was diſſuaded from my Deſire of quitting the Place before the Time of my Probation was expired, partly by Modeſty, partly by Neceſſity.

(39) Epiſt. Epil. v. lib. iv, pag. 1291.

(40) Admiſſit auctoritatem Prioris & Generalis. Id. in Vita ſua.

(41) Id. Epiſt. v. lib. iv, pag. 1291.

(42) See the Remark [A] of the Arminian XENOCRATES.

(43) Alegambe, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 136.

(44) De Inſtitutione Weſtphalia.

Mother, he was put under the Tuition of Guardians, who used him very ill. They forced him to embrace a Religious Life: He shewed a long time a great Aversion for it; but at last he was forced to enter among the Regular Canons in the Monastery of Stein, near Tergou. Some time after, with the Permission of his Superiors, and in the Habit of his Order, he attended the Bishop of Cambray; but finding he could not much depend upon that Prelate's Protection, he got himself sent to Paris. Having studied in that famous City, in the College of Montaigne, he went into England, where he found many People that did him Justice, and was wonderfully pleased with the Learning, and other Advantages of that Country [F]; but not seeing the Effect of those Promises by which he had been invited thither, he took a Journey to Italy. He continued above a Year at Bologna; from whence he went to Venice, where he published his Adagia; afterwards to Padua, and at last to Rome, where his Reputation was great. He might have settled there to Advantage, if the magnificent Promises of his Friends in England had not engaged him to return thither towards the Beginning of the Reign of King Henry VIII. He would have stay'd there the Remainder of his Life, if he had found what had been promised him; but being disappointed, he went over into Flan- (b) Who was af-ders, where he was made Counsellor to Charles (b) of Austria (c). I forgot to mention, terwards the Em-that he took his Degrees of Doctor in Divinity in the University of Turin. He lived peror Charles V. several Years at Basil, and published there a great many Books. He went from thence (c) Taken out of when the Mass was abolished there, and retired to Friburg in Brissgau, which he left his Life written some by himself.

Cytræus relates, That Rodolphus Agricola having read the Exercises of the Scholars of his Friend He- gius, who had made his School at Deventer very famous, found that of Erasmus the best of them all, and desired to see that young Scholar, who was then fourteen Years old (45). He was called out of the School to salute Agricola, who taking him behind the Head, and looking attentively upon him, said to him, You will be, one Day a great Man. If Erasmus had not employed some witty Strokes, and shewn a forward Judgment, Agricola would not have had the Curiosity to see him. Therefore there must have been some ingenious and nice Turns, which argued much (46) with so good a Judge as Agricola. How can a Scholar be called backward and dull-witted, when at twelve or fourteen Years of Age he gives such Proofs of his Capacity? Neither must we forget, that in those Days People did not hurry the Studies of Youth as they do at present, and that the Barbarity of the Schools was very great.

What I am going to say, after Beatus Rhenanus, will, perhaps, better confute the Tradition I am now contending against. That Author relates, that John Sintbeimus, one of the best Masters in the College of Deventer, was so well satisfied with Erasmus's Progress, that he one Day embraced and kissed him, saying, Cheer up, You will one Day attain the biggest Pitch of Learning (47). Erasmus was not then fourteen Years old. He was nine when his Mother carried him to Deventer, having fetched him from Utrecht, where he was a Singing-boy in the Cathedral. His Wit shone presently: He apprehended in an Instant whatever was taught him, and retained it well, so that he surpassed all his Companions. He had Terence and Horace at his fingers ends, so happy was his Memory, and so subtle his Wit. Ingenium Erasmii mox eluxit, quum statim quæ docebantur perciperet & fideliter retineret æquales suos omnes superans. . . . Fuit memoriâ felicissimâ, nam puer totum Terentium & Horatium memoriter complexus est (48). Terentii Comœdiæ puer non secus tenebat ac digitos suos, memoriâ namque fuit tenacissimâ; ingenio perspicacissimo (49). This we have from Rhenanus, who, without doubt, deserves more Credit than a popular Opinion, which I find can have no other Ground than these Words of Erasmus's Life: His Father sent him to School as soon as he was four Years old; he made no Progress during the first Years in those unpleasant Studies, for which he was sent to Deventer. This is intricate and hard to be understood: For what unpleasant Studies, and for which he was not born, could he be put upon at the Age of five or six Years? Was he not born to learn to read and write, to decline and conjugate in Latin? I suppose he means something else; Music, perhaps, or such other Exercise of a Singing-boy. But though he had made no Progress in that, the Tradition I confute would nevertheless remain false.

[F] He was wonderfully pleased with the Learning, and other Advantages of England. He looked upon England as his own Country by Adoption, and desired to serve it as much as his own Country by Birth. Neque tamen defeci nec unquam desecturus sum ab eximio Mecenatæ meo Archiepiscopo Cantuariensi. Verum in consilio constitutus confido futurum ut utrique satisfaciam patriæ, tum ei in qua natus sum, tum ei in quam sum cooptatus (50). I never have, nor ever shall be, unmindful of my excellent Patron, the Archbishop of Canterbury. And being situated on the Confines, I hope I shall discharge the Duties which I owe to both my Countries, to that wherein I was born, and to that into which I have been adopted. He shews in several Places that he was charmed with that Country, where he had found several illustrious Mecenatæ's and the Triumph of the Sciences. Apud Anglos triumphant bonæ literæ (51), vestra studia (52). He ingenuously confesses (53), that the flourishing State of Learning, with which he had congratulated England, began to make him somewhat jealous and uneasy. And even he pretends, that the learned Men, with which it abounded, might well raise the Envy of Italy (54). He observes (55), that this Honour was an ancient Privilege of that Nation, and informs us, that the great Lords there distinguished themselves by the Culture and Improvement of the Sciences: This is an Advantage, wherein, to this Day, the English Nobility surpass all other Nations. It is pleasant to read the Difference he makes between the Meals and Feasts of the Churchmen, and those of the Nobility. The first were only remarkable for hard drinking, Noise, scurrilous low Jests, and raging Scandal; whereas, among Noblemen, the Sciences and religious Matters furnished the Company with Table-Talk. O miras rerum humanarum vicissitudines! Olim litterarum ardor penes religionis professores erat: nunc illis magna ex parte ventri, luxui, pecuniæque vacantibus amor eruditionis ad principes profanos ac proceres aulicos demigrat. Nam quæ Schola, quod Monasterium usquam tam multos habet insigni probitate doctrinæque præditos quam vestra habet aula? An non optimo jure nos nostri pudeat? Sacerdotum ac Theologorum convivia madent vinolentia, scurrilibus opplentur jocis, tumultu parum sobrio perstreperunt, virulentis obsecrationibus scatent: & ad principum mensas modestè disputatur de iis quæ ad eruditionem ac pietatem faciunt (56). This was the great Character he gave of England, when he spoke seriously. Nor did he make a Description of it less agreeable when he took up his jovial Stile. See what he writes to Andretin, to invite him into that Country. Si Britannia dotes satis pernosces, Pause, næ tu alatis pedibus huc accurreres: & si podagra tua non fineret, Dædalum te fieri optares. Nam ut è plurimis unum quiddam attingam: sunt hic nymphæ divinis vultibus, blandæ, faciles, & quas tu tuis camenis facillè anteponas. Est præterea mos nunquam satis laudatus. Sive quo venias, omnium oculis excipieris: sive discedas aliquo, oculis dimitteris: redis, redduntur suavia: venit ad te, propinantur suavia: disceditur abs te, dividuntur basia: occurrunt alicubi, basiatu affatim; denique quocunque te moveas, suaviorum plena sunt omnia.

(45) Others, as Melchior Adam, in Vita Erasmii, say he was then but twelve Years old.

(46) Bucholcer, Ind. Chron. pag. m. 420, says, that Agricola preferred that Exercise to the rest, Propter inventionis acumen, orationis puritatem & figuræ apte cû siccis intersticiis. — For the Strength of Invention, the Purity of Stile, and the delicate mixture of Rhetorical Flowers. Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 175, and Melchior Adam, in Vita Erasmii, make use of the same Words.

(47) Complexus aliquando puerum, made ingenio Erasmii, inquit, tu ad summum eruditionis fastigium olim pervenies, Amulque oculum dedit & dimisit. Beat. Rhenan. Epist. præfixa Operib. Erasmii. Edit. 1540.

(48) Id. ibid.

(49) Id. Epist. Dedicat. Operib. Originis præfixa.

(b) Who was afterwards the Emperor Charles V.

(c) Taken out of his Life written by himself.

(50) Erasmii. Epist. xix, lib. ii.

(51) Id. lib. xvi, Epist. xix.

(52) Ibid. Epist. xx.

(53) Ibid. Epist. xxvii.

(54) Ibid. Epist. xli.

(55) Ibid. Epist. xxvii.

(56) Ibid. Epist. xxvi, lib. vi.

(d) In the Article
ROTTER-DAM.

some Years after for his Health-sake, and returned to Basil [G], where he died the 12th of July 1536. He was honourably interred, and his Memory is still very much respected there [H]. We shall see elsewhere (d) how it is honoured in his own Country, and whether Rotterdam can be denied the Honour of being his Birth-Place. It would be needless to remark, that he was one of the greatest Men that ever was in the Commonwealth of Learning; this being a Truth little contested. He had many Enemies; and among others, Julius Cæsar Scaliger, who published the most abusive Reproaches against him, tho' not that of being a Bastard [I]. The occasion of this Quarrel is not faithfully

(57) Ibid. Epist.
x. lib. v. pag.
315.

'Quæ si tu, Fauste, gustâsses semel quam sint mollis-
'cula, quam fragrantia, profecto cuperes non decen-
'nium solum, ut Solon fecit, sed ad mortem usque
'in Angliâ peregrinari (57). — If you did but suf'ficiently know, my Faustus, the Pleasures of England,
'you would haste hither with Wings at your Feet, or
'if your Gout would not permit you to do that, you 'would wish yourself a Dædalus. To mention only 'one Pleasure out of Multitudes: Here are Nymphs
'beautiful as Angels, lovely and debonaire; you would 'readily confess, that your Muses are not to be com'pared to them. Besides, we have a Custom, which 'can never be sufficiently commended. Wherever you 'go you shall be welcomed with Kisses from them all;
'and when you depart you shall be dismissed with as
'endearing a Farewell: Return, the same sweet Wel'come shall be repeated. Do they take their Leave 'of you, Kisses are interchanged at parting. Where-'ever you meet them, you feast on their rosy Lips.
'In a word, all Places you enter are full of Kisses,
'which, my Friend, had you once but tasted, how soft,
'how fragrant they are, you would not, I am positive,
'like Solon, desire to live ten Years, but till Death,
'in England.' You see he did not like English Women less than English Men.

[G] He left Friburg some Years after for his Health-sake, and returned to Basil. Mary, Queen of Hungary, and Governess of the Low Countries, invited him to come to Brabant; which made him remove to Basil, both to print there his Ecclesiastes, which he had not yet finished, and to get quit of the Remains of a long Fit of Illness. He lodged with Jerome Frobenius, his old Friend, his Design being to go by Water into the Netherlands, as soon as his Book should be printed, and his Health permit him. In the mean time he was attacked with a mortal Disease.
This is what we find in a Letter of Rhenanus (58);
but Erasmus says somewhere, that he designed, when he left Basil, to retire to Bezançon. And what is to be noted, is, that though he was at Basil with most sincere Friends, he had rather have died somewhere else;
the Reason he gives for it, is, because they were of another Persuasion. 'Si mea bene novisses, debebas
'illi respondere, me necessario valetudinis causâ reli-
'quissæ Friburgum, hoc animo, ut Ecclesiastâ absoluto
'Besontium peterem, ne non essem in ditione Cæ-
'saris, sed hic ingravescens valetudo cogit hybernare.
'Hic enim, quamquam sum apud amicos sincerissimos,
'quales Friburgi non habebam, tamen ob dogmatum
'differentiam malim alibi finire vitam. Utinam Bra-
'bantia esset vicinior (59). — If you had been well 'acquainted with the State of my Affairs, you should 'have answered him, that I was forced to leave Fri-
'burg for the sake of my Health, with a Design to go
'to Bezançon, as soon as I had finished my Ecclesiastes, 'that I might be in the Emperor's Territories; but
'my Illness increasing, I am obliged to winter here.
'Where, though I live with the sincerest Friends, and
'such as I had not at Friburg, yet, in regard of the 'Difference of Opinions, I could chuse to finish my 'Life elsewhere. I wish Brabant was nearer.'

[H] Erasmus's Memory is very much respected at Basil. Travellers do not speak less of Erasmus, when Basil falls under their Pen, than when they mention Rotterdam; so that it may be said, that he makes his Burying no less famous than his Birth-place. And indeed it must be confessed, that he made a more considerable Stay in the first of those two Towns, than in any other Place. I say, a more considerable Stay, not perhaps as to the length of Time, but at least for the Importance of his Performances. He had liked Basil extremely (60); he left it sometimes, but returned to it again: Hic illius arma, hic currus fuit (61). The Revolution that happened there in 1529, in Matters of Religion, was the only Reason that hindered him from settling there for good and all. 'Obscurum esse non potest mihi non omnia pro-

'bari quæ isti (Evangelici) faciunt, quæ si probassem
'non tanto meo tum periculo tum dispendio reli-
'quissæ civitatem cui tot annis assueveram, sed jam
'pridem ipsorum sodalitis totus adhærerem (62). —
'It is notorious, that I approved not all that those Evan'gelics do; which had I done, I should never have 'left a City wherein I had lived so many Years, and
'after suffering Losses, and running apparent Hazards,
'but should long before this have entirely embraced 'their Party.' However, they shew at Basil the House wherein he died (63); they call that Erasmus's College, wherein the Professors in Divinity read their Lectures in Winter-time, and wherein the Aca-demical Assemblies are sometimes held. Erasmus's Closet is one of the greatest Rarities of the City; wherein are to be seen, his Ring, his Seal, his Sword, his Knife, his Bodkin, his Will written with his own Hand, his Picture by Holbein, which is a Masterpiece, &c. The Magistrates bought that Closet in 1661, and gave Nine thousand Crowns for it to the Descendants of Bonifacius Amerbach, Erasmus's Heir (64).
They made a Present of it to the University, if we may credit Mr Patin (65); but another Traveller says, they received a Consideration of a thousand Crowns for it. See the Travels to Switzerland, of the Sieurs Reboulet and Labruce.

[I] Julius Scaliger published the most abusive Re-proaches against him, though not that of being a Bastard. Some People will easily imagine, that this modern Julius Cæsar knew nothing of Erasmus's Birth; for he if had, will they say, he would not have failed to have called him Son of a Whore in the two Invectives he published against him, and which he stuffed with the most bitter Reproaches and Slanders that a passionate Declaimer can muster up. Not that Erasmus had done him the least Injury: He only had blamed the excessive Prepossession of those who were then called Ciceronians, who thought that there was no Salvation for the Latin out of the Writings of Cicero (66); and had, at the same Time, observed some Spots in that Sun of the Roman Eloquence.
Thereupon Scaliger cried out, Murder, Parricide, Triple Parricide; threw all manner of Filth on Eras- mus's Head; called him a hundred times Drunkard; and maintained, that Erasmus, getting his Livelihood by being a Corrector to Aldus Manucius, overlooked many Faults when he was drunk. 'Non tu in Aldi
'Officina quæstum scilicet corrigendis exemplaribus?
'Nonne errores ii qui tum illis in libris legeban-
'tur haud tam erant librorum atramento quam tuo
'confecti vino? Haud tam illorum somnum olebant,
'quam tuam exhalabant crapulam (67)?' In a Word, his Exclamations and Invectives were no less, than those Cicero made use of at the Discovery of a horrible Conspiracy against the Commonwealth.

Sacrilegum strueret cum Catilina nefas,
Cum gener atque focer diris concurreret armis,
Mœstaque civili cæde maderet humus (68).

When Cataline the impious Storm prepar'd,
When Rome's great Lords in hostile Terrors stood;
And their griev'd Country mourn'd in Tears of Blood.

To see all the Storms Scaliger has raised, one would be apt to enquire, Whether Erasmus was not some profligate Fellow that deserved the Gallows.

Minxerit in patrios cineres; an triste bidental
Moverit incestus (69)?

Whether he piss'd upon his Father's Grave,
Or robb'd a Shrine.

(62) Erasm.
Epist. ad Fratres
German. infor-rioris.

(63) Relat.
Histo. de Charles Patin,
pag. 130.

(64) Mr Patin calls him only Legatee.

(65) Ibid. pag.
123.

(66) Farvelas had for some time the same Prepossession for the Roman History of Cæsesar;
saying, One could no more be saved out of the Roman History, than out of the Romish Church.

(67) Jul Cæsar.
Scaliger. Orat. II.

(68) Mart. lib.
ix, Epig. lxxii.

(69) Horat. de
Arte Poet. vers.
470.

(60) See his 10th
Letter of the 24th
Book.

(61) This was said by Virgil.
Æneid. lib. i.
ver. 16, about Carthage, in respect to Juno.

fully related in the Scaligerana [K]. This is somewhat surprizing; for who could

Or if he was not some Wifigoth or Ostrogoth Captain, who had resolved to exterminate all Sciences and Liberal Arts, and to fire all Libraries? Judge if one can forbear laughing, when one finds that the only Cause of that furious Passion, which breaks forth and rages in those two Declamations of Scaliger (which deserve more to be called Steluteutics than those of Gregory Nazianzen against Julian the Apostate), is, That Erasmus did combat a pernicious Superstition, which crept into the Commonwealth of Learning, and which would have laid in Irons the Study of Eloquence. But leaving that Subject, which has been so nobly, and so agreeably touched in the twelfth Dialogue of Balzac, shall we allow the Conclusion, that if Scaliger had been informed that his Adversary was a Bastard, he would have made a strange Uproar about it? I cannot admit that Conclusion, and this is the Ground I go upon.

Among Julius Cæsar Scaliger's Letters which his Son had suppressed, there is a very long one (70), wherein he justifies his first Passion by one that is perhaps greater. It is then he calls Erasmus Son of a Whore; and declares, that his not having done it before, was not because he had not heard of the Thing, but because he was not assured of it, and because he would not venture the Credit of his true Accusations, by mixing them with uncertain ones. It may be objected, That this is somewhat doubtful, and that Scaliger seems too angry in his two Invektives, not to give his Readers Reason to think, that a small Uncertainty, in such a Report, would not have hindered him from making use of it against Erasmus; that he might have secured himself a Retreat under the Cannon of common Fame, in Imitation of passionate Satirists, since he does not appear to have been so scrupulous in other Hear-says, that had no more Probability than this: That therefore what he says in relation to that, is nothing but a Trick common enough among railing Writers; who if they learn something against the Reputation of their Adversaries, after the Publication of their first Satires, claim an Honour to themselves for not having mentioned it; and turn into a rational Silence one which was altogether involuntary. I have nothing to answer to these Conjectures, save only, that it was not long after Scaliger had sent his second Oration to the Printers that he wrote the Letter I have just now quoted (71). But let us come to the Point, and the Passage in that Letter. The Author aggravates in it the Crime both of the Father and Mother of Erasmus, making her a Prostitute, and him a concubinary Priest, condemned at last to Punishment, after the repeated Canonical Censures, which he had incurred by his Relapses, had proved ineffectual. 'Ego vero mentiri? quod te putidum atque nocturnum caput, spurium in illa Oratione appellare ausus non sum? Neque enim incerti quidquam à me adferri debuit. Verum hoc erat tamen. At non constabat. Eras tunc atque etiam nunc spurius es Erasme, hoc multi mihi è commilitonibus retulerunt nostris. Verum ei rumori fidem non habui neque obiecti tibi, ne vera comper-tague cætera dicenti mihi omnia fides non habetur. Nunc populares tui, aliquot etiam vicini viri boni nobiles ex incesto natum concubitu, sordidis parentibus, altero sacrificulo, altera prostituta; qui pater tuus semel atque iterum à Pontifice castigatus, cum ex illius præceptionibus ad vetera scelera nova propensione fieret irritior exilio multatus vertit solum (72). — I a Liar? What! because in that Oration I did not adventure to call thee a Bastard, thou base-born Muckworm? I ought not indeed to advance any Uncertainties; and though this was true, I was not thoroughly assured of it. Thou wast, Erasmus, and art still, a Bastard. This I had been informed of by several of my Fellow-Soldiers, but I gave no Credit to their Report, nor did I object it to thee, least the less Credit should have been given to all the rest which was true. Now thy own Countrymen, and some of thy very Neighbours, Men of Probity and Distinction, have assured me, that thou art of incestuous Birth, of contemptible Parents, the one a beggarly Priest and the other a Whore. Thy Father, for his Incurrigibility, having been chastised by the Pope over and over, was banished.'

VOL. II.

[K] The Occasion of this Quarrel is not faithfully related in the Scaligerana.] We have seen with what Bitterness Erasmus was inveighed against: Let us now see what Joseph Scaliger says about that Quarrel. 'My Father, says he, has made an Oration against Erasmus, who since wrote, that my Father was not the Author of that Oration, quia miles erat. My Father made another, wherein he fell into a great Passion. Erasmus, knowing that he would print it, procured some of his Friends, who bought up all the Copies they could find, in order to suppress them; inasmuch, that there is none now to be had. My Father was sensible afterwards of his Folly in writing against Erasmus. . . . He had written many Epistles against Erasmus, which were printed; but I have caused them to be suppressed, and have by me the Copies which have cost me Seventy two golden Crowns, Thirty six Double Pistoles: I have ordered Jonas to burn them after my Death. My Father attacked Erasmus like a Soldier. Afterwards, when he had studied, he found that Erasmus was a great Man. Perhaps my Father had not either read, or did not understand Erasmus. . . . Pœnituit patrem adversus illum scripsisse, he saw his Fault, sed fuerat irritatus cum vocaretur ab Erasmo miles quasi per contemptum, ut Amphitheatrum (73) vocat Dominos Plebsum & Lanovium, milites per contemptum. . . . Duas Epistolas scriperat (Erasmus) ad amicos quas ipsius amici ad patrem miserunt: unam illarum curavit pater excudi in qua mirabatur suo libro militem respondisse, ut Vassatensis Plebsum tractavit tanquam miratus militem posse sacra tractare. — My Father was concerned that he had wrote against him. He saw his Error. But he was provoked at being called a Soldier, as it were, out of Contempt: As the Amphitheatrum calls Mess. Du Plebsis and Launoi Soldiers, by way of Contempt. Erasmus wrote two Letters to his Friends, who communicated them to my Father, one of which he procured to be published, wherein it was said, he was surprized to see his Book answered by a Soldier, as Vassatensis treated Du Plebsis, as tho' he had been astonished that a Soldier should write concerning Religion.' My Reader easily perceives, by the frequent Repetitions of the same Thing, that this is taken out of the Book called Scaligerana, which contains the domestic Conversations of Scaliger. The Article concerning Erasmus, which is in it, contains several honourable Things, and much truer than some of those I have just mentioned.

For, I. It is not true, that Julius Cæsar Scaliger's Provocation was founded on some Word of Contempt used by Erasmus against him, since his first Oration against the Ciceronianus, full of passionate Invektives, was composed before Erasmus had either done or spoke any thing against him; and perhaps, even before he had heard so much as his Name mentioned (74). Therefore Scaliger's Passion could not proceed from any Injury he had received from Erasmus, unless with relation to most to the second Writing. II. It does not appear by that second Writing, either that Erasmus called Julius Cæsar Scaliger a Soldier, or that the latter took it as an Affront. That would not have been a Provocation to that Prince of Verona; for he valued himself upon having been in the Wars, and nothing could be more honourable to him, than to pass for a Soldier and an Author at the same time. He himself had boasted, in an insulting manner, that though he was a young Man and a Soldier, he had taught his Adversary his Lesson about an Aphorism of Hippocrates. 'Hem Erasme quanto pudore tuo, quanto gloriæ tuæ periculo ab juvene homine, à rudi Oratore, à non Oratore, à MILITE . . . docearis (75). — What Shame, what Reproach, O Erasmus, to thy Fame, to be corrected by a young Man, by a raw undisciplined Orator, by a SOLDIER.' But whatever Notion he had about it, it is certain that there is no Proof that Erasmus provoked him by calling him a Soldier.

I have two very good Reasons for it: The first, That in the second Oration of Scaliger, we find no Complaint or Reply that has any Relation to that Reproach; and that, on the contrary, we find in it some Passages (76) wherein the Author obviates the Objections, which he thinks his Confession of having in learned,

(70) It is the 12th in the Edition of Toulouze. He wrote it to Arnould Ferron, who did not approve his publishing of many Invektives against Erasmus.

(71) See his Letters, pag. 35.

(72) Jul. Cæsar Scaliger, Epist. xv, pag. 45.

(73) He means of Book of the Jesuit Scribanus, intitled, Amphitheatrum Honoris.

(74) We see in Scaliger's second Oration, pag. 32, that Erasmus desired a Dutchman to enquire what sort of a Man Scaliger was.

(75) Oat. 17.

(76) Pag. 16, 17, 42, Edit. Tholof. 1620.

could be better acquainted with the Truth of this Passage, than the Son of the Aggressor? Erasmus was sensibly touched with that Invektive, and endeavoured to suppress the printed Copies of it [L]. He mistook for some Time the true learned, among Military Men, certain Passages he has published to blast Erasmus's Reputation, would furnish his Adversary with. This will be better understood, if it be remembered, That Erasmus had given it out, that Scaliger was not the Author of the Oration published under his Name. Scaliger, who was highly offended at it, confused that Pretence of Erasmus; and because he feared he had fortified it, by confessing he had born Arms, as if a Man, who had not passed all his Life-time in his Closet, was not capable of being an Orator, he obviated that Objection; which proves invincibly that Erasmus had not made use of it. My other Proof is taken out of Erasmus's own Letter, which Scaliger published at the Head of his second Oration, and which his Son mentions, as we have seen before. The two Friends, to whom Erasmus had written it, jointly communicated it to Scaliger, without adding to it any Word of Civility or Advice. In this Letter Erasmus says, that he had it from very good Hands, that the Oration Scaliger had published against him, was not Scaliger's Performance (77); but he does not say a Word of what Joseph Scaliger attributes to him, That he wondered a Soldier had answered his Book.

How can we, after this, depend upon what your learned Men tell us in their Chimney Corners. Here is one of the first Rate, who at every Turn repeats, concerning his Father, two or three Falsities, which public and original Pieces evidently confute. He pretends that Erasmus denied Scaliger to have been the Author of the Oration, because Scaliger was a Soldier: He pretends that thereby Erasmus did very much provoke Scaliger: He pretends that Erasmus wondered a Soldier could answer him: And lastly, he pretends that this his Wonder is expressed in a Letter, which Scaliger's Father caused to be printed. All which is positively false; though, upon his single Testimony, given out as Truth by all other Authors, particularly by Sir Thomas Pope Blount, in his laborious and most useful Collection, intitled, Censura celebriorum Autorum (78), and by Magirus, in his Eponymologium (79), &c. The Excuses Joseph Scaliger alleges, that his Father attacked Erasmus as a Soldier, and before he had studied, and that perhaps he neither had read nor understood Erasmus, seem to be frivolous: For the Oration against the Ciceronianus was printed in 1531; by which Time the Author was Forty seven Years old, had studied much, was acquainted with the Writings of his Adversary, and had a great deal of Erudition. He had studied with marvellous Application while he bore Arms, and it was then a pretty long while since he had wholly dedicated himself to Learning, as the Author of the Scaligerana informs us himself (80). What he says of the Suppression of his Father's Letters against Erasmus, and which very exact Writers (81) have understood of the two Orations, (because he would, indeed, have likewise been at the Expence of suppressing the Orations, if he had not been persuaded that they had already disappeared, and been bought up) is generous, and ought to be accounted true; though his Intention was defeated, by the Care Mr de Mauvais took to cause the Orations and Letters in question to be printed at Toulouse in 1620. For the rest, it is not in Conversation only that Scaliger committed these Faults: You will find a good part of them in his Answer to Scippius (82), that is, in a most elaborate Piece, well knowing he had to do with the most formidable Critic in the World.

I wish some Body would inform us where, when, and by whose Care, the Edition Joseph Scaliger suppressed was made. The Sorrow he speaks of, agrees very well with a Letter his Father wrote to Omphalius (83), and with the Verses he composed on the Death of Erasmus, and which begin with Tunc etiam moreris: Though not with some Passages of his Books. (84) wherein he treats him very rudely, and that too sometimes upon a false Supposition.

But after all, might not that great Uneasiness, at the Reproach of being a Soldier, be no more than a romantic Fiction that has no Foundation in History?

For my Part, I find no other Original of it but a Letter (85), wherein Julius Caesar Scaliger relates, That during the Contests which arose at Paris, about the Licence to print his first Oration, Erasmus's Friends found means to get a Copy of it, and to transmit it to him secretly; and that having perused it, he con-jured them, by all that was most sacred to them, to oppose the printing of it, otherwise the Glory he had acquired with so much Labour, which was common to them with him, would be blasted and ruined by a unknown young Man, and a foreign Soldier. Unius juvenis ignoti militis peregrini opera. It is therefore certain at least that Scaliger was informed, that Erasmus, writing to his Friends, called him a Soldier; but it is false that Scaliger was the more exasperated by it. What increased his Indignation, was only his being despised by Erasmus, who did not vouchsafe to answer him, and by whom he was treated as a voluntary Cuckold, with relation to the Oration, of which he knew himself to be the true Father. This contempt was the most cruel method of Revenge, that Erasmus could put in practice. He had reckoned upon the Honour of being Erasmus's Antagonist, and thereby to get a great Name in the Commonwealth of Learning; but he was disappointed at this Time, and obliged to seek out another Door to the Palace of Fame. Who could forbear being enraged at it? Julius Scaliger made an Oration thereupon: 'Est mihi perfecta oratio qua rutiliciti quorundam respondebam qui ita discurrant, Erasmus a scribendo manum abstinuisse qui me indignum putaret quicum loqueretur' (86). 'I have wrote an Oration in answer to certain abusive People, who have given it out that Erasmus had laid down his Pen, as thinking me below his Notice.'

[L] Erasmus was sensibly touched with Scaliger's Invektive and endeavoured to suppress the printed Copies. Those who have printed Erasmus's Life in Holland, with several of his Letters not till then published, own (87), that he caused his Emisaries to collect and burn all the Copies of the second Oration, which Scaliger had published against him at Paris; inasmuch, say they, that it is now no where to be found. This last Circumstance was false, when the Edition I make use of was printed; for it was printed in 1642, and the two Orations of Scaliger had been reprinted at Toulouse in 1620, or 1621. Whatever it be, they confirm what we find in the Scaligerana, touching Erasmus's Design against the second Oration of Scaliger's in which Design he was so successful, that some Years after it was not to be found with any of the Schoolmasters in Paris. 'Curavi conquiri Parisiis apud omnes Pedantes, nemo habet: per emisarios 7. aut 8. curavit omnia exemplaria conquiri & comburi' (88). 'I caused an enquiry to be made for it amongst all the Schoolmasters of Paris, but to no Effect, he having by seven or eight Emisaries collected and destroyed them all.' This ought to persuade us of the Truth of what Scaliger, the Father, says in a Letter to Arnoul Ferron (89), That a Dutchman, by Erasmus's Instigation, burnt, wherever he came, as many Copies as he could recover of his first Oration, either buying or borrowing them. By this it appears, that both the Orations had been exposed to near the same Fate. Why then does Joseph Scaliger, and those who have published Erasmus's Life, mention this thorough search, and burning of the printed Copies, with relation only to the second Oration? I believe Erasmus's Emisaries were more diligent against the latter, than against the other, and that this is the Reason why the first only was reprinted at Cologne in 1600; for if those that published it could have found the second, they would infallibly have printed them both together. Joseph Scaliger tells us, That the first Oration was printed by the Jesuits, with his Epistle concerning his Father's Life, curtailed where they thought fit. I do not know whether he means the Cologne Edition of 1600, which, according to Draudius (90), and the Catalogue of Thuanus's Library (91), contains no other Additions than some Divine Poems of Julius Caesar Scaliger; or whether he speaks of another. In this last

(77) Julius Scaliger Lutetiae edit in me orationem impudentissimam mendaciam ac furiosam convitiis differtam, cujus tamen ipsum non esse autorem multis ac certis argumentis compertum habeo. Sed hoc calcamentum ab alio mihi non ignoto confutum ille inquit. Note, That instead of inquit, it should be read inquit.

(78) Printed at London, 1690, in Folio.

(79) Printed at Frankfurt, and at Leipzig, 1687, in 4to. L'Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans, qui a été donnée en Account of it in December, 1688.

(80) Epistola, de Vetus. Gentis Scaligeræ, & Jul. Cæs. Scalig. Vita.

(81) Baillet, Jugem des Scav. Tom. II, pag. 13, & Tom. III, pag. 134. Beauval. Hist. des Ouvrages des Scavans, ubi supra, pag. 339.

(82) I shall quote the Passage in the Remarks [L] and [M].

(83) It is the 17th in the Toulouse Edition. The Author shews in it his Inclination to be reconciled with Erasmus.

(84) Poëtic lib. iii, cap. lxxxiii, & lib. iv, cap. i. Not. in Aristot. Hist. Animal. lib. iv, cap. viii. (Vide Voßium, de Idol. lib. iv, cap. 13.) Exercit. in Cardan. 239, & alibi, ut patet ex indice, voce Erasmus.

(85) It is the 12th in the Toulouse Edition.

(86) Epist. xiii, pag. m. 30, 31.

(87) In a little Memorandum inserted in the 32d Page of the Leiden Edition, 1642.

(88) Scaligerana, pag. 74.

(89) It is the 12th in the Toulouse Edition.

(90) Biblioth. Classica, pag. 1327, 1444, Edit. 1625.

(91) Part II, pag. 367.

true Author [M], and, with extream Confidence, fathered it upon another, which deserves last Case it would appear, that they had succeeded better in the suppressing the second Oration, than in suppressing the first.

This is all I could say upon this Matter in my Project of this Dictionary: I have at present something to add to it, by the Favour of the illustrious Abbot (92), who sent me some Remarks of Monsieur de la Monnoie. I have learned thereby, that Erasmus could not procure the Copies of the second Oration of Scaliger to be suppressed; for he was dead when it came out: You will see the Proof of it in the following Words (93).

The first Declaration of Julius Scaliger against Erasmus, sent to Paris in 1529, was printed there in 8vo, by Peter Vidoué, with a Licence of Lieutenant Morin, dated the first of September 1531. The second, though finished by the Twenty fifth of September 1535, was not printed by the same Vidoué till 1537. There is before it a Letter from Hubert Sufanneau (94), to Hubert de Pradine, wherein he mentions that second Piece of Scaliger against Erasmus, about which he discoursed with Scaliger himself at Agen. Inter colloquendum, says he, de oratione sua adversus Erasmus secunda percunctatus est. Legisse dixi sed manu scriptam. Ibi illi sub-ratus: O amici, inquit, si uquam ulli amici sunt, jam pridem exisse oportuit, ante complures menses opusculum in hoc Lutetiam missum, & huc ad me propter viam perlongam, & non satis tutam raro admodum nuncii adferuntur. Proinde te per Musas, Sufannee, rogo, atque etiam multis precibus obsecro, si qui sunt Lutetiae tua mandata curaturi, commendatione editionis maturitatem adjuva.

During the Conversation, says he, he enquired about his second Oration against Erasmus: I said I only had read it in Manuscript. At which with some Emotion, O Friends, says he, if there be any such things as Friends! That discourse ought, before this Time, to have appeared in Public, being sent to Paris some Months ago to that purpose; by reason of the distance, and danger of the way, I seldom get any Information from thence. Wherefore, O my Friends, I most earnestly, and by the respect you have for Learning, entreat you: If you have any Correspondent at Paris on whom you can rely, to use your Interest with him to forward the Impression. After which, Sufanneau recommends to his Friend to forward that Edition, and to chuse P. Vidoué for the Printer. The Letter is from Bourdeaux the fifth of June, without the date of the Year. It is certain it cannot be 1535, since Erasmus's Letter ad Merbolum & Laurentiam, to which that second Inveictive serves for an Answer, was not delivered to Scaliger till the twelfth of September of that Year, as he tells us himself in the Epistle Dedicatory. It must therefore of necessity be the Year 1536. The Care of Sufanneau and his Friend was effectual; the Piece did probably come out towards the end of the same Year, though the Bookseller, to preserve the longer the Grace of Novelty to the Edition, caused the Date of the following Year to be put to it in these Words: Venit Lutetiae ex regione gymnastii Remensis, apud P. Vidouéum, MDXXXVII. This Oration follows the first; and the Copies of it are not so scarce, but that several may be found still: I have one of them myself, and I remember I have seen above four others. The Case being thus, to speak henceforward with exactness, we must say, that Erasmus did no other ways contribute to the burning of the Copies of the second Oration, than because out of Respect to him, and even, perhaps, at his Desire, his Partizans threw into the Flames all the Copies they could find (95). For we must remember, that Erasmus was not ignorant that Scaliger had written another Inveictive: Scaliger rursus evomuit nescio quid libelli in me quemadmodum & Petrus Curisus. Neutrum vidi. — Scaliger has again discharged his Malice against me in print, as also Peter Curisus. But I have seen neither of their Productions. Thus he speaks in a Letter dated the eleventh of March 1536 (96). I suppose his Emisaries acquainted him that the second Oration was in the Press, as soon as the Manuscript was come to Paris: Wherefore he spoke of that Piece the eleventh of March 1536, as if it had already been printed; not knowing how negligent Scaliger's Friends, or the Booksellers, had been about the Impression (97). We shall see presently that his Son was little acquainted with the Circumstances of this famous Quarrel.

Let us first lay down these two Things. I. That a Letter of Erasmus, written the eighteenth of March 1535, and communicated to Scaliger the twelfth of September of the same Year, determined the latter to compose a second Oration against the former, which was finished before the 25th of the same Month (98).

II. That in the Month of June 1536, that second Oration was not yet printed (99), though the Author thought it had been published some Months before (100). We must conclude from all this, that Julius Caesar Scaliger's Son is mistaken, when he says, I. That Erasmus caused the Copies of the second Oration to be burnt. II. That after that Execution he wrote a Letter, wherein, by way of Contempt, he called his Adversary a Soldier, and thereby accused him of being incapable of composing such Orations. III. That Scaliger, being acquainted with it, wrote a third Oration, the Edition of which was interrupted by Erasmus's Death. IV. That Erasmus being adverted of that third Oration wrote in 1535 (101), that Scaliger threatened him with some Book. Every Body may find out, without my help, the Anachronisms and other Mistakes of Joseph Scaliger: wherefore I content myself to set down his own Words. Erasmus, qui ubique gentium ἀτακτως habuit, in quibus etiam mercenarios non paucos, tantum abest, ut aliter, quam Scaligerum vocaverit, ut quia monitus erat eum fere semper militasse, hoc solo argumento negare ausus sit eum auctorem fuisse orationis, quam pro Cicerone adversus illum scripsit; idque testatus est Epistola, quam ad amicos duos scripsit. Quod coegit Julium aliam orationem scribere, qua se prioris auctorem asserit; quae una cum epistola illa Lutetiae apud Vidoveum edita est. Sed Erasmus homo vaferrimus per emissarios suos omnia exemplaria magnis sumptibus conquesta flammis aboleri curavit. Unum exemplar Josephus reliquit Aginni. Neque ullum praeter illud postea nancisci, aut videre potuit. Tanta fuit emissariorum Erasmi diligentia. Quam autem postea in alia Epistola eum per contumeliam militem vocaret, & hoc solo alii vellet persuadere tantum eruditionis illi non fuisse, ut ejusmodi orationes meditari potuisset, ob eam causam Julius ad tertiam orationem commentandam animum appulit, cujus editionem mors Erasmi interpellavit: & cum reliquis operibus ejus in direptione suppellectilis primo bello civili perierit. De hac tertia oratione monitus ab emissariis ita scribit ab Damianum a Goes, anno MDXXXV. Ajunt Doletum quendam in me scribere. Minitatur nescio quid & Julius Scaliger (102).

Erasmus, who had his Emisseries in all Parts, and some that he kept in regular Pay, is so far from treating Scaliger otherwise than he had called him, that having heard he had been much in the Army, from that sole Argument he dared deny him to have been the Author of that Oration, which he had wrote against him in defense of Cicero, as his Letter to his Friends testifies; which obliged my Father to write another Oration, wherein he asserts that he was Author of the former; which together with that Letter was published at Paris by Vidoué. But Erasmus, a crafty Man, by his Emisseries, caused all the Copies to be bought up at an extravagant Price, and destroyed them in the Flames. One Copy was left by Joseph Scaliger at Agen, and so great was the Industry of the Emisseries, that not one besides that could afterwards be found. Having in another Epistle again called him a Soldier by way of Contempt, and by this one reason endeavoured to persuade others, that he had not so much Learning as was requisite for the composing such Orations; Julius Scaliger set himself about making a Third, the publishing of which was prevented by the Death of Erasmus, and perished with the rest of his Works, when his House was plundered in the first Civil War. Erasmus being informed by his Emisseries of this third Oration, he writes thus to Damian de Goes in the Year MDXXXV. It is said that one Doletus has wrote something against me, and that Scaliger threatens me with something. I know not what to think of the Menace Erasmus mentions in his Letter to Damianus de Goes; for Julius Caesar Scaliger protests, he thought no more of that

(97) See, above, in Citat. (94) the Page of Sufanneau's Letter.

(98) See the Epistle Dedicatory to the second Oration.

(99) See, above, Sufanneau's Letter.

(100) Earn . . . mueri nisi P. Rubrio . . . Spe roque esse Lutetiam in vulgus editam. Scalig. Epist. xiv. pag. 35. It has no Date, but the first of Jan. 1536 is mentioned in it, according to the present way of reckoning.

(101) That Letter is the 6th of the 30th Book.

(102) Confutat. Fabulae Bordonum, pag. 278 & seq.

(92) The Abbot Nicolle. See the Rem. [B] of the Article BALBUS BALBI, at the third Paragraph.

(93) They are taken out of the Memoir of Mr. de la Monnoie.

(94) La Croix du Maine calls him Hubert Sufan, but Sufanneau was his true Name. His Letter to Hubert de Pradine has not been printed.

(95) It is certain, that both the Orations were so served. Nostorum orationum exulta exemplaria. Jul. Caesar. Scalig. Epist. xvi. pag. 55.

(96) It is the 5th of the 27th Book, pag. 1566.

serves to be observed. Those who have denied, that they had a Design at Rome to make him a Cardinal, have been in the wrong [N]. The Report that was current at Paris, that

(103) Coactus feci ut de interio descenderem in certamen quod à me jam decertatum esset. Epist. Dedicat. II, Orot. Veterum inimicitiarum memoriam quæ à me sane depositæ essent renovarent. Epist. 14, pag. 34.

(104) Epist. ad Goclenium edita cum Vita Erasmi, pag. m. 326. It is the 16th of the 30th Book in the London Edition.

(105) He offers, in the second Oration, to produce the Original written with his own Hand, full of Rasures, &c.

(106) Erasmus, Epist. lxx, lib. xxx, pag. 1059, dated the second of Sept. 1535.

(107) See Jul. Cæsar. Scalig. Epist. xiv, pag. 35.

(108) Confutat. Fabulæ Burdonum, pag. 280.

(109) In Iconibus.

(110) Istoria de Poët. Græc. pag. 150.

(111) Erasmus, Epist. iii, & iv, lib. xxiii.

(112) Sentimenta d' Erasme, pag. 22, 23.

that Quarrel (103), when, on the twelfth of September 1535, he received the Letter Erasmus had written to Marbelius and John Laurentia. Now Erasmus's Letter to Damianus de Goes, is dated the Twenty first of May 1535.

[M] He mistook for some Time the true Author.] Let us lay a Word of the Confidence with which Erasmus affirmed, that Scaliger had only lent his Name to the first of these two Orations. I know it, said he, by several certain Proofs, multis ac certis argumentis compertum habeo. He had affirmed in other Letters (104), that Alexander was the true Author, and that he was as sure or it as of his own Existence; but that he thought fit to dissemble it, not to render him more furious by the Discovery of the Cheat. 'Julii Scaligeri libellum tam scio illius (Aleandri) esse quam scio me vivere. Id tamen dissimulandum est ne magis insaniam prodito fucio.' He repeats the same thing, and fortifies it with Reasons in the Fifty eighth Letter of the thirtieth Book. However, it was most true, that no other but Julius Cæsar Scaliger had composed that Oration (105). From whence it appears, that the most learned are mistaken in the fathering Books upon such and such Authors; and if Erasmus, who was all Meekness and Modesty, has pronounced a false Judgment with so much Confidence in a Case of this Nature, we must give no manner of Credit to what some fierce, haughty, passionate, opinionated, and fanatic Spirits may declaim, with a magisterial Tone, upon the like occasion. Erasmus was guilty of the same Mistake with respect to another Book; for he fathered upon Alexander a Piece, which had been published with the Name of Stephen Dolet. 'Alexander denuo emisit librum fuciosum sub nomine Doleti (106).' However, it was not true that Alexander was the Author of it: For that Book was really composed by him, whose Name was in the Title Page (107). This Fault of Erasmus is more pardonable, than that which Joseph Scaliger has committed in these Words: 'Nihil Erasmus tam serio affectavit quam ex militia ejus (Julii Scaligeri) eum literarum imperitum probare, quum tamen aliter se sentire apud amicos dissimulare non potuerit: quod quadam ad Conradum Goclenium epistola testatur: 'Julii, inquit, Scaligeri libellum tam scio illius esse, quam scio me vivere. Id tamen dissimulandum est, ne magis insaniam prodito fucio. Vides credidisse, & dissimulasse, ex quo conscientiam hominis æstimare licet (108). — Erasmus affected nothing so much, as, from his (Julius Scaliger's) having been in the Army, to prove that he was no Scholar, though he could not dissemble a quite contrary Opinion amongst his Friends, a proof of which may be found in his Letter to Conrad Goclenius. I know, says he, the Libel of Scaliger to be his as well as that I live; but the Mask is not to be thrown off, lest I should thereby exasperate him the more. You see he knew it, yet pretended he did not; whence you may form an Opinion of his Honesty.' It is most certain, that by his (illius) we must understand Alexander, and that therefore, after having committed that Mistake, there was no Reason to charge the Fraud upon Erasmus.

[N] They who have denied, that they had a Design at Rome to make him a Cardinal, have been in the wrong.] Boissard (109) affirms, that it was reported that Erasmus had refused the Cardinalship, and that the other Ecclesiastics had looked upon as a Miracle the Refusal of a Dignity so much sought after. Lorenzo Crafft (110) pretends, that this was a Story, more to be laughed at than credited: But he exposed himself to the Laughter of his Readers, since it was Erasmus's own Fault, if he was not made a Cardinal. He would undoubtedly have attained that Dignity under Pope Hadrian VI, if he had gone to Rome, to make his Court to him, as he was powerfully solicited to do by that Pope himself, who was his Countryman, his Friend and School-fellow (111). 'He excused his not undertaking that Journey, both because of his great Infirmities, and principally to stop the Mouth of his Enemies, who would report every where that he was gone a Hunting after the Dignities of the Church (112).' But under Pope Paul III, the thing went further: The Cardinalship was a ripe

Fruit for Erasmus, who might have gathered it if he had but reached his Hand. It is what he acquaints us with himself. 'Quum itauisset (Paulus III.) in futuram Synodum aliquot eruditos in Cardinalium ordinem allegere, propositum est & de Erasmo. Sed objiciebantur impedimenta, valetudo ad obeunda munia inutilis, ac census tenuis. Aiunt enim esse Senatusconsultum quo submoventur ab ea dignitate quibus annui redditus sunt infra tria ducatorum millia. Nunc hoc agunt ut me onerent præposituris, ut hinc jussu censu parato doner purpureo galero (113). — Paul III designing to advance in the succeeding Synod some learned Men to the Dignity of Cardinals: a Proposal was made in favour of Erasmus. But the ill state of his Health, and the narrowness of his Circumstances, were made Objections; for it is said there is a Decree, whereby those are secluded whose yearly income does not amount to Three thousand Ducats. Now they intend to load me with Benefices, that my Income may thereby be sufficiently large to qualify me for receiving the Hat.' He affirms in the same Letter, that he had a Friend at Rome, who stirred very much in that Affair, although he had often written to him, that he had no Thoughts of Benefices or Pensions, being sensible of his approaching End. We find the same thing in another Letter (114), with a more express Declaration of Erasmus's Reluctance. 'Paulo III visum est . . . itaque nunc Magno ambitu agitur ut me præposituris onerent, reclamantem, ac manibus pedibque reculantem, ac perpetuo etiam recusaturum. — It was the Intention of Paul III: for which reason they now earnestly press me to accept of Benefices, not only against my Inclination, but against an unchangeable Resolution.' Rhenanus speaks not only of this Design of Paul III, but says also, that That Pope bestowed the Provostship of Deventer upon Erasmus, and desired the Queen of Hungary, Governors of the Low-Countries, to secure the Possession of it to him; but Erasmus, not caring for that Benefice, did not send the Pope's Letter to that Princess (115). Mr Joly (116) quotes the Testimony of Peter Bembo, and that of Mr de la Rochebeaucourt, Bishop of Poitiers, and several Letters of Erasmus (117), to confirm what I have said, and which Lorenzo Crafft pretended to be ridiculous. Another Writer (118) quotes two or three Letters on the same subject, which do not say, as he pretends, 'That Erasmus was designed the first, and nominated to fill the eminent Dignity of Cardinal, and that Lewis XI, a Doctor of Louvain, who was his Friend, and since a Bishop, was sent to him by Pope Paul III, with Letters of Credence, which assured him of it.' Nevertheless, the thing is true, so far as it has been proved before by Erasmus's own Words. I do not find this Lewis XI in the Letters quoted (119), but only one Lewis Berus, a Canon of Basil (120), who had delivered to the Pope a Letter from Erasmus, and whom the Pope sent back to Erasmus, to be more fully informed of his Intentions. A Man must be very penetrating, to find there an Express sent to Erasmus by Paul III, to acquaint him that he was the first that was nominated to be a Cardinal. If he had received any such Message, he would have mentioned it in the two Letters I have quoted; for that had been more positive, than to say, that they endeavoured to remove one of the Obstacles to his Promotion, by seeking for him Benefices, and Supplies, as for a poor Cardinal. I am very much mistaken, if Mr Richard has not taken these Words, He was designed the first, and nominated, &c. out of a Letter he does not quote: It is the Sixty eighth of the thirtieth Book, wherein Erasmus relates, that Paul III, having charged two Cardinals to exhort the learned Men of Germany to succour Religion, one of these Cardinals had resolved to name Erasmus the first. But how vastly distant this is from a Nomination to the Cardinalship, notified by an Express from the Pope! Nothing is more ordinary, than to stretch the Sense of what one quotes; the Reason of which is, that That great Inconvenience is seldom to be avoided, without a diligent Application, which reduces an Author to compose but few Pages in a Day.

We may now judge whether Mr Patin, the Son, has hit upon the right Cause, when he has said, 'That if (113) Erasmus, Epist. xxviii, lib. xxvii.

(114) The 10th of the 27th Book.

(115) Epist. præfixa Operi Erasmi.

(116) Avis pour l'Institution des Evêques, pag. 99.

(117) Some of the Letters he quotes do not mention the thing in Question.

(118) J. Richard, Prior of Beaulieu Ste Avoise, pag. 57, of the Sentimens d'Erasme.

(119) The Index of Erasmus's Letters, in the London Edition, which is very exact, and very useful, does not mention any Lewis XI.

(120) Epist. xxvii, lib. xxvii.

that they were printing a new Edition of his Works at Rotterdam was ill grounded [O]. They promised his Life [P]; but that Promise has not yet been accomplished. Of all his Works, those that have been printed ofteneft are his Colloquies [Q], and his Praise of Folly it had not been for the untimely Death of the Pope, Erasmus had been raised to the first Honours of the Church (121). Without doubt he means Hadrian VI. Now we see, that Erasmus's want of Ambition, not the short Life of that Pope, hindered him from being a Cardinal.

[O] The report . . . that they were about a new Edition of his Works at Rotterdam was ill grounded. It is Guy Patin who tells us, that this Report was current at Paris. 'I hear, says he (122), that those of Rotterdam, out of the Respect they have for the Memory of him who has been the Honour of their Country, cause, at their own Expence, all the Works of Erasmus to be new printed. That Piece of News rejoices me very much. There is still some Virtue in the World, and some honest, generous, Persons. I pray God it may be true.'

[P] They promised his Life. Let us hear Mr Patin again. 'We have here an honest Man who is writing the Life of honest Erasmus, who has been a great and excellent Person, and died at Basil the twelfth of July, 1536. He has had the Misfortune not to please the Monks; but this is common to him, with so many honest Men, that I think no body ought to be concerned at it (123). He spoke of the same Work a Year after: 'We have here a very learned Man of Quality and Probity, who has almost finished the Life of Erasmus; and thereby you see, that there are still some honest Men in the World who cherish Virtue. It is now two hundred Years since he was at Nure, for he was born in the Year 1467; and, in my Opinion, next to St Austin and St Thomas Aquinas, he has been the greatest Wit among the Christians, whatever the Monks can say to the contrary, who are his Enemies, because he has exposed them, and made them too well known to the World (124).'

Several good Reasons induce me to believe, that the Life Mr Patin speaks of is not that which Mr Mercier, Sub-Principal of the College of Navarre, has published at Paris, with Erasmus's Colloquies commented upon, and castrated. I could be easily persuaded that it is that of which Mr Battier, a learned Man of Basil in Switzerland, spoke to Mr Colomies in 1668 (125). He told him, That Mr Joly, a Canon of Notre-Dame in Paris, was writing Erasmus's Life; for which Purpose he had read over Seven times all the Works of that great Man. Here is then a Life of Erasmus, to be inserted in Mr Almeloveen's Bibliotheca promissa & latens (126). The Life of Erasmus, promised by Mallincroft (127). Dean of Munster, is also a Piece for the same Bibliothèque. That Dean had written the Life of Erasmus in a Chronological Order; which is an excellent Method, and which clears a thousand Difficulties; as may be seen in the Life of Cicero, composed by Francis Fabricius. It were to be wished, that the Life of Erasmus might be drawn up after that Model, and that the first Edition of all his Works should be exactly set down in it; for the most learned are sometimes mistaken about it (128). Verbeiden gave a great Idea of a Manuscript preserved as a Relic by Otto Weickman of Nimwegen, and containing Erasmus's Life written with Erasmus's own Hand. It is that which Merula published five Years after (129). A very laborious and exact Author (130) has placed among the Writers of the Life of Erasmus, Merula and Scriverius, who have been no more than the Editors of some Pieces composed by others; and yet he has forgot to mention among them Bentus Rhenanus, who has actually composed a fine Discourse on the Life of that illustrious Person. That little Fault is only in the tenth Index, for the Body of the Book is right in that Particular.

There is a Report (131), That Mr Joly has delivered his Life of Erasmus into the Hands of the Examiners of Books, in order to get their Approbation, and obtain afterwards a Licence to print it. Let us wish that News may prove true; and that those Gentlemen may not be so hard with Mr Joly, as they are with so many Writers who complain, that their Manuscripts are detained too long, and that many things are struck out of them. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, the third Article of February, 1685.

[Q] Of all his Works his Colloquies have been ofteneft printed. Messieurs Hofman and Moreri say, that a little after the Edition which Erasmus caused to be made of his Colloquies at Basil, being sixty Years old, Colineus, who reprinted them at Paris, in 1527, printed 24000 Copies of them; which, according to Mr Hofman, were all sold. A Passage so singular as that required an Account somewhat better circumstantiated; so that those two Gentlemen would hardly clear themselves in this Place of a Fault of Omission. They ought to have acquainted us, that That Bookfeller made use of a Stratagem to increase the Sale; which however he might have expected should be great, because his Edition was very fair, and the Volume very small. His Stratagem was to raise a Report, that That Book would be prohibited: 'Colineus quidam excuderat, ut aiunt, ad 24 millia Colloquiorum in modum enchiridii, sed eleganter. Id fecerat non studio mei, sed amore quæstus. Quid multis? nihil erat in manibus præter Colloquia. Præcesserat nescio quis rumor, fore à typographo studiose sparsus, fore ut hoc opus interdiceretur, ea res acuit emptorum aviditatem. Itaque Bedda, &c

(132). — One Colineus, as it is reported, printed off Twenty four thousand copies of the Colloquies, in form of a Manual, but very neatly. This he did not out of Respect for me, but for the sake of Lucre. In short, the Colloquies were universally read. A rumour was industriously spread, perhaps by the contrivance of the Bookfeller, that this Work would be prohibited. This gave an Edge to the Curiosity of the Buyers. Whereupon, &c. The Apprehension People had of it made every Body buy it betimes; which quick Sale caused Bedda, Erasmus's declared Enemy, to solicit the Interdiction of his Colloquies; which he obtained: But in all Probability this Prohibition did Colineus more good than harm. We see thereby, that the Tricks, like that which the Author of La Religion des Hollandois ascribes to a Bookfeller of Amsterdam, with respect to a Socinian Book, did not begin in Holland. He pretends, that That Book was sentenced to be burnt at the Bookfeller's request, in order to raise the Price of it. It was not this sort of Cheats of which Erasmus complained most; for they played him Tricks of a far greater Consequence. They published with his Name some Books, of which he was not the Author (132*); they sold to Bookfellers some Manuscripts he had dictated only for domestic Uses: And all this was done for Lucre-sake, because it was presumed his Name alone would sell off a bad Book. It was in this manner his Colloquies were first published (133). He never had by him either the Original or a Copy; but one Holotius, having got a Manuscript Copy of it, sold it for a good Sum of Money to Frabenius, who caused it to be printed a long time before the Year 1522 (134). The Author was very much displeased at it; but not being able to suppress the Book, endeavoured to put it in a better Condition, by Additions done in haste: 'Colloquia me invito atque etiam irato prodierunt. Quibus adjecti quædam in gratiam typographi, levi sane brachio, ut qui uno die interdum tria absolverim colloquia (135). — The Colloquies were published without either my Knowledge or Consent: To which I made some Additions for the sake of the Printer; but in too great a hurry, finishing sometimes three Colloquies in one day.' You may see in the thirty third, and in the forty second Letter of the twenty first Book, his Justification concerning his Colloquies; of the usefulness of which he also writ a Letter worth the Perusal, and which is generally printed at the End of that Book. But above all, it is necessary to read the Memorial he sent to the Divines of Louvain, wherein, among other things, he represents, that one ought to consider well what Persons he brings upon the Stage (136): For the Rules of Dialogue requiring, that each of the Interlocutors speak with the Character of the Author, but conformably to his Character, nothing could be more unjust than to father upon Authors what they put in the Mouths of the Persons they bring in: Otherwise

9 T one

(121) Charles Patin, Relat. Hist. pag. 129.

(122) Tom. I, pag. 116, dated Aug. 15, 1657.

(123) Tom. III, Letter CDLVIII, dated Sept. 2, 1667.

(124) Tom. III, Letter CDLXXXVI, dated Sept. 23, 1668.

(125) Colomies, Biblioth. choisie, pag. 139.

(126) It is a Catalogue of Books that have been promised the Public, and have not been printed. It was printed at Tergou, in 1692. A German named Rudolphus Martinus Meulubruus, published in 1690, Accessiones to that Bibliothèque promissa & latens. See the Acta of Leipzig, 1699, pag. 359.

(127) In Præfati. Traditus de Arte Typographica.

(128) See Remark [R].

(129) That Life of Erasmus contains an Advertisement to the Reader, in the Edition I make make use of, (which is of Leyden 1642) wherein we find that the Original is in the Library of Jerom de Backere.

(130) Teiffier, Catalog. Auct. pag. 373.

(131) This is written in 1699.

(132) Erasmus, Epist. xxix, lib. xix. Note, That in the Book intitled, Sentiments d'Erasmus, p. 73, this Letter is said to be directed, Alphonse Valdes, in 1626; but it is Alphonse Valdes, in 1529.

(132*) Id. Epist. xlii. lib. xxix.

(133) Id. ibid.

(134) Epist. Erasmus, lib. lib. lib. xxx.

(135) Erasmus, Purgat. adv. r. Epist. Lutheri, pag. 54, 55.

(136) Idem, Elogium, lib. lib. lib. xxx.

Folly [R]. It was with great difficulty that he suffered his Picture to be drawn [S]; but at last he consented. Holbein, a famous Painter, and his particular Friend, drew it, and Beza honoured it with an Epigram which has been commended (e). Erasmus not embracing Luther's Reformation, and yet condemning many things practised by the Papists, drew upon himself a thousand Reproaches both from the Catholics and Protestants [T]. No Man was ever more averse than he to the furious Temper of

(e) See a Criticism upon it in the Remark [S].

one must believe a Writer to be a Turk, when he makes a Turk speak according to his Principles. 'Nisi forte, si Turcam loquentem facerem, mihi imputandum putent quidquid ille dixerit (137).' It is worth one's while to see what he says to excuse the Discourses he ascribes to Folly, in Moriae Encomio; for that is very judicious: 'Non perpendit id quod in dialogis est potissimum, personæ decorum . . . quasi verò si quis Ethnicum cum Christiano loquentem faciat, nefas sit Ethnicum quicquam dicere quod abhorreat à doctrina Christiana (138). — They do not consider the most essential Part of Dialogue, the propriety of the Characters . . . As if, when you introduce a Heathen talking with a Christian, it would be criminal to make the Heathen speak any thing repugnant to the Doctrine of Christianity.' Add to this Lyftrius's Commentary upon the Preface of the Encomium Moriae. The only Objection that can be made to it is, that a Writer of Dialogues, or such like Author, who under the Fiction of a borrowed Person has a Mind to disclose his Thoughts, ought to choose such Subjects as by the Laws of Probability will not engage them to say any thing which is not edifying. This is all the Objection that can be raised: if this also be added to it, that whoever makes Heretics advance the strongest Arguments that can be urged for their Heresy, pleads the Cause of his own Heart, or falls into a rash and ridiculous Judgment. Be this as it will, few Books have made so much noise as Erasmus's Colloquies. They have been publicly read in the Schools; in divers Places they have been prohibited to be read (139), or even to be sold (140). The Cardinals and Prelates delegated by Pope Paul III., for the Reformation of Abuses, found it concerned their Commission to forbid the teaching of Erasmus's Colloquies in the Schools (141). They have been translated into divers Languages (142), commented, castrated, &c. (143). I remember a Passage in Erasmus's Letters, in which he complains that his Colloquies devalued by a Jacobine Friar were published at Paris, with a Preface forged by the Corrupter under Erasmus's Name: 'Lutetie rursus Dominicanus quidam corrupt mea colloquia, & addidit Præfationem meo nomine in qua damno me ipsum (144).'

(137) Id. ibid.

(138) Id. chil. 2, cent. 2, n. 40.

(139) At Paris, in 1528. Erasmus, Epist. lxx, libri xx. Epist. xxix, libri xix.

(140) In England, in 1528. Idem, Ep. xxxiii, libri xxi. At Dole, in 1536. Idem, Epist. lv, libri xxvii.

(141) Steilian. lib. xii.

(142) See Colomieu, Biblioth. choisl. pag. 140, 142.

(143) Baillet, Jugem. for les Critiq. Tom. III, pag. 152.

(144) Erasmus, Epist. xxxii, lib. xxi: it is dated Easter-day 1526.

(145) In Indice Chronolog.

(146) Pag. m. 457.

(147) He tells us in his second Chiliad, at the fortieth Proverb of the second Century, that he wrote it in seven days, without the help of any book.

(148) Epistle Dedicatory of the Edition of this Book which he published at Basil in 1676 in 8vo, with Holbein's Figures.

(149) The XVth of the Xth Book, dated from Louvain in the year 1512. This and the following Passage were communicated to me in a Memoir of Mr de la Monnaie.

'mentarios, quod antea profuerat non intelligi (150).' See what the modern Author says who has criticized Maimbourg's History of Calvinism (151).

[S] It was with great difficulty he suffered himself to be drawn. It was because he was little pleased with his own Face: Ac ne facie quidem propria delectabatur, vixque extortum est amicorum precibus ut se pingi pateretur. This he says himself in his Life: but this must be understood only of the first time, since it is certain Holbein painted him several Times (152). He drew him only at half length, which occasioned an Epigram of Theodore Beza, that has been much approved. Du-Verdier Vau-Privas, at page 2392 of the third Volume of his Prosopographia, falsely attributes it to Buchanan, and gives it as an Epitaph. Beza owns himself the Author of it, speaking of Erasmus in his Icones. The Epigram is as follows.

(150) Erasmus, Epist. at Botolæmum.

(151) Nouvelles Lettres de l'Auteur de la Critique générale du Calvinisme de Maimbourg, pag. 757.

(152) See Holbein's Life, at the beginning of Patris Edition of the Encomium Moriae.

Ingens ingentem quem personat orbis Erasmus,
Hic tibi dimidium picta tabella refert.
At cur non totum? mirari define lector,
Integra nam totum terra nec ipsa capit.

One half this Canvas shews of that great Sage,
Whom Worlds proclaim the wonder of the Age.
Why not the whole? Cease, Reader, thy Surprise,
Him the whole Earth's not able to comprize.

I agree there must be some Wit to make these four Verses, and that they seem to belie the Maxim, that a Thought cannot be fine unless it be true; but, all things considered, I should rather maintain that there is false Wit in this Epigram, since it terminates in a wrong Thought, than to destroy that Maxim. I prove that Beza's is a wrong Thought, because a Painter has no more difficulty to draw the full length of a learned Man or Hero, whose Fame is spread far and near, than that of a mean Person who is known only in his own Village. So that the reason alledged by the Poet, why Erasmus was only drawn at half length, is perfectly chimerical (153). There are some who have looked for other Subtilties, and those a little malicious in the Epigram; as if the Poet had alluded to that kind of Neutrality, which it seems Erasmus would have preserved between the Pope and the Lutherans (154): but even that would be false Wit; for it is impossible such a reason as that should make it hard to draw the Thighs of a Man. I must not forget that in the Latin Translation of Lewis Guicciardin (155) there is an Addition importing, that they kept at Rotterdam, in a public Place, a Picture of Erasmus, representing him very naturally just as he was four Years before his Death; that this Picture was sent by the Senate and People of Basil, and that it is the same upon which Beza had made so subtle an Epigram, Ingens ingentem, &c. All those I have consulted, have answered me, that they never heard of such a Present made by the Gentlemen of Basil to those of Rotterdam, nor that the Picture of Erasmus was ever kept in a public Place in that City. Only I am informed that there is an excellent Original Piece of him, by the famous Holbein, to be seen at the House of Mr Brakel Rear Admiral of the Maese (156). I have read in Vafari, at page 307 of the third Part of the Lives of the Painters, that Albert Durer had made a Print of Erasmus's Head.

(153) Emilius, Professor at Utrecht, has imitated this Thought of Theodore Beza in the Distich which he put under the Print of Mrs Scherman. Non nisi dimidii spectator imagine virgo Maxima quod totum nulla tabella capit. You were but half the Maid; to each in all, The largest Tablet would be far too small.

(154) Apud Verheiden, Eclog. præf. Theolog. pag. 19.

(155) Pag. 308, Arrhem. Edit. 1616. The Author of that Latin Version is named Regnerus Pincelias Zircanus.

(156) He was killed in a Sea Fight in the Channel, July 10, 1690.

[T] He drew a thousand Reproaches upon himself, both from the Catholic and Protestant Party. The Question is not to examine here, whether Erasmus's Conduct with respect to Religion was good or no. I shall only observe that he seems to me to be one of those Witnesses for the Truth, who were wishing for a Reformation in the Church, but who did not think it was to be procured by erecting another Society to be supported by Leagues, and that should pass immediately à verbis ad verbera, from Words to Blows. He had too narrow an Idea of the Divine Providence, not sufficiently considering of certain Divines, who approve of violent Actions, and delight to spirit up War; but he was a Lover of Peace, knowing the value of it [U]. He was too much concerned at the Libels published against him, as it appears by the Complaints he made against the Printers of those Libels [X]. He has been thought the Author of several Books considering that it leads us to the same end, sometimes by one way, sometimes by another. So that with his non amo veritatem seditionis. — I hate seditious Truths, he rested in the Mire, and falsely imagined the best way was to secure the main Point, since Luther's way of writing, and the Wars which accompanied his Reformation, was an Argument that the time of Relief was not yet come. 'Si Lutherus omnia bene scripsisset, mihi tamen magnopere displiceret seditiosa libertas. Ego vel falli malim in nonnullis, quam tanto orbis tumultu pro veritate digladiari' (157). — Had all that Luther wrote been 'good, his seditious Freedom would still have been disagreeable to me. I would rather submit to some Errors than raise a Civil-War, and put the whole World in an uproar for the sake of Truth.' But in vain did he live and die in the Romish Communion, and undergo many Reflexions from some zealous Protestants; he was not the less ill treated both during his Life, and after his Death, by several Catholic Writers, as is sufficiently plain from the single Book of Gaspar Chicocius (158). It is pity the Author of Erasmus's Sentiments, published in 1688, went no farther than the first Part. See the Substance of Erasmus's Thoughts concerning the Pacification of the Church, extracted by Mr Seckendorf (159). He has taken them from the Exposition of the Eighty-fourth Psalm, published in 1533. It cannot be denied, that, taking all things together, Erasmus was what they call a Catholic; but he did not see without Joy the first Steps of Luther, and was greatly concerned when he thought Lutheranism near its Ruin. In the Year 1528, he believed Luther had retracted the greatest part of his Doctrines, and had thereby exposed himself to the Contempt of his Brethren as a Dotard. This was a Trouble to Erasmus, because he feared the Monks, being delivered from this Storm, would act new Tragedies. He opened his Heart upon this Subject to Gattinara, Chancellor of Charles V. 'Indies mitescit febris Lutherana, adeo ut ipse Lutherus de singulis propemodum scribat palinodias, ac ceteris habeatur ob hoc ipsum hæreticus ac delirius. Sed vereor ne quorundam monachorum stolidi improbitas excitet nobis aliam tragediam' (160). — Luther's Fever abates daily, inasmuch that he recants almost all that he has said, and is therefore accounted by the rest a Heretic and a Madman; but I fear lest the ill-advised Zeal of certain Monks should give birth to another Tragedy. To this refers what he wrote the same Year to a Count of the Empire. 'Si inclinatus fuisset Lutherana, quod ut fati ipsi sedulo dant operam, exoriatur intolerabilis Pseudomonachorum tyrannis' (161). — If Luther's Faction, as they strenuously endeavour to effect it, should decline, we shall be plagued with the insufferable Tyranny of Mock-Monks. He had already been loaded with Reproaches by Luther and some others of that Party: nevertheless he did not desire the Downfall of that Sect; but was glad they kept the Monks in play, and held them within due Bounds. The next Year he wrote two Letters, which are very dissembling to the Lutherans (162). Luther publicly charged him with Atheism, in 1534.

[U] He was a Lover of Peace, and knew the Value of it. One of the finest Dissertations that can be seen is that of Erasmus upon the Proverb, Dulce bellum inexpertis. — Want of Experience makes War sweet. He makes it appear therein, that he had profoundly weighed the most important Principles of Reason and the Gospel, and the most common Causes of Wars. He proves, that the Wickedness of some particular Persons, and the Folly of the People, are the Source of almost every War, and that a thing so blameable in its Causes, is commonly followed by a very pernicious Effect. He pretends, that those, whose Professions ought to lead them to dissuade from War, are the Instigators of it. 'Si quis exactius rem excutiat, reperiet omnia fere Christianorum bella vel è stultitia, vel è malitia nasci. Nonnulli juvenes, & rerum imperiti, majorum malis exemplis, historiarum, quas de stultis prodidere stulti monumentis, ad hoc inflammati, dehinc instigantibus adulatorum hortatibus, extimulantibus Jureconsultis ac Theologis, assentantibus, aut conventibus Episcopis, fortassis & exigentibus, temere magis quam malitiose bellum suscipiunt, & tanto totius orbis malo dicunt bellum rem esse modis omnibus fugiendam. Alios occultum odium, alios ambitio, alios animi feritas in bellum impellit. Quandoquidem ne nostra quidem Ilias quicquam præterquam stultorum Regum & Populorum continet iras' (164). — If any one would examine this matter more thoroughly, he would find, that all the Wars in Christendom have been owing, either to Folly, or to Malice. Some unexperienced young Men, misled by the ill Example of former Reigns, inflamed by historical Traditions, propagated from Fool to Fool, or hurried on by the Persuasion of Flatterers, the Instigation of Lawyers and Divines, with the Conivance, and perhaps Influence, of Bishops, have engaged themselves in Wars, more out of Rashness than Malice, and, from so universal a Calamity, learn that War is an ill which ought by all possible means to be avoided. Others precipitate themselves into War from Hatred, others from Ambition, and some from a Savageness of Mind. Nor is our Iliad any thing else but a Detail of the Quarrels of foolish Princes and their Subjects. He goes on; Laws, Statutes, Privileges, are all silenced by the Din of Arms: Princes then find a hundred ways of attaining to arbitrary Power; from whence it happens, that some of them cannot endure Peace. 'Sunt qui non aliam ob causam bellum movent, nisi ut hac via facilius in suos tyrannidem exerceant. Nam pacis temporibus, senatus autoritas, magistratuum dignitas, legum vigor, nonnihil obstant, quo minus liceat principi quicquid libet. At bello suscepto, jam omnis rerum summa ad paucorum libidinem devoluta est. Evehuntur quibus bene vult princeps, dejiciuntur quibus infensus est; exigitur pecuniæ quantum libet. Quid multis? Tum demum sentiunt se vere Monarchas esse. Colludent interim duces, donec infelicem populum usque ad radicem arrolerint. Hoc animo qui sint, an eos putas gravatim arrepturos oblatam quamcunque belli occasionem? — Seme there are whose sole Motive to War is, that it may give them an Opportunity of exercising their Tyranny over their own Subjects with the greater ease; for in times of Peace, the Authority of a Senate, the Dignity of Magistrates, the Force of the Laws, are no small Curb to a Prince's Will. But in War the Management of all Affairs is left to the Caprice of a few. Those who are in their Prince's Favour are raised, those in Displeasure are trampled on. Supplies are demanded in an arbitrary manner. In a word, it is then they find themselves Monarchs in reality. The Chiefs in the mean time juggle together, till the poor People are totally robbed of their Liberty. Can it be imagined, that Men of such a Disposition would not willingly lay hold of the first Opportunity of War, which presented itself? This Dissertation is to be found in the Adages of Erasmus, and has been printed apart under the Title of Bellum. The Author promises in it a Book he wrote at Rome, under Pope Julius II. I know not whether it was ever printed; it was to have been intitled, Antipolemus.

[X] He was too much concerned at the Libels that were wrote against him: this appears by his Complaints against the Printers of those Libels. See the third Letter of the Twenty first Book, where he blames the good Offices that one of his Friends had done a Bookfeller who was like to be punished for publishing some satirical Writings. Erasmus shews his Friend, that such an Indulgence was wrong, because that Man, far from desisting from printing Libels, followed it more than ever. When some endeavoured to justify him, because he did not know how to maintain his Wife and Children (165), let him beg, replied Erasmus, or prostitute his Wife, for that is a less Crime than to ruin the Reputation of his Neighbour. One must be stung to the quick by a Satire to use such Language as this. The Author's Latin will please those

(164) Erasmus; Adag. Chil. iv, cent. i, num. 2; pag. m. 859.

(165) I was told some days since (in 1695), that a certain man, who is continually publishing Satires, gives this reason for it, that he has no other way to maintain his Family.

(157) Erasmus, Epist. xxvi, lib. xvi, pag. 769. See also the second Letter of the first Book, pag. 8, 9.

(158) See the Article SAWICKI, Remark [R]. See also what ALERANDER says thereupon in Remark [I] of his Article.

(159) Hist. Lutheran. lib. iii, pag. 49.

(160) Erasmus, Epist. lxiii, lib. xx, pag. 1024.

(161) Ibid. Epist. lxvii, lib. xx, pag. 1030.

(162) One in Pseudangelicos, the other ad Fratres Germaniae infertoris.

(163) See Seckendorf, lib. iii, pag. 77.

Books which were none of his [Z]. It is reported that the reading of the Epistola obsecratorum Virorum had a great effect upon him [Z]. I shall make a Remark on the Errors of Moreri [AA], and another on some Errors which I content my self to point at those who are good Judges. Wherefore I shall quote it. You will see, that in the beginning of it Erasmus represented to his Friend, who was a Protestant, that the Libels and satirical Figures, which the Lutherans filled Europe with, would be a Prejudice to their Party. 'An vos creditis talibus præditiis processurum Evangelii negotium? Magis metuo ne talium stulta malitia & malitiosa stultitia, subvertat cum bonas literas, tum Evangelium, si fieri possit, & vos vestramque civitatem aliquando pertrahat in grave discrimen. Scottus, inquit, habet uxorem & teneros liberos. Num ista excusatio videatur iusta, si scriniis meis effraclis fustulisset aurum? Non opinor. Et tamen hoc quod facit longè sceleratius est. Nisi forte putas mihi famam esse viliorē pecuniā. Si deest unde alat liberos, mendicet. Pudet, inquit. Et huiusmodi facinorum non pudet? Prostituat uxorem, & ad calices vigilanti naso stertat adultero? Nefarium, inquit? Magis nefarium est quod facit. Nulla lex punit capite qui uxorem prostituat, ac capitalem penam denunciant omnes iis qui libellos edunt famulos (166). — Do you imagine the Interest of Religion can be promoted by these Endeavours? I rather fear, that the Folly and Malice, which appear united in such Men, may overturn, if possible, both Learning and Religion, and, one day, bring both you and your City into imminent Danger. Scottus, you say, has a Wife and small Children. Would this Reason held good if he should break open my Trunk, and steal my Gold? I fancy not. Yet what he does is by far more base. Unless you think my Reputation less valuable than my Money. If he has not wherewithal to maintain his Family, let him beg. He is ashamed, you will say. What, and not be ashamed of such monstrous Crimes? Let him turn Bawd, and stand Pimp to his own Wife. That would be abominable, you say. Yet what he acts is more so. No Law makes it capital for a Man to prostitute his Wife; but all denounce Death against the Man who publishes false and scandalous Libels.

[Y] He has been thought the Author of several Books, which were none of his. He made himself a great many Enemies by the Liberty of his Pen. He boldly found fault with the scandalous Lives of the Clergy, for which reason they lost no Opportunity to make him pass for a Heretic, and an impious Man, particularly for an Abettor of Luther, charging him with Books which Luther was known to be the Author of. 'Quorundam tanta est perversitas ut ea quæ mihi tribuant, quæ Lutherus in conventu Cæsaris agnovit pro suis (167). They imputed to him the Book intitled, Captivitas Babylonica, because the two first Words in that Work are almost the same with those Erasmus had placed in the beginning of a Panyeric. 'Fassus est quosdam fuisse suspicatos hoc opus esse meum quod initium esset. Velim nolim, non admodum abhorrens ab exordio Panyerici mei, quo Philippo ex Hispaniis reverso gratulor qui sic incipit. celis nolis: bella conjectura (168). —

He confessed that some suspected this Treatise to be mine, because it begun thus, Velim nolim, which is not much different from the Exordium of my Panyeric, wherein I congratulate Philip upon his return from Spain, which begins thus, Velis nolis: Admirabili well guessed! Was not this a fine Proof? This is the Temper of Men now-a-days who cannot bear that their dangerous whims should be laughed at (169); I say, should be laughed at, in order to preserve our Brethren from those whims: immediately they turn Informers, alleging the most impertinent Proofs in the World, and find Fools enough who either are satisfied with them, or pretend to be so. They attributed to Erasmus two other Books which he did not so much as know the Titles of, and in one of which he himself was very ill used. 'Alexander indicavit mihi tribui duos libellos, quorum alteri titulus est Eubulus, alteri Lamentationes Petri. Emoriar si unquam mihi fuerat auditus titulus antequam ille protulisset. Priorem necdum quivi nancisci. In altero sic tractor, ut si sciam Autorem sim illi gratiam non optimam habiturus (170). — I was informed by Alexander that two Treatises were fathered upon me, the one intitled

Eubulus, the other Peter's Lamentations. Let me die if ever I heard the Titles before be communicated them to me. The first I have not hitherto been able to procure. In the other I have been so freely dealt with, that, if I knew the Author, I should make him none of the most complaisant returns.

In another Letter (171), he says, I. that the Divines of Louvain had charged him with a Satire of Huttenus intitled Nemo. II. That they had also imputed to him that called Febris; and yet, says he, both my Genius and Style are very different from that Piece, cum tamen totus genius totaque phrasis à mea dissentiat. III. That they fathered upon him Mosellanus's Oration against the Enemies of the three learned Languages, and Fisher's (172) Book against Faber, without considering how much the Style of that Prelate differed from that of Erasmus, cum tanta sit orationis dissimilitudo. IV. That they attributed to him Sir Thomas More's Utopia, and a certain Writing in favour of France. V. That for Proof of it, they urged the Conformity of the Style. VI. That he never did, nor ever would, write any thing without putting his Name to it. Nullum adhuc Opus conscripsi: neque conscripturus sum, cui non præfigam meum nomen. Those who shall consider the Words I am going to quote, will have reason to wonder, that any body should be ignorant of the deceitfulness of Proofs taken from the Conformity of Style. 'Impingunt (suspicionem mihi) non alio freti argumento quam stili, qui tamen mei non admodum similis est, nisi meus mihi parum est cognitus: quanguam quid mirum adeo foret, si quid illic aut alibi cum phrasi mea congrueret? cum nemo ferme scribit hinc temporibus, qui non aliquid mei stili referat, propterea quod meæ lucubrations multorum manibus terantur, adeo ut in horum etiam libris qui scribunt adversum me, non raro stili meum agnoscam, meque meis pennis transfigi sentiam (173). — This Suspicion is founded on no other Argument but the Similitude of Style, which is not very great, if I know my own. But where would be the wonder, if here or there a Period should occur, or a Phrase be found that may bear some resemblance to mine? since scarce any one writes now-a-days who has not something of the same turn with myself. For my Writings are in the Hands of most; and in the Writings of my Enemies I can discover instances of my own stile, and often find myself combated with my own Weapons.

[Z] The reading of the Epistolæ obsecratorum Virorum (174) had a great effect upon him. It made him laugh so heartily, that a Swelling full of Matter, which he had in Face, broke, and thereby saved him the trouble of having it opened as the Physicians had ordered. I quote my Author's Words: 'Adeo ejus lectione in risum profusus fuit, ut abscessum in facie enatum, quem Medici secare jussuerant, præ nimio risu ruperit.' Simler, who observes this in Bullinger's Life, says, that John James Amian, a Native of Zurich, lent Erasmus the Book which made him laugh so heartily, and so much to his Advantage. Should not this be put among the Influences of the Advantages that accrue by reading?

[AA] I shall make a Remark on the Errors of Moreri. The first is this: Erasmus's Father ran away with a Physician's Daughter, named Margaret, who was then with Child by him. We have shewn before (175), that Margaret did not run away with her Galant, and that she only retired to a neighbouring Town to lie in, while he secured himself. The second is saying, that Erasmus took the Habit of a Regular Canon in the Monastery of St Augustin of Sion. It is true, his Guardians would have had him gone into that Monastery which was near Delft, and the chief House of the Order; but for the present he avoided their Sollicitations, and when he was obliged to comply, it was in the Monastery of Stein, near Tergou, where he was inrolled in that Militia. I cannot find, either by the Account he gives himself of his own Adventures, in his Life, and in his Letter to Lambert Grunnius, or in Rhenanus's Prefaces, that he ever studied in the Convent of Sion, as Boxhornius and Valerius Andreas affirm. The third is to say, that at the Age of sixty Years he went to Basil for

(166) Erasmus, Epist. iii, lib. xxi, pag. 1061, written to Gaspar Hedion, in 1524.

(167) Erasmus, Epist. xiv, lib. xvii, pag. 758, col. 2. It was written in the Year 1521.

(168) Ibid.

(169) According to Tertullian's Maxim: Plurima sunt risu digna revinci ne gravitate adoren-tur.

(170) Erasmus, Epist. xiv, lib. xvii, pag. 758.

(171) The first of the elegant Book, written the first of June, 1518.

(172) Bishop of Rochelle.

(173) Erasmus, Epist. i, lib. xi, pag. 54c. See also the first Letter of the twelfth Book.

(174) Quibus non tantum genus dicendi, sed mores quoque Theologorum fuisse perstrinxerunt. — Hæreticæ non solum Stile, sed et Morales of the Divines are evidently centred. Simler, in Vita Bullingeri, folio 6 verso.

(175) In the Rem. [B].

at [BB]. I do not think there was any Reason to say, that Cælius Rhodiginus accused Erasmus of being a Plagiary [CC].

It might with more reason have been said, That he was accused of having but little knowledge of the Greek Tongue [DD], and of having wrote in haste a great deal of what he printed (f). We have seen (g) that he was reproached with loving excessive Drinking: I do not

(g) In the Mark [I], Cat. (67).

not

for the Series of the Article shews, that, according to Moreri, it was then Erasmus took his first Journey to Basil. Now it is easy to prove, that this is false in this manner. The sixtieth Year of Erasmus coincides either with the Year 1525 or 1527, since his Birth is placed by Moreri indefinitely either in the Year 1465 or 1467. If it appears then that Erasmus was at Basil in the Year 1516, or 1518, as is plain by his Letters (176), then it is evident Moreri is mistaken. We have already cited (177) a Man who says, that Erasmus went to Basil a little after the Installation of Leo X. Now that Pope was chosen in the Month of March, 1513. The fourth Fault is of the same Nature with the third. He says, that Erasmus, being gone to Basil, there printed his Colloquies, which were presently sold off. This plainly relates to the first Edition of that Book: but we have seen before, that there had been several Editions of it before the Year 1522. The fifth Fault is in saying, that Erasmus being informed the Heretics were returned to Basil, where they committed incredible Disorders, he retired to Friburg, in the Year 1529. For this is to suppose, that the Protestants had been expelled Basil some time before. Now nothing is more fabulous than such a Supposition. Their Party continued increasing from the Year 1522 to the Year 1529, when the other Party was entirely ruined: All the Images, which loaded twelve Carts, having been placed before the Town-House, in nine Piles, and burnt, to put and end to the Differences among the common People, who would have made use of them in their Houses (178). The sixth is: that all the learned Men of the Country carried Erasmus upon their Shoulders into the Cathedral Church at Basil, where he was interred. Then his Coffin must not have been less than the Bed of the King of Babylon mentioned in the third Chapter of Deuteronomy; for else all the learned Men of the Canton of Basil could not have found a Place for their Shoulders. He should have said, that those who carried the Body studied in the University of Basil, and that all the other Students, with all the Professors, and a good Part of the Magistrates, assisted at the Funeral Solemnity. 'Elatum est humeris studiosorum ad ædem Cathedralē atque ibi . . . honorificè sepultus; nam in pompa funebri non Consul modo, sed etiam Senatoribus plerique visabantur, Academiæ Professorum ac studiosorum aberat nemo (179).' I say nothing of his placing his Death on the eleventh of July 1516, which are plainly two Errors of the Press. At least it is plain, if Mr Moreri put the eleventh of July for the twelfth, the Printers made the Year 1516 instead of 1536. Hofmann also makes it the eleventh of July, and has fallen only into Moreri's third and fourth Fault.

[BB] . . . and another on some Errors which I shall only point at. I shall not now examine whether it be true, as Boissard had heard say, that Erasmus had been Rector of the University at Basil, and that, upon being ill treated by the Students, he had thrown part of the Records that contained the Privileges of that University into the Fire. Nor shall I refute the Story which is in the beginning of Erasmus's Life, and in Melchior Adam (180), viz. that Henry VIII, King of England, ordered him to be searched, and to take from him all the Money they should find upon him, above what was allowed to be carried out of the Kingdom, and that Erasmus, coming to the King to complain of it, set him a laughing, and received a Present from him, together with Letters, ordering the Customhouse Officers to restore what they had taken from him. If the thing had happened in this manner, Erasmus would not have passed it over in Silence, when he gives an Account in one of his Books (181) how he lost his Money at Dover.

[CC] I do not think there was reason to say, that Cælius Rhodiginus charged Erasmus with being a Plagiary. Erasmus complains a little of Cælius Rhodiginus, tho' at the same time he highly commends him; he complains of him (182), I say, because he had observed, in the Volume of the Lectiones Antiquæ, VOL. II.

some Footsteps of an Author's Ingratitude, who uses the Labours of another, not only without confessing it, but even with an ill Intention against the Person so plundered. And as otherwise he does not complain of Rhodiginus's charging him with any Theft, I am inclined to think the learned Mr Morhof has taken one for the other, when he said that Rhodiginus brought a little charge against Erasmus, as if the latter had robbed him of some Thoughts concerning the Adages (183). He adds, Rhodiginus ought not to glory in having furnished two or three drops to that Fountain, since he has said but very little upon some Proverbs in his Lectiones Antiquæ. It is certain the first Edition of Rhodiginus's Book was many Years later than the Publication of Erasmus's Adages. I should add, that the Author being already dead when Erasmus made the aforesaid Complaint, it does not appear at what time he could have made the Charge mentioned by Mr Morhof, or boast of his Supplies; I say, I should add this, if I did not discover a fraud in Erasmus's Words. He says, that when he was writing that Complaint, he heard of the Death of Cælius Rhodiginus. Cum hæc scriberem, ex eruditorum literis cognovi Rhodiginum obisse supremum diem (184). But this was added to a new Edition. The Complaint appeared in a preceding Edition and during the Life of Rhodiginus.

This particular may be proved by a Letter that Rhodiginus wrote to Erasmus the Twenty second of April 1519 (185). He tells him he was very much surprised to hear that Erasmus was angry with him. The Cause of this displeasure, it was said, was, that the Sentiments of Erasmus had been criticised in the Lectiones Antiquæ with an Air of Authority, and a magisterial Tone: Te, ait, in antiquarum lectionum Commentariis ab ejus sententia diversum abisse, atque id tanquam docere cuperes (186). Rhodiginus, having justified himself upon this Point, adds, that he had read some days before the complaint Erasmus had inserted in the last Edition of his Adages. He affirms, I. That it was the only Work of Erasmus he had read when he published his Book: II, That as soon as he had read it, he felt his Bowels in a manner torn out, seeing himself obliged to abandon his Work, having long laboured upon the same Subject. The way he took was to put what he had done into a new dress. Facto tuo, qui occupasti, ad restim mihi rediit res. Evigilare mihi tot noctes perire, haurire lucernarum fulgines, sudoribus toties rigatæ vestes in nihilum recidere . . . nova fuit redordienda tela (187). This was part of the materials of the Lectiones Antiquæ. He promises Erasmus to dedicate one of the Books to him. All this persuades me more and more that Mr Morhof is mistaken.

[DD] He has been accused of having but very little Knowledge of the Greek Tongue. See what I have said in the Remark [E] of the Article CASTELLAN, and add to it the following Passage of Mr Baillet (188). 'There is another Point which prejudices that 'Universality of Learning, that some have been willing to attribute to Erasmus, and which seems to be better founded; it is pretended that he had only an imperfect and superficial Knowledge of the Greek Tongue. Mr Hales says †, that it must be confessed Erasmus had a great deal of Subtlety, Exactness; and Facility, in criticising the Latin Authors; but he was not the same with respect to the Greek Writers. The celebrated Marianus Victorius ‡, who has given us the Works of St Jerome, went yet farther, and said that Erasmus knew nothing at all of that Language.' The Abbot de Billy might have been joined to these two Evidences; read these Words of Girac. 'He is even so blind both in Mind and Body, † says he (189), speaking of Cassar, that tho' Erasmus is the most faulty Writer in the World, yet he could never discover any of his Faults. Nevertheless he is mistaken in an infinite number of Places; so that the Abbot de Billy † seriously affirms, that in the Version which that Author has made of eight of St Chrysostom's epistles, he has reckoned above a hundred and fifty gross Errors: and elsewhere *, he is said to count *

(183) Morhof. Polyhistor. p. 8. 254.

(184) Erasmi. Adag. Chil. I. Cent. I, pag. 16.

(185) It is the 2th in the Col. Lection of Gudius's Letters printed at Utrecht, in 1697.

(186) Epist. Gudii, pag. 117.

(187) Idem. pag. 118.

(188) Baillet, Jugem. des Savans, Tom. III, pag. 146.

† Hales. Not. ad Chrysost. in Paul. ad Hebræos.

‡ Mar. Vie. Rest. Præfat. ad Hier. Oper. item post. Scaligeran. pag. 74.

(189) Girac, Replique à Cassar, Sect. xv, pag. m. 133.

Quod quidem eo magis miror quod in Chrysostomo quoque, quo nemo unquam luculentius scripsit, hoc illi nimis quam acedisse deprehendit ac præsertim in octo prioribus in post. ad Corinth. Epist. homilias in quibus hoc serio affirmare quod cum plurimum tunc errores admixisse. B. II. Obj. Sac. lib. I. cap. ix.

* L. cod. c. xix.

by

(176) The 19th of the second Book; the 53^d and 55th of the third; and the 17th of the fifteenth. Add to this, that Melchior Adam, in Vita Erasmi, speaking of Erasmi's going out of Basil, in 1520, says, that he first came there fifteen Years before, returning from time out of Braunt. This is taken out of Erasmi's tenth Letter of the 24th Book.

(177) In the Remark [R].

(178) Lexicon Hofmanni, Tom. I, pag. 258, Edit. 1677.

(179) Rhenanus, Epist. Dedicat. Origenis.

(180) Mr Patin, the Son, tells it without confusing it, in the Life of Erasmi, prefixed before the Encomium Mori, which he printed at Basil, in 1676.

(181) In Catal. Lucubrat ad Joan. Botzheim Abbatem Rhenanus, in Epist. prefata Opibus Erasmi.

(182) Erasmi, Chilid. I, Cent. I, pag. 16, Edit. Basil, 1546.

not doubt but this was Calumny; for in the same Place wherein he owns that he did not always keep himself chaste, he protests he was ever temperate [EE], and would have been glad if he could have lived without eating or drinking. What by thousands the Blunders which are to be found in the entire Translation of the Homilies upon St Paul; tho' no Body ever wrote with less Obscurity than St Chrysostom; and those who have compared the Riches and Beauty of his Expression to Gold, might with as much Reason compare the clearness of it to the purest and most polished Crystal, and to the clearest and best of Fountains. Notwithstanding, Erasmus was a very learned Man, and I believe the Faults he committed in translating that great Saint, are owing to the Contempt he had of him, since he was arrived to such a Degree of Insolence, that he was not afraid to boast in a Letter to Bishop Tonstal, that if he were drunk he should write better things than St Chrysostom in his Commentaries upon the Acts. These are the Liberties the Wits of these later Ages give themselves. I have consulted the Letter written to Tonstal, and am convinced by it that Girac did not make use of an Hyperbole; but there is, in the Passage of Erasmus, a little Supplement which seems to insinuate that he did not believe the Writings, he so much despised, to be St Chrysostom's. I have inserted the whole Passage, that the Reader may judge it. 'Ex Chrysostomo in Acta verteram Homilias tres, cujus operæ me pœnituit, quum nihil illic viderem Chrysostomi. Tuo tamen hortatu recepi codicem in manu, sed nihil unquam legi indolius. Ebrius ac stertens scriberem meliora. Habet frigidos, & ineptos sensiculos, nec eos ipsos commodè potest explicare. Ex Commentariis in Epistolam ad Corinthios posteriorem verti Homilias sex, eundem artificem illic loqui sentio. Itaque non est animus bonas horas collocare malè. Aliud spirat Chrysostomus (190).

Matthew

(190) Erasmus, Epist. lix, lib. xxvi, pag. 1478.

I had translated three Homilies from Chrysostom on the Acts, but am sorry for the trouble I took, since I find nothing of Chrysostom in them: at your Persuasion, I again took up the Book, but never did I read any thing more illiterate. A Man that is drunk or asleep might write better; his Thoughts are low, lifeless, and trivial; nor is he more happy in his manner of explaining them. I have translated six Homilies from his Annotations on the second Epistle to the Corinthians, and find them like the others, and consequently must have no Inclination to throw away my precious time on Trifles. The Spirit of Chrysostom breathes different Things.

[EE] He confesses that he had not lived so chaste as he ought, but protests he had been temperate. This he says in a Letter he wrote in the Year 1524, which contains a fine Description of the Dispositions of his Heart. I shall observe only these two Particulars in it. He affirms that he never was a Slave to Venus; nay, that he had no Leisure for it, because of his laborious Studies; but that in short, the Faults he might have committed of that Nature, were long since over; Age having delivered him from that Tyrant, which also makes old Age very agreeable to him. These last Words have a great deal of Virtue in them, and there are but few Men who can adopt them without a notorious Falshood, so much they follow the Taste of Malherbe, and not that of Sophocles (191)! As to his Sobriety, Erasmus could say nothing more consistent with a Christian Philosopher, or less agreeable to the Practice of Men, than what he has said. 'Et juvenis cibum ac potum semper ita sumpsi, ut pharmacum. Ac sæpe numero doluit, non licere sine cibo potuque perpetuo degere. Veneri nunquam servitum est, nè vacavit quidem in tantis studiorum laboribus. Et si quid fuit hujus mali, jam olim ab eo tyranno me vindicavit ætas, quæ mihi hoc nomine gratissima est (192).

(191) See the Remark [C] of the Article MALHERBE.

(192) Erasmus, Epist. v, lib. xxiii, pag. 1211, f.

In my Youth I always took meat and drink as Physic, and often lamented that Man might not be supported without the use of them. I was never a Slave to Love, nor indeed in such multiplicity of Business had I leisure for it. And if I ever was touched with that Passion, Age has long since freed me from it's Tyranny, for which reason I think myself more happy in being old. Of the two things he advances, one that he had nourished his Body only by a kind of Necessity, and took in his Food as a Remedy or Medicine; the other, that his Studies had not allowed him much leisure; the first is worthy of Credit, and the second is undoubtedly proved by the great number of Books he published to the World. Now these two Facts being admitted, one cannot reasonably doubt of what he says concerning his Chastity: he does not pretend it was perfect; he confesses he had not always resisted impure Love, but he denies he was in a state of Servitude to that Iniquity; if he was not able always to master it, yet he was never a Slave to it. A Man of much leisure, and addicted to indulge himself, would be suspected of a lye, if he talked in this Manner; for Idleness and good Cheer are the Nurseries of Luxury.

Hæc monitis fugias otia prima meis.

Hæc ut ames faciunt: hæc ut fecere tumentur.

Hæc sunt jucundi causa cibulque mali.

Otia si tollas periere cupidinis arcus, &c. (193).

(193) Ovidius, de Remedio Amoris, ver. 136, & seq.

In the first place, take leave of Idleness.

'Tis this that kind'd first your fond Desire:

'Tis this brings Fuel to the amorous Fire.

Bar Idleness, you ruin Cupid's Game.

Sine Cerere & Libero friget Venus, said Terence (194): Disento ventre, distenduntur ea quæ ventri adhaerent, said St Jerome. Let it not be objected that there are sober and laborious Persons who are very subject to Impurity; a few Exceptions to a general Rule, founded upon the occult Qualities of the Constitution, ought not to serve us for a Guide, when we are to judge of our Neighbour: and thus, while we are ignorant that Erasmus was of a Constitution to break through the general Rule, we ought to believe that by neglecting to indulge his Appetite, and applying himself closely to his Studies, he deadened the edge of Love, and preserved himself from Servitude. Add to this, that his Character, the Reputation he had acquired, and the Profession he made to be a wife and honest Man, necessarily engaged him to save Appearances, and not to suffer himself to transgress the Laws of Chastity without great Circumspection; now for this he must be a Man of a great deal of leisure; he must turn his Thoughts, not towards Venus volgiuaga, towards those Thais, who dispatch upon the spot the first comer, but towards Persons who are also careful for the Appearances of things. They require Preliminaries; they will be besieged in Form, and when they surrender it is a Benefice that demands a Residence (195), a thousand Cares great and small: it is a Heaven which does not always preserve the same serene Face; Coldnesses, Jealousies, Complaints, Explanations, Ruptures, Reconciliations, continue to produce changes in it, and that without any Rule.

(194) Terent. Eunuch. Act. iv, Scen. v, ver. 6. See the Remark [I] of the Article EREMITA, n. 4.

(195) See the Citat. (22) of the Article EGIALEA.

In amore hæc omnia insunt vitia: injuriæ,

Suspiciones, inimiciæ, induciæ,

Bellum, pax rursus: incerta hæc si tu postules

Ratione certa facere, nihilo plus agas,

Quam si des operam, ut cum ratione insanias (196).

(196) Terent. Eunuch. Act. I, Scen. I, ver. 146.

Love is strangely whimsical, full of Affronts, Jealousies, Fears, Parleys, Wars, then Peace again; and for a Man to follow Reason in Love, is the same thing as to follow Reason in Madness.

It is seldom that a man, who once falls under this kind of Engagement, retires without a bit of the Chain which soon forms a new Captivity:

Nec tu, cum obliteris semel, instantique negaris

Parere imperio, rupi jam vincula dicas.

Nam & luctata canis nodum abripit: attamen illi,

Cum fugit, à collo trahitur pars longa catenæ (197).

(197) Persius, Sat. I, ver. 157.

Nor think when once thou hast resisted one,

That all thy marks of Servitude are gone:

The struggling Greyhound gnaws his Leash in vain,

If when 'tis broken, still he drags the Chain.

It will be confessed that a Man, who after Erasmus's Example has almost always his Pen and Books in his Hand,

Matthew Slade, Rector of the College of Amsterdam, and a great Enemy of the Arminians objected against him with so much Violence [FF], was solidly confuted by Gaspar Barlaeus, in the Year 1615, in a Work entitled Bogermannus, ἐλεγχόμενος. There goes a Report (b), that all the Works of Erasmus are going to be printed at Leyden, under the Direction of Mr Le Clerc. This is a very commendable Undertaking; and all Lovers of Learning ought to wish it may be accomplished (§ 2). It is given out, that this new Edition will contain some Pieces never before printed; and it is to be supposed will be fairer than that which was published at Basil in 1540, in Nine Volumes in Folio, and which was dedicated to the Emperor Charles V. by Beatus Rhenanus.

[§ 2] This new Edition was published in 1703, &c. in eleven Volumes in Folio, REM. CRIT.]

Hand, can never find time for all these things, and that therefore Erasmus speaks reasonably when he says his Studies did not allow him to devote himself to Love.

[FF] Matthew Slade . . . declaimed violently against Erasmus. He wrestled with the utmost Malice a Passage he found in the first Edition of Erasmus's Letters, where it seems as if the Author called in question the Authority of St Paul. 'Ego sane nec Hieronymo, nec Augustino sic addictus esse vellem, vix etiam Paulo, ut omnia illius scripta tuerer ac probarem' (198). — 'I would not be so bigotted to St Jerome, St Austin, nay scarcely to St Paul, as to espouse and maintain all he has writ.' Note that Erasmus added in the other Editions this Salvo, Ut aliquid dicam hyperbolicè, Hyperbolically speaking. Barlaeus (199) did not fail to exclaim against Matthew Slade, who had not the Equity to regard that Salvo. He exaggerated the Injustice that is committed, when Authors are reproached with Faults they themselves have corrected, and made a good Apology for Erasmus upon that Head, as also upon the Accusation which Slade had brought against him for favouring Arianism. This was renewing the old complaints published before by the Monks. The Apologist mentions some of their Impertinences, not forgetting (200) that of John Staudius, an English Franciscan, and Bishop of St Asaph, who complained to the King his Master, that Erasmus had put Sermo instead of Verbum, in the beginning of St John's Gospel. He observes (201), that the Sons of Martin Lydius, Professor of Divinity at Franker, carefully preserved the Manuscript of the Apology pro Erasmi Theologia, which their Father had composed.

ERESUS, in the Isle of Lesbos, was the Birth place of Theophrastus (a). The Barley which grew in this Territory yielded a Meal so white, that they thought it fit to make a Divine Morsel. From hence it is that the Poets feigned, That Mercury went to Eresus to buy up that Meal for the Bread of the Gods [A]. Henry Stephens mentions this upon occasion of the good Tables of the Clergy [B]; but he has not quoted Athenæus as he ought to have done. Consult Hadrian Junius (b).

[A] The Poets have feigned that Mercury went to Eresus . . . for the Bread of the Gods. Archestratus, a Sicilian Poet, has mentioned this Story in a Poem (1) which treats of good Cheer. The Poem is lost; but Athenæus cites several Passages of it, and among others that in Question (2).

[B] Henry Stephens mentions this upon occasion of the good Tables of the Clergy. His Words are (3): 'When

'one would express in one word, Wine excellently good, fit for a King to drink, it must be called Priest-Wine; in like manner if we are to speak of fine and exquisite Bread, (such as that of the City of Eresus, which Mercury took the pains to come down from Heaven, and provide for the Gods, if we believe the Poet Archestratus) must we not have recourse to Chapter-Bread?'

ERFURT, Capital of Thuringia, and one of the greatest Cities of Germany [A], was given to the Archbishops of Mentz by the Emperor Otho [B], after the Death of Barcard, Lord of Thuringia. The Emperor consented that his Son William, who obtained this Archbishopric, should possess not only the City, but also all Thuringia. The Successors of William maintained themselves in this Possession till Lewis the Bearded seized Thuringia, and left it to his Descendants, who have enjoyed it near two Centuries, under the Title of Landgraves. After this it passed by Marriage into the Family of the Marquisses of Misnia, which is the same with that of the present Dukes of Saxony. Such a long Dispossession has caused the Archbishops of Mentz to renounce their Right to Thuringia; but they have never quitted their Pretensions to Erfurt; of which they have always been acknowledged Lords. It is true, that for a long time, they have had little more than the Title, the Citizens pretending they have purchased, at divers times, all the Rights of the Archbishops, and even maintaining that those Prelates, not being Lords of the Territory, could not possess, in their own Right, an Inch of ground in the City. The Archbishops reassumed more or less Authority according to the variety of Factions which divided the Citizens; but when the City, after it had embraced the Reformation of Luther, was put under the Protection of the Dukes of Saxony; the Archbishops were no longer able to preserve any Power there.

[A] It is one of the greatest Cities of Germany. Nay, it may be affirmed, that by its Compass it surpasses all the Cities of Germany. It has also many Places in its Dependence, consisting of three Lordships, and seventy two Villages. It takes its Name from the Castle of Effort, situated seven Leagues from it, the Lord of which had a Right of Toll from the City. Many Historians believe, that St Peter's Monastery on the Mount was built there by Dagobert King of France; others by King Pepin, Lord of Thuringia; and there are still to be seen six Flower-de-Luces upon the Gate of that Monastery (1).

[B] Erfurt . . . was given . . . by the Emperor Otho. As all the Body of this Article has been taken from an Extract which comes from Mr Salle, I contented myself to say with him the Emperor Otho; but for fear I should be taxed with extreme Negligence in using so indeterminate a Word, I add here that Otho I is the Emperor in question, and I quote an Author for it, who deserves to be credited. The City of Erfurt, says he (2), 'was not walled round till the Year 1163, long after the Emperor Otho I had given it, together with Thuringia, to his Brother William (3) Archbishop of Mentz.'

[C] The

(198) Erasmus, Epist. ad Petrum Barbirium. It is the third of the first Book, and is dated from Bruges, the thirtieth of August, 1521.

(199) Barlaeus, in Bogermanno Erasmii, pag. 4, & seq.

(200) Ibid. pag. 58, 59.

(201) Ibid. pag. 60.

(a) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 452.

(b) Animadv. lib. iii, cap. iv.

(1) It was intitled, Γαστρονομία. It is also quoted under other Titles. See Athenæus, lib. i, p. 4.

(2) Lib. iii, cap. xxix, p. m. 111.

(3) Apologie pour Herodote, pag. m. 204, 205.

(1) Heis. Hist. de l'Empire, liv. vi, cap. i, pag. 108, Tom. II, fr. Dutch Ed. &c.

(2) Heis. Ibid. pag. 199.

(3) It is Otho's Son in the Extract of the Journal des Savans.

there. Gustavus, King of Sweden, secured that City; but afterwards forsaking the Swedish Party, it was again subdued by the Arms of General Banner. The Swedes contented, by the Treaty of Westphalia, that it should return to the Obedience of the Archbishops. The Inhabitants pretended, that this was only to be understood of an imaginary Obedience, such as they had paid in latter Times; but the Archbishop of Mentz maintained, on the contrary, That by that Article of the Peace, he ought to be invested with all the Rights of a true Lordship. The Emperor declared for him, and put the City of Erfurt under the Ban of the Empire. After which, the Archbishop, with the Assistance of the Troops France lent him, forced the Inhabitants to submit [C]. So that, at present, he is Master of the City and (a) Citadel (b). The University of Erfurt, which had been in so flourishing a Condition, fell to Ruin by the Insolence of the Scholars [D].

(a) It is called St Ciriac, because it was built in a Place where there was formerly a Nunnery of that Name. Journal des Savans. Jan. 19, 1667. The Germans call it Cyriacsburg.

(b) Taken from a Memoir concerning the City of Erfurt, an Extract of which is in the Journal des Savans. Jan. 19, 1667.

[C] The Archbishop of Mentz, with the Assistance of the Troops lent him by France, forced the Inhabitants of Erfurt to submit. Here is another Passage of Mr Heist (4). 'Upon this occasion of Erfurt, it is just we should remember the Generosity of the Most Christian King, who, in the Year 1664, sent, at his own charge, to John Philip de Schonborn, his Ally, Elector of Mentz, a powerful Body of Troops, commanded by the Count de Pradel, to assist him in the Reduction of the City to his obedience, pursuant to the Ban the Emperor had published against it.' This is sufficient to satisfy those who would have a Narrative supported with the Circumstances of Time, Persons, &c. They are not to blame for this Taste; for without this account is a Body without a Soul, or a Machine out of order: arena sine calce: and yet an infinite number of Authors give us no other accounts than these.

(4) Hist. de l'Empire, livr. vi, chap. 1, pag. 199.

[D] The University of Erfurt fell to ruin by the insolence of the Scholars. Eobanus Hessus had had fifteen hundred Auditors in that famous University: There Luther took his first Degrees, and called it the Paradise of Germany. But the State of things was changed: The Citizens not being able to endure any longer the Debaucheries and Insults of the Students, took Arms, besieged the Colleges, made themselves Masters of them, wounded or killed as many of the Scholars as fell into their Hands, and did not rest till they had driven them all out of the City. I shall quote a long Passage of an Oration of Alstedius (5), in which he complains bitterly of the disorderly Life of the Students. 'Quam vellem nobis semper ob oculis versaretur catastrophe florentissimæ Academæ Erfordensis! Cum

(5) It is intitled, De Providentia Dei circa Scholarum decrementum. It is in his Encyclopædia, vol. 2, 64, and following.

studiosi illic loci se petulantius gererent adversus cives, cum tumultibus nocturnis urbem lacerarent, cum lapidibus testa domosque obruerent, cum fenestras & fores hospitum frangerent, populus magno agmine excitus collegiorum domos admodis bellicis tormentis obedit, expugnavit, ac ut quemque studiosorum juvenum obvium habuit, velut hostem, arripuit, vulneravit, cruciavit, neque prius quievit, quam vitulantium adolescentum multitudo mœnibus urbis effect prodigata. Jacet ex illo die etiamnum, olim florentissima Academia, quam Lutherus, qui primam ibi lauream consecutus est, paradisi Germaniæ id ætatis fuisse testatur: in qua Eobanus Hessus mille & quingentos auditores habuit: quæ denique id fuit in Germaniâ, quod Bononia in Italia, mater scilicet studiorum. — I could sincerely wish we had always before our Eyes the Catastrophe of the most flourishing University of Erfurt. The Students therein committing Outrages on the Inhabitants, exasperating the Citizens with nightly Tumults, assaulting their Houses with Stones, breaking their Windows, and forcing their Doors, the People, in a vast body assembled, attacked the Colleges with all the Artillery of War, took them by Force, seized, wounded, or slew all the Students they met, as Enemies, nor ceased till they had driven the whole Multitude of these hot brained Youtbs from the City. From that day to this lies in Ruins the once most flourishing University, which Luther, who there received his first Laurels, called the Paradise of Germany: Wherein Eobanus Hessus had fifteen hundred Students: and which, in a word, was the same in Germany, as Bononia in Italy, the Mother of Studies.

(a) Valer. Andr. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 169.

EREMITA (DANIEL) a Native of Antwerp, and Secretary to the Duke of Florence (a) about the beginning of the XVIIth Century, was a pretty good Writer [A]; but neither his Morals, nor Conduct, were consistent with the Profession of Learning, to which he had devoted himself. Scaliger had conceived a great Esteem for him, and had recommended him to Casaubon, which he repented of not long after [B], when he knew that that young Man was turned Catholic. Casaubon has given [A] He was a pretty good Writer. The Panegyric upon the Duke of Florence which he published in 1608 was applauded. The Epistola Relatio (1) de Itinere Germanico quod Legatione magni Etruriæ Ducis ad Rodolphum II. Imp. Principisque & Respublicas aliquot Germaniæ anno 1609 peractum fuit, and his Letter de Helvetiorum, Rhetorum, Sedonensium Situ, Republica, & Moribus, deserve to be read. Scaliger makes the following judgment of him (2): 'Quas (litteras) ad te ab  scriptas mihi misisti aliquam bonæ frugis spem faciunt. Interest illud ingenium quibusdam finibus coerceri, in quibus si contineatur & illam luxuriam depascatur, nihil ab eo nisi bonum expectandum est. — The Letters wrote to you by  which you imparted to me, give me some hopes of a future Harceß. Certain limits ought to be prescribed that Genius, within which if it be restrained, and it's Luxuriancy be retrenched, we may thence expect nothing but what will be praise worthy.' His Latin Verses were inserted into the second Volume of the Select Pieces of the Flemish Poets.

(1) Christopher Arnoldus quotes it honourably in the Life of Marc Velserus.

(2) Epist. xevil, pag. 243, Edit. Francof. 1628. He wrote it to Casaubon: the Letter is dated the fifteenth of August, without the Year; but it is 1603.

[B] Scaliger . . . had recommended him to Casaubon, which he repented of soon after, when he knew he was turned Catholic. We have just seen what he wrote to Casaubon the fifteenth of August 1603, and thus he writes to him the eighth of December of the same Year. 'Proh facinus indignum! quid de  audio? adeo immutatum ingenium ejus, ut alius ab eo quem tibi commendavi discederet? Me verò stipitem qui in aliis δὲ ἐνδραχύνω sum, in isto ἐμπατισα, ἐνέφλωσσον. . . . Nescio an unquam quicquam mihi acciderit quod aut justius aut gravius doluerim, tum quia in illa ætacula vulpem non deprehenderim, tum quia à me expresserit ut se tibi commendarem. Sed vix illi qui in te ingratus fuit, & me hominem stultum qui vulpem non hominem tibi commendavi. Obstrinxerat me aliquo privato beneficio, non tamen quod æquaret comitatem qua illum amplexus sum, sed tamen (quæ est παρθεμία mea) quantulumcumque esset quod mihi præstitisset pro magno beneficio habui, neque potui illum splendidius remunerare quam si illi portam aperirem ad amicitiam tuam. — Ob Heavens! What do I hear of ? Is it possible a Man should be so altered in his Mind, as to become the reverse of what I recommended to you! However quick sighted I may be in other Matters, I must look on my self as a meer stock to be thus overseen. . . . Scarce any thing ever befel me, for which I am more sensibly or more justly uneasy, not only because I could not discover the lurking Fox, but that I should be prevailed on to recommend him to you. Fool that I was to mistake a Fox for a Man; yet were he to him that proves ungrateful to you. I had some private obligations to him, but not equivalent to that humanity wherewith I treated him. I looked on the favour, tho' small, with a grateful Eye, and thought I could not make given an ample Account of this Adventure [C]. This change in Religion did not hinder Eremita from preserving a good Opinion of Scaliger; which he gave a public Evidence of, even after Scaliger was dead; for he wrote in his defence against the terrible Scioppius [D]; but he did not find his Account in it. Scioppius confuted him in his usual way, that is to say by publishing a thousand diffamatory Stories concerning the Life of Daniel Eremita [E]. The latter died of the French-Pox at Legborn,

(3) In Clavi E. pistolarum Scaligeri, pag. 152. Oculorum Edit. Ultraj. 1661.

'him a more noble return, than opening him a way to your Friendship.' I believe with Mr Colomies (3) that the change of Daniel Eremita's Religion is here intended; but I cannot imagine why those who published Scaliger's Letters should be so tender of the Memory of that Person, as to put Stars instead of his Name. They have misplaced the two Letters which speak of him; for they reckon that for the ninety seventh in which Scaliger makes the Judgment of him mentioned in the preceding Remark, and they reckon for the eighty eighth that wherein he says what I have just now quoted. Mr Colomies, who believed that Daniel Eremita was meant in both Letters, ought to have taken notice that they were misplaced; for, according to his Supposition, it is plain the ninety seventh Letter is prior to the eighty eighth. This is evident from another place. Scaliger in the ninety seventh informs him, that he has received Casaubon's Commentary upon the Roman History, and in the eighty fifth he says, that he had already twice informed him of the Reception of that Book: it is certain then that the ninety seventh Letter was writ before the eighty fifth. Now this latter is dated the nineteenth of September 1603: therefore, in order to supply the date of the Year, which is wanting in the ninety seventh Letter, 1603 must be added to 18 Kalend. Septembris set down by the Author. This is what the Publishers of those Letters took no notice of, who have placed it among those of the Year 1604, at a good distance from the eighty eighth Letter dated the eighth of December 1603.

(4) Urgebat optimus & tui obsequissimus Eremita noster. Casaub. Epist. ad Scaligerum. It is the cclxxxiiiid, pag. 324. Edit. Græviana, 1666. It was written in February 1603. Ego illum semper tua maxime gratia habui charissimum, & quibuscunque potui officiis sum prosecutus. Idem, Epistola cclxxxv ad eundem Scaligerum.

(5) Idem. Epist. cclxxxiv.

(6) Idem. Epist. cclxxxv.

(7) Idem. Epist. cclxxxvi, dated the 11th of April, 1603.

'because you were unable to make a Resistance, but because you wished to be conquered.' The greediness of riches, which was observed in him, was no good omen. 'Erat mihi dudum hoc ingenium suspectum propter incredibilem in ea ætate opum suam, quam non levibus notis in eo deprehenderam (8). — I for some time had suspected his Inclination from his incredible Avarice at that Age, which I had discovered by too convincing proofs.' The place they procured him was worth fifty Crowns a Year. 'Collocaveram ipsum in honesta conditione ubi præter victum quinquaginta annuos auros habebat (9).' This Sum at first seemed very great to him, then small, and at last nothing at all. He watched all opportunities to get Money, and particularly had his Eye upon the Episcopal Houses. Casaubon hindered him twice from engaging himself; but he did not oppose his entrance into Mr de Vic's Family. The young Man there turned Papist, and went into Switzerland with the Ambassador. His Father a good old Man, and a good Protestant, was overwhelmed with grief at this Revolt; he endeavoured to bring back his prodigal Son into the good way; and it seems he made him recant; but it was all fraud. Casaubon wrote word to Leyden, that Daniel Eremita was mad after Images, and the greediest Man in the World of Masses. 'Scito neminem hodie vivere Miferum inexplabilem, aut sitientem, quare illa παλινδραμία simulata fuit, mendax & ὑποκριτική. In dies ejus herus expectatur, quo præsentem veram vocem audiet à me ille Proteus (10). — There is no Man living more greedy after, or boggled to, Masses than he, wherefore that recantation was only a feint. His Master is expelled every day, in whose presence that Proteus shall bear from me the Truth.' Another Artifice this; for his Design was only upon a Pension. He had been heard to say, that all the Controversies between the Catholics and Protestants seemed indifferent to him, and that for his part, he was ready to accommodate himself to the Times, according to the Interest of his Affairs; and one day he laughed at the folly of those who do not choose the way to Fortune. 'Vir fide dignus & sibi notissimus his diebus narrabat mihi audisse se cum diceret, omnia sibi quæ hodie disputantur æque & probari & improbari, paratunque se ad omnia pro tempore & rerum suarum emolumento. Cum vir pius hanc vocem abominaretur, cachinnos Eremitæ est exceptus, stultitiam eorum αἰσχροῦς ridendis qui nescirent τὰ ἴδια εἰ τι δεινότερον (11). — A Gentleman of Credit, and one that is very intimate with him, some days ago informed me that he had heard him say, that all the present subjects of Controversy were indifferent to him, and that, in compliance with the Times and his own Interests, he could embrace or relinquish any of them. The good Man shewed an abhorrence of such a Principle, but was answered by Eremita with a loud laugh, who seemed to deride the folly of those Men, that were ignorant what was best for themselves.'

[D] He wrote for Scaliger against Scioppius. Scioppius assures us that (12) Daniel Eremita is the Author of the Epistola nobilissimi & literatissimi viri Patavio ad Gasp. Sciopium Roman scripta. Excusa anno 1610. I fancy he is not mistaken.

[E] Scioppius confuted him by publishing a thousand diffamatory Stories. It was five Years since Scioppius had seen him at Rome: Eremita, says he, met him with the two Brothers the Rubeins, and two other Flemings, to go to Tivoli, and those Gentlemen were horribly scandalized at his Discourses during that little Journey. He talked of nothing but Petrus, and Arctine's postures, and rudely insulted those who seemed to be shocked with the impurity of that Conversation. Nay more, he drew all kinds of obscene things upon the Walls of the Inn where they lodged. 'In toto illo itinere illud unum agere visus est ut Petronium velut unicum & quemadmodum ipse loquebatur, divinisimum pædærastræ descriptorem, magistrum, & artificem . . . omnibus quotquot sunt, Græcis

(8) Casaubonus, Epist. cclxxxv.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Idem. Epist. cclxxxvii, ad Scaligerum scripta vi Kal. April 1604.

(11) Id. Epist. cclxxxv.

(12) Scioppius, in Opusculi Græbini Amphitoti. Sciopium, pag. 335. This Book was printed in the Year 1611.

Leghorn, in 1613. Some rather think he was poisoned (b). He was naturally addicted

(b) Oblit Liburnæ ex morbo Gallico, anno à Christo nato 1613. Sunt qui veneno extinctum scribunt. Quid juvat humanos scire atque evolvere casus, Si fugienda facis & facienda fugis. Swert. Atten. Belgica, pag. 203.

(13) Scloppius,
ubi supra, pag.
336, 337.

Græcis ac Latinis Scriptoribus multum ad laudem anteferret. In quo ne parum profecisse crederetur non modò obscenissimis picturis diversorii parietes implevit, sed perpetuo varia ris conviciis schemata in ore habuit, & tanquam Elephantidos libellorum commentatorem atque interpretem ageret, historias peccare docentes, quibus vel Hippolyto sibula laxari ac nequitia persuaderi posset, recitare non cessavit.
Ac si quis ex comitibus ejus nequitiam reprehende-ret, suasque aures tam impuris & nefandis sermonibus violare nollet, huic ille hypocritin & pudicitia simulationem invidiosè objiciebat. Nec enim quemquam mortalium castum ac pudicum esse persuasum habet conjectura scilicet de animo suo ducta, sed plerò-que sive propter Dylopiant, sive quod animi satis non habeant ponalque metuant, suam cujuscunque generis libidinem dissimulare & occultare credit. Ita-que verisimile non est quàm se comites ejus gavisos esse dixerint, simul ac Romam reversi à tam propu-dioso monstro liberatos se senserunt. Nam placulares sibi facti videbantur, cum ejusmodi execrabilis turpissimi & impudentissimi scurræ sermones, quos neque suburræ puellæ æquo animo audirent, in aures suas admiserunt (13). — He made it his Business, during the whole Journey, to extol Petronius as the only, or, to use his own Words, as the most Divine Virtuoso, and Professor in the Science of Pederasty, preferring him to the whole Class of Greek and Roman Writers, and, to shew himself no unworthy Disciple of so great a Master, he not only filled the Walls of the Inn with the most obscene Representations, but was perpetually baranguing on the various Postures, and like a Commentator or Translator of Elephantis never ceased repeating the most lascivious Stories sufficient to debase the chastest Ear. And if any of his Companions checked him in his Leudness, and desired he might be no longer pestered with such odious and unseemly Discourse, he immediately charged him with Hypocrisy and counterfeit Modesty. Nor could he persuade himself that any Man was chaste or modest, drawing the Conclusion from the Corruptness of his own Heart, but that many, he believed, out of Bashfulness, from want of Courage, or from a dread of Punishment, disguised their several loose Inclinations. Therefore it is not improbable his Companions, at their return to Rome, should express their Satisfaction in having got rid of such a Monster of Un-cleanness. For the hearing such abominable Discourses from a most base and profligate Wretch, as would even make the Crew of a Brothel-house to blush, was very grievous to them. Disappearing some time after, it was imagined his Misery had forced him to throw himself into some Carthusian Monastery; but it was known he was retired to Sienna, where he made his Court to the Archbishop Ascanio Piccolomini, who recommended him to Silvio Piccolomini Great Chamberlain of the Duke of Florence; and by that means he obtained a Pension from that Prince, as a Reward for a Penegryric he made upon the Marriage of the Great Duke with Magdalen of Austria. He solicited so much to be sent into Germany with the Deputy who was going to notify to several Princes of the Empire, and Imperial Cities, the Death of the Grand Duke's Father, that he obtained his Request. To which the Reasons of Silvio Piccolomini contributed not a little, who represented that such a Man being a German might upon divers Occasions serve at the same time for a good Interpreter, and a good Spy. Eremita boasted in a letter written from Augsburg, that he was one of the Envoys of the Great Duke, which seemed a ridiculous thing to Leonard le Coq Confessor to Christina of Lorrain, Great Duchess of Tuscany. Upon his return to Florence he told a hundred Stories of the Drunkenness of the Germans, in order to make his Court to the Italians. He made the latter very merry when he told them of the Studies of Maurice Landgrave of Hesse, and of the Verses that Prince made in honour of the Youth who took the Degree of Bachelor. He told them that this Landgrave, with the Marquis of Anspach, and the Prince of Anhalt, had drunk the Health of the King of France, and the King of England, and Destruction to the King of Spain, and had made that Health go round, and drank it to the Great Duke's Envoy. Florentiam reversus, nihil prius habuit, quam Germaniam veluti porcorum patriam Italiam, quorum in eo gratiam aucupabatur, describere, quan-tumque Principes Germani quotidie potare ac vomere soleant, satis festivo commemorare: sed in nulla historia tam faventes expertus est auditores, quam cum de Grammatica Mauritiæ Hassæ Landgraviæ, deque carminibus, quibus ille novis Baccalaureis & Magistris honorem gratulari soleat, narravit. Hoc enim Italiam, præsertimque Florentinam, usque adeo in-solens ac novum videtur, ut id ad Ovidii Metamorphoses rectissime adjici posse existimant. Cum por-rò ex eodem Aretologo suo audiret, quod idem Landgravius simul cum Marbione Brandenburgico Onspaciensi, & Christiano Anhaltino, pro salute Regum Galliarum & Angliarum, proque peste ac mala morte Regis Catholici votivum poculum circumtulit, idque legato Florentino propinare nihil veritus fuerit, non videtur Itali tam barbam immanitatem satis promerito execrari posse (14). — At his return to Florence he made it his Business to paint Germany to the Italians as a Country of Hogs (by which means he insinuated himself into their favour), and with a great deal of Humour to recount how much the German Princes daily used to guzzle and spew.

But in none of his Discourses did he more divert his Audience, than when he spoke of the Grammar wrote by Maurice Landgrave of Hesse, and his Verses wherewith he used to compliment the Bachelors and Masters of Arts. For this seems to the Italians, and especially the Florentines, so whimsical and new, that they think it justly intitled to a Place at the end of Ovid's Metamorphoses. But when they hear him relate that the said Landgrave, with the Marquis of Brandenburg Anspach, and the Prince of Anhalt, had drunk a Health to the Kings of England and France, and to the Downfall and Destruction of the King of Spain, the Italians imagine that such a savage Insult could not be sufficiently detested. He was very kind to the Lutheran Nobility who went from Germany to Florence: those young Gentlemen were very glad to find there a Fleming who understood Italian, and informed them of the Customs of the Country, and they willingly took up their Lodging with his Landlord. By this means, he made good Cheer at a little charge, and then he introduced them to the Courtizans, where they had the goodness to defray his Expences, without which he would have found it difficult to have satisfied Nature. Cum illud nescio quid satietatem ejus, tentare cœpit, venasque inflavit tetra libido, quia non habet infelix Quintilla quod dæ possit, le-nonis opera ei navanda, & adventibus ad ipsam perducendis, amicam sibi propitiâ morigeramque facit (15). — When his Mistress was palled, and his Veins still burned with raging Lust, not having wherewith to satisfy her avaritious Temper, he turned Pander, and by introducing Strangers to her, made her more obsequious and complying. One Day he led, to the Lodgings of a Woman of Pleasure, a Catholic who had received the Communion the Day before, and not being in a humour to relapse so soon into Sin, and suspecting he was carrying him to a Brothel, was in suspense whether he should go in. Eremita swore to him it was the place where he kept his Library, and his Study. He believed his Oath and went in:
the Woman was abroad, but yet he knew by several Signs it was an ill place. When he complained of this to Eremita, he laughed at him, whether he ridiculed his Scruples, or took him for a Hypocrite. He collected together all the political Disquisitions and Paquinades he could find and gave them to the Lutheran Gentlemen, who, with this Traffic, imagined themselves transformed into perfect Statesmen, and highly extolled the Name of Daniel Eremita. Quidquid consultationum ac relationum de rebus politicis undeunde corrogare potuit (sicut ejusmodi frivolorum, quos vocant discursuum plena est Italia) tum præcipuè paquinor live satyrarum, quibus summi Pontifices, Cardinales, omnis Clerus, præcipuè Jesuitæ consu-meliosissimè ac plerumque mendacissimè infamantur, cum eis communicat. Et illi postea mercibus ejusmodi

(14) Sclopp. ibid.
pag. 341, 342.

(15) Sclopp. ibi
supra, pag. 343.

dicted to Slander, which he shewed by his Account of Germany [F]. The way of writing a Panegyric, which is ascribed to him, has been put in practice by several Orators [G].

(16) Ibid. pag. 345. 'modi onusti, plurimumque sibi de tantarum rerum scientia . . . gratulantes, consummatissimos politicos se factos putant (16). Besides Eremita set up for a consummate skill in Affairs of Government, and promised a Commentary which was to excel all that had ever been written upon Tacitus. 'Parum adhuc profecisse se putat nisi etiam Florentinis imponat, seque ingentem Statistam, quem vulgo dicunt, sive politicum & civilis scientiæ imprimis gnarum videri faciat. Eo consilio passim jactat, se commentarios politicos in Tacitum moliri, quibus cornicoculum configat (17). — He thinks the Progress he has made insufficient, unless he can impose likewise on the Florentines, and persuade them that he is a great Statesman, and profound Politician. In order thereto he has given it out in all Places, that he is composing Political Remarks upon Tacitus, which shall cut out all that have gone before them.' He hated the Inquisition exceedingly, and had wrote a Letter to the Great Duke's Secretary, in which he terribly inveighed against the Inquisitors, who had forced him to retrench several things in his Panegyric which they judged to be impious and void of Christianity. 'Atque quidem specimen vel hodie Panegyricus ejus nobis exhiberet, nisi non pauca, im-pietatem & omnis Christianæ religionis vacuitatem redolentia Inquisitores inde sustulissent: quod quidem usque eo Eremitæ doluit, ut Epistola Laurentio Usimbardo Magni Ducis Secretario inscripta do-lentissimè & rabiosissimè in Inquisitorum ruditatem, barbariem, inficitiam ac Tyrannidem invectus fuerit (18). — His Panegyric would at this Day have given us a Proof of his Atheism, had not the Inquisitors lopped off a multitude of its Parts, that favoured strong of Impiety and Irreligion; which so much vexed Eremita, that in his Letter to Laurence Usimbardo, Secretary to the Grand Duke, he exclaimed most furiously against their Ignorance, Barbarity, and Tyranny.' Fear of what might come made him hate that formidable Tribunal, no less than his Resentment for what was past. He got an ugly Distemper among the Women, and from that time he turned his Amours another way. 'Criminis nomine quàm habeat Eremita, cur ab Inquisitione metuat, nequa-quàm ignorant ii, qui eum sciunt, ex quo Scabiem ei Gallicam affricuit

(17) Id. ibid. 'ftris atque valvis, in cubiculum earum ut admitte-retur contendit, ac postquam nihil profecit, irritus & exclusus ostium occutare, ac benè diu turpissi-mum ante ædes convicium eis facere non desistit (21). But when he had seriously reflected upon the Incon-veniences of being burned alive, he relented a little to-ward the Ladies of Pleasure, and overlooked the fear of a second venereal Distemper. 'Mox tamen ut fa-tietatem hominis, postquam se alicubi in Magni ali-cujus amici flore Liberi faucisset, libido distenta rursum tentare cepit, quod à mala illa Bestia, quam Vivicomburium dicunt, male metueret, utcumque in gratiam cum Suburbanis puellis redit, & recidivi Gallicani illius morbi periculum infra fiduciam posu-it, fraudavitque animum dissidentem (22). As he treated the History of JESUS CHRIST as a Fable, he took a delight to rail against the Inquisitors and Cler-gy, of whom he had a thousand Stories to tell, which he expressed comically (23). One Day Scipio de la Scala, not being able to bear his abusive Tongue, boxed him sufficiently. 'Cum more suo Eremita scurraretur & de Inquisitorum fama atque honore ita, uti dixi, im-probissimè maledicentissimeque detrahere nec moni-tus desineret, Scaliger, qui tum aderat, scurram pug-nis & colaphis ita accepit, & os ejus ferreum adeo molle reddidit, ut, &c (24). This is the Idea Scioppius gives us of Daniel Eremita. I do not say whe-ther it is a true one or no; but this I know, that Scioppius was a very satirical Man. But Casaubon has told us (25) some things which make these Stories of Scioppius pretty probable.

(18) Ibid. pag. 351, 352. 'Famæ non nimium bonæ puella, Quales in media sedent Suburra, totî propemodum femineo, & quemadmodum ipse ferid censet, sequiori sexui inimicum esse factum, & illud Umbri Callimachi suum fecisse: Hostis si quis erit nobis, amet ipse puellas, Gaudeat in puero si quis amicus erit (19).

(19) Ibid. pag. 352. Another thing gave him an Aversion for the fair Sex. Being informed that a Company of Singing-Women were come to Florence at the time of the Great Duke's Marriage, in order to get something by playing on In-struments, and perhaps also by some less lawful Me-thods; he went with a rich Sicilian to their Lodg-ings, and did his utmost to be admitted into their Chamber; but not being able to succeed, to be re-venged of them, he sang a long time at their Door the most scandalous things he could invent. They complained of it to the Great Ducheis, which had such an Effect, that Eremita was committed to Pri-son, and would never have come out but to go to the Gallies, if Scipio de la Scala had not interceded for him: but by his Interest he escaped with the Strapado (20). 'Auxit ejus erga mulieres odium, quod propter ipsas non ut prius Penalem, sed pænè Capitalem in fraudem incidisse se persensit. Cum enim Cithari-strias sive Fidicinas quasdam mulieres satis speciosas, quæ occasione nuptiarum Magni Ducis ex arte, at-que haud scio an etiam ex corpore suo, quæstum facturæ Florentiam venerant, in hospitio Coronæ di-vertere accepisset, comite Sileio quodam Equite, eo-demque Lutheranò, quod is bene nummatus non minus in se lenonem ac perdustorem suum, quàm in ipsas amicas liberalis fore videretur, ad diversio-rium illarum venit, omnique vi diruptis pænè clau-

(20) Cum plus semel sursum Chorda sub-ductus ac vicif-sim demissus fuisset nec paulo molestius quam Petronii sui Eu-molpus oscilla-tionis genere lu-fisset — Having been several times bowled up by the Cord, and let down again, he underwent a more troublesome swing-ing Bout, than Eumolpus, in his favourite Petronius. Scioppius, in Opor. Grub. Am-phot. Sciop. pag. 360.

(21) Ibid. pag. 359. 'But when he had seriously reflected upon the Incon-veniences of being burned alive, he relented a little to-ward the Ladies of Pleasure, and overlooked the fear of a second venereal Distemper. 'Mox tamen ut fa-tietatem hominis, postquam se alicubi in Magni ali-cujus amici flore Liberi faucisset, libido distenta rursum tentare cepit, quod à mala illa Bestia, quam Vivicomburium dicunt, male metueret, utcumque in gratiam cum Suburbanis puellis redit, & recidivi Gallicani illius morbi periculum infra fiduciam posu-it, fraudavitque animum dissidentem (22). As he treated the History of JESUS CHRIST as a Fable, he took a delight to rail against the Inquisitors and Cler-gy, of whom he had a thousand Stories to tell, which he expressed comically (23). One Day Scipio de la Scala, not being able to bear his abusive Tongue, boxed him sufficiently. 'Cum more suo Eremita scurraretur & de Inquisitorum fama atque honore ita, uti dixi, im-probissimè maledicentissimeque detrahere nec moni-tus desineret, Scaliger, qui tum aderat, scurram pug-nis & colaphis ita accepit, & os ejus ferreum adeo molle reddidit, ut, &c (24). This is the Idea Scioppius gives us of Daniel Eremita. I do not say whe-ther it is a true one or no; but this I know, that Scioppius was a very satirical Man. But Casaubon has told us (25) some things which make these Stories of Scioppius pretty probable.

[F] He was inclined to Scandal; which he shewed by his Accounts of Germany.] The Letter he publish-ed relishes of Satire. Conringius does not determine whether the Scandals which are in it against certain Courts of the Empire are false; but he confesses they may make one blush. 'Nonnihil illa Epistola simile quid habet famosis Literis, siquidem quædam de Ger-manicis Principibus eorumque aulis scripsit, quæ pu-dorem incutiant. An falso an vero scripserit animo, nescio (26). I have already mentioned the Re-proaches Scioppius makes to Eremita for having divert-ed the Italians with Stories of the drunken humour he observed in Germany. It is a comfort to the Ita-lians, loaded with a thousand Satires on Account of their Letchery, to oppose their Sobriety to the Drun-kennels of the northern Nations, from whence proceed the Lampoons against them: and methinks even the religious Controversies are sometimes mixed with these mutual Reproaches. It cannot be denied that the Chri-tians of Europe are addicted to two great Vices, Drun-kennels and Lewdness. The first of these two Vices reigns in cold Countries, the other in hot: Bacchus and Venus in this manner dividing the Nations between them. It happens that the Reformation having di-vided into two this part of Christianity, the Portion subjected to Venus remains as it was before, but the best part of Bacchus's share has renounced Popery. From hence it is that Spain and Italy are more for-ward to run down Drunkenness, and to object it as a great Crime to the northern Nations (27); as if this could compensate for Crimes of Incontinency, and hinder one Religion from silencing the other by Reproaches of Immorality. The Question is not to examine here if Bacchus encroaches upon Venus, or Venus upon Bacchus (28). It is enough for me to have explained by this little Commentary the flattery of Daniel Eremita. Casaubon and Scioppius, so op-posite every where else, would easily have agreed in the chief Lines of his Picture. 'Homo procax & dicax, according to Casaubon (29), quales esse so-lent qui per gradus syncrètismi in apostasiam labun-tur. — He is a pert satirical Fellow, such as they usually are, who are gradually lead into Apo-stasy by ill Company.'

[G] The way of composing a Panegyric, which has been ascribed to him, is practised by many Orators.] That Method consisted in reading attentively the an-cient Panegyricists, and collecting their Phrases and Thoughts, and then applying them to the Subject they undertook to praise: this is the Practice of an in-finite number of People. There is in their Pieces scarce any Encomium which is not to be found in the ancient Panegyricists. Pliny has almost exhausted all

(26) Conringius, Dissert. MSS. Rerum PP apud Masgrium, Epo-nymol. pag. 320. (27) I have heard say, that a Fle-mish Monk told his Auditors, that God would judge Drunken-ness according to the Ideas of the Spaniards and Italians; and Lewdness accord-ing to the Ideas of the northern Nations. (28) See the Re-mark [I]. (29) Epist. cccclviii. pag. 551, apud Ma-grium, Epo-nymol. pag. 321. I quote this, be-cause it does not agree with the Edition I make use of.

The learned Conringius is mistaken, when he says that Eremita lived to old Age [H].

They are printing at Utrecht some small Pieces of Daniel Eremita, and among the rest, his Treatise de aulica & civili vita. They were in Manuscript in the Duke of Florence's Library, and thither the Original is to be returned as soon as the Edition is finished. Mr Grævius will confute in the Preface the Slanders of Scioppius; this he has promised me in a Letter he honoured me with in the Month of June 1699. For the rest, the words I used in one of my Remarks, viz. It is not the Question to examine here whether Bacchus encroaches more upon Venus, or Venus upon Bacchus (c), have induced a Man of Wit, and a great Traveller, to write me word, he could wish I had not omitted that Inquiry. He desired me to mention it in the second Edition, tho' it were only to refute certain things which he had often heard asserted in Spain and Italy. I cannot wholly comply with his Desire, nor absolutely refuse his Request, therefore shall add, below, some Collections and Notes relating to the Hints he has communicated to me [I].

Most

(c) In the Remark [F] of this Article. Citat. (28).

all the Ideas of the Perfection of a Prince. They little examine now, if the Prince they are to praise is adorned with the Qualifications so nobly expressed in ancient Authors: they suppose he has them; after this Supposition the Thoughts and Expressions cost them little; they are found ready made in other Panegyrics: all the Difficulty consists in making some little Alterations according to Times and Places. Daniel Eremita, if we may believe his Adversary, would have been strangely perplexed if he had had a second Panegyric to make a little after the first; for he exhausted all his Collections in the first, and he would have wanted a considerable time to gather fresh Flowers. Scioppius's Expressions are so fine that they deserve to be quoted here. 'Quoniam à multis jam annis legendis Panegyricarum Orationum Scriptoris vetustis, itemque Marcialis, Aufonii & similium præfatiunculis pedestri sermone contextis, quasdam sententiarum verborumque argutias floresque laboriosè compertat, Magni Ducis & Magdalene Austriacæ nuptias occasionem suam ratus est, qua suam facundiam illis, qui patricias artes istas ac solemnem Criticis hodierni fucum ignorant, venditaret. Edidit ergo panegyricum, in quo omnem suam scientiam ita consumpsit; ut si repente nec opinantur novæ alicujus Orationis scribendæ necessitas imposita fuisset, omnino jejunos, secus nudosque, & ab omni cum verborum . . . tum sententiarum quoque instructo fragitiosissime imparatus futurus fuerit &c (30).

(30) Scioppius, Oper. Græv. Amphot. Scloppian. pag. 338.

By reading for several Years the ancient Writers of Panegyrics, and the Prefaces of Martial, Aufonius, and such like, in Prose, he had writ much Pains thrown together some tolerable Turns, both of Words and Sentences. The Nuptials of the Grand Duke and Magdalene of Austria he thought was the fairest Opportunity to dispose of his Rhetoric to those that are unacquainted with that Patrician Cunning, and the common Drollery of modern Would-be-Critics. He therefore published his Panegyric, wherein he expended his whole Stock of Knowledge, so that had any sudden and unexpected Occasion obliged him to write an Oration, he would have been poor, insipid, jejune, and most terribly at a loss both for Words and the Management of his Periods.

[H] Conringius in making him live to old Age is mistaken. Scaliger and Cassaubon speak of him as a young Man in 1603 (31): and as he died in the Year 1613, he can never be spoke of in the manner Conringius has done. 'Diu in Italia vixit, ibique in aula Florentina tandem consenuit (32). — He lived a long time in Italy, and grew old in the Court of Florence.'

(31) See the Remarks [B] and [C].
(32) Conringius, Differt. MSS. Rerum PP. apud Magir. Eponymol. pag. 320.

[I] Some Collections and Notes relating to the Hints he has communicated to me. He wrote to me, that being upon the Spot in such places of Europe as are most devoted to the Roman Catholic Religion, he took a Pleasure in observing to them the enormous and unbridled Licentiousness which is predominant there. They perceived, that his Intent was to draw Consequences from this in favour of the Protestants: but they did not fail to tell him that he was mistaken; that Religion was not concerned in the Matter; that the Vices in question are Vices of the Climate, and not Vices of Religion; that if Italy was Protestant it would be addicted to the same Vices as at present, and that the same Judgment ought to be made of the northern Crowns if they were Catholics. They added, that the Catholics of Germany loved drinking neither more nor less than the Protestants of the same Country, and that the difference of Religion between the Poles and the Muscovites, does not hinder them from having a prodigious Inclination to Drunkenness (33). That however an Allowance is to be made. Forgive us, said they to him, our Failing for the sake of our Sobriety, and we will pass over your Drunkenness: you will get by the Change; for it will not be in favour of the Chastity of cold Countries that we shall forgive your Intemperance in drinking. Such a Chastity is a Chimera. They are as leud in the northern Countries as the southern, and all the Advantage that the former can claim respects only the Sin against Nature; for as for the other, it reigns there no less than in Italy. To prove this Paradox they alledged the Effects of good Chear and Wine. They confessed, that the Food in hot Countries is more juicy, and disperses the spirituous Parts more freely and plentifully over the whole Body, which Parts easily disengage themselves from the Flegm and heavy Parts by Digestion and Circulation: the Sun has already done half the Work before the Stomach begins to act. But what is wanting in the Quality of the Aliments in cold Countries, they make up in the Quantity. There they eat much, and drink more; whereas the Inhabitants of hot Countries eat but little, and instead of Wine they drink cooling Liquors; by which means they weaken the Powers of Venus just as the others augment them by their hard drinking. The Person who wrote me this was greatly surprized at such a Discourse as this; and as by his Travels, much more considerable than those of Ulysses, he has deserved the Elogy made upon that Greek Prince (34), viz. that he had compared the Customs of several Nations, he could not endure to be referred to Experience. Inform yourself of this, say they, from those who have travelled into cold Countries; they will tell you they have found the Fair Sex there more frail, and more easy to be prevailed upon, than in hot Countries. They wondered at the Easiness and Rapidity of their Conquests; they met the critical Moment after the first Request; and this makes them put the following good Advice among the Instructions they give those who travel to the same Places. When some Inconveniences, or other important Reasons, prevent you from improving the Opportunity, take care you do not press your Suit with the Ardour of a Man who would obtain what he asks; you may be taken at your Word, and Shame and Reproach will follow. Some pretend, continued they, that this Readiness to grant the last Favours does not proceed from Leudness, but from a simple, lazy, and easy Temper; but this is false; if you take away their Money, you would find them all Fire and Flame. Not at all, replied my Traveller, I know the Truth of the Matter, and that these are all idle Stories. This is the Substance of his Letter, and my Compilations, or Remarks, are as follow:

I. I shall cite, in the first Place, a Passage of Sorbiere, in which the Toleration, granted at Rome, for Houses of Prostitution, is compared with that in Holland for Drunkenness. This is one of the things Sorbiere answered, to confute the Hopes they had entertained, that his Journey to Rome would promote his return to the Protestant Communion. 'The Faults, says he, of some private Persons ought to do no Injury to the Public, nor the Licences of certain Governments affect

(31) See Matthias à Michow, lib. ii. cap. iii. de Sarmatia Europæa.

(34) Πολλῶν δ' ἀνθρώπων ἴδων ἅπαντα καὶ νόον ἔχων. Multorum autem hominum vidit urbes & mores cognovit. Wand' rince from Clime to Clime observed fr-y'd; Their Manners noted, and their States survey'd. Homer. Odyss. lib. i. ver. 3. See also Heracle de Arte Poetica, ver. 142, where he has translated that Greek Verse of the Odyssie, in this manner. Qui mores hominum reulorum vidit & urbes.

Most disinterested Persons will undoubtedly confess what he has asserted, That Leudnefs prevails * affect the Strictness which is observed in the Courts of Conscience, where that is condemned which the Reasons of a wife Government do not punish with temporal Penalties with the same Rigour. You need not doubt, Sir, that what I hint to you, and which it seems you reproach Italy with, has been often examined, and that by good old Men, who had no Interest in the Connivance, and that if human things had been capable of the Perfection which you do well to wish for, they would not have endeavoured it in this Particular. But in every Country Men have vicious Inclinations, and private Intemperances, which it is very hard to correct, without running the hazard of spoiling some other things which are useful. It is for this Reason, in my Opinion, that in all the North Sobriety is esteemed a small Virtue, or at least Drunkenness is tolerated, if not counted a Piece of Gallantry, and the Effect of indispensable Civility. And yet this does not hinder you from thinking, that the true Religion is harboured there. I know very well, that the Protestant Preachers declaim against it, but the Magistrates tolerate it; believing, with some Probability, that without a Permission of this Defect Men would remain in an unsociable State, as elsewhere they apprehend worse Vices than those they suffer. Courcelles, an Arminian Professor at Amsterdam, confuted that, among other Reasons, with this: That it is one thing to connive at a Vice, which it is impossible to root out, and another to authorize it by Laws, or public Permissions (35). And that, among Protestants, the Magistracy, and the Office of Pastor are not joined in one single Person, as they are in the Pope.

II. I say, in the second Place, that those, who accuse the Inhabitants of cold Countries with being as leud as the Inhabitants of hot Climates, leave them one great Advantage, since they except the Sin against Nature. But they were not satisfied with this Advantage in a Dispute which arose between a German and an Italian; the former pretending, that even with respect to Fornication in general, Italy was most disorderly. 'Lepida est inter Italum & Germanum altercatio . . . ille nimiam hanc bibendi consuetudinem, tanquam probrosam objiciebat, ille inconcessam Venereim exprobrabat, tanto perniciosiorem ebrietate, quanto leges severiores in eam latæ. Sed elegans Epigramma apponam:

Ut nos vina juvant, sic vos Venus improba vexat, Proposita est Veneri Julia, nulla mero (36).

(36) Dempsterus, Parolipom. ad Rostinum de Antiqu. Romanis, lib. v, cap. xxx, pag. m. 266.

— There is a merry Dispute between an Italian and a German; . . . the former objected against the Excess of drinking as infamous. The other upbraided him with unlawful Love, by so much more pernicious, as the Laws against it were the more severe; I shall subjoin a beautiful Epigram:

Lust is your Curse, our Joys are sparkling Wine,
For there's no Julian Law against the Vine.

III. It is certain, that there are Travellers who have been such Lovers of Scandal, as to publish, that the Women have no great Virtue in cold Countries, but quickly yield to Temptation. I shall only cite a French Gentleman, whose Account has just been reprinted at Amsterdam. 'It is no extraordinary thing, says he (37), to see fine Women in Denmark: the Country Women are generally very pretty, and the young Girls are most of them very free, easy, and gay. . . . They set off their Hair in great Rolls. . . . Their fair Tresses would make an amorous Poet say many fine new Things. The Virtue of the Danish Women seems made for their Beauty: that is, it suffers them to use it, and will not let it be a useless Treasure; and yet this is not a vicious Inclination in them; it is a negligent Easiness, and I am persuaded that they sin only because they have not Power enough to forbid Men from sinning.' To this may be opposed the Testimony of another Frenchman, who assures us, that the Danish Women are so grave and modest, that they leave no hope to those who visit them. They lay no Snare for the Eye, says he, they neither show their Breasts nor Hair; they have nothing of

(37) Memoires du Chevalier de Beaujeu, liv. i, chap. ii, pag. 58, Edit. of Amsterdam, 1700.

the Coquet in their Walk or Gestures. He expresses all this with more Force in his Latin. 'Cæterum illæ sua nimia gravitate atque modestia omnem amorem, & familiaritatis spem, & occasionem excludunt. Nullæ ibi prætereunt oculis insidize tenduntur, nullum est incendendi, aut vibrandi sese lenocinium; non pectus detegunt, non capillos crispant, ac ne offendunt quidem (38).' This Writer deserves the more Credit, as upon other Occasions he has taken a Pleasure to expose the Incontinence of the People of the North; particularly he attacks the Clergy. He tells a Story (39) of an old Swedish Minister, who was in such a merry Humour, after having well emptied his large Cup, that he was heard to sing several leud Songs. This Minister was a Man of Learning, and had a Daughter who spoke Latin. He used to divert himself with other Women, though he had a Wife of his own. The Author, upon this, makes the following Reflexion, viz. that Luther was in the wrong to pretend, that the Marriage of the Priests would restrain their Lasciviousness. 'Deprehendimus hujusmodi homines, tametsi litteratos, & fenes, & in oculis omnium positos, cum five vino, five cervisia incauerunt, non in ineptas tantum voces, sed in turpes etiam atque incestas efferri. Circumferatur (inquit) ille cantharus: adducatur virgo nuda. Atque hoc carmen canens repetebat, addebatque, en inquit, cantilena quam juvenes personabamus. Didicimus postea, illum hac etiam ætate petulco more in vices suas insilire. At enim uxorem habebat, in quam libidinem istam desumpere poterat. I nunc, & Luthero crede, nefandorum sacerdotum lasciviam matrimonio compesci posse (40).' The Author does not stop here; he adds several other things to his first Remark. It cannot be imagined, says he (41), how much the Love of drinking, and Women, prevails upon the greatest Part of these Men. As to the first, it is notoriously true, de potu manifestum est; and I have observed as to the second, that there is nothing they inculcate more upon the most virtuous Divines than the Necessity of Marriage, if they desire to live chastly and piously. 'De altero verò observavi, nihil magis castissimis Theologis inculcari, quam hanc matrimonii necessitatem omnibus, qui calce, ac pede vivere cupiant, esse subeundam. Hanc doctrinam adolescentulis ipsis, qui nondum puberes sunt, & nondum de Venere cogitant, in infimis scholis insinuant (42).' They insinuate this Doctrine in the lowest Classes to the School-boys, who, being of a tender Age, have no Thoughts of Love. They spread among the People a false Report, that Pope Urban VIII proposes to marry, and that all the Cardinals have the same Intention. Eo denique amentie ac impudentie deventerunt perversissimi Doctores, ut apud populum rumores spargant, Urbanum hunc VIII. Pontificem Romanum de uxore ducenda cogitare, idemque consilium omnium Cardinalium animos subuisse; quam stolidissimam fabulam non in hac modo Suecia, quæ longius ab hominibus abest, sed jam in ipsa Dania audieramus (43). Is not this to insinuate, that, according to these Doctors, the Reformation of the Church would not be carried on in an auspicious manner, unless it began by abolishing Celibacy, and by the Celebration of the Marriage of the Sovereign Pontiff, and all the Members of the sacred College? And is not this to pretend, that those very Doctors prove in their own Persons such an Incapacity of abstaining from the other Sex, that they think none can live chastly without Marriage? But let us go on to hear Mr Ogier. Another Minister, says he, excusing himself, that he could not lodge us so conveniently at his House as he could have wished, alledged, that he was almost quite ruined, and his Life was a Burden to him. When he was asked the Reason of it, he replied, I have lost my Wife: 'Suas quippe fortunas pene esse subverfas vitamque sibi invilam: cum rogarem, quid rei esset: uxorem, inquit, non habeo amplius (44).' Perhaps, said Mr Ogier, you are not allowed to marry a second time. I am allowed, returned he, sighing, but must wait till the Year of mourning is expired. The Author adds, that by considering what he had seen, and what he had inquired into, he judges, that the Law of Celibacy is the only Obstacle that hinders them from being reconciled to the Church of Rome. 'Hunc solum matrimonii & concubii obicem eos à nostra communione

(38) Carolus Gæsius, in Itinere Danico, pag. 344 35.

(39) Idem. in Itinere Suecico, pag. 209.

(40) Id. ibid.

(41) Mirum est tam potus, quam concubitus libido in plerisque his hominibus ardeat. Id. ibid.

(42) Id. ibid.

(43) Id. ibid. pag. 210.

(44) Id. ibid.

prevails more in hot countries than cold.

'munione dividere.' When he speaks so much to the Disadvantage of the Suedes, with respect to Continency, does he not deserve to be credited in the things he acknowledges concerning the Chastity of the Danish Women? So that I justly opposed Mr Ogier to the Sieur Beaujeu. I confess there is one specious Objection may be raised against me. Mr Ogier speaks of what he saw in the Year 1634, and the other of what he saw in the Year 1679. This is an Interval more than sufficient to change the whole Face of Affairs in the Republic of Decencies. The Modes, which tend to suppress the Laws of Austerity and Modesty, make so surprizing a Progress, that a Traveller, who goes twice into the same Country, thinks himself transported into a new World; for when he compares the Conduct of the Maids and young Wives with what their Mothers formerly observed, he sees almost a total Change.

EFFECTS of Wine with relation to Impurity.

IV. Generally speaking, there is nothing material to be said against what the Italians object, that Wine and good Cheer excite to Impurity: it is the constant Doctrine of the ancient Pagans and Fathers; confirmed by the experience of all Ages and Places. There is nothing the Ascetic Writers recommend with more vehemence, than fasting and abstinence to those who are devoted to Celibacy. Tertullian exaggerates almost every thing, and at last he proceeds to condemn several sorts of Food, and presses more than he ought the use of dry Meats. Nevertheless he ought not to be charged with an Hyperbole, when he observes the Connexion between Gluttony and Lust, by reminding us of the Situation of the Organs. But this is better represented in the Language he makes use of. 'Monstrum haberetur libido sine gula, cum duo hæc tam unita atque concreta sint, ut si disjungi omnino possent, ipsi prius ventri pudenda non adhererent. Specta corpus & una regio est. Denique pro dispositione membrorum ordo vitiorum: prior venter, & statim cetera signa substructa lascivia est: per edam citatem falacitas transit (45).' Clemens Alexandrinus remarks that, not to irritate the venereal Passion, it is good not to eat Flesh, and he quotes an Author who says, that Wine and Flesh render the Body more strong, and the Soul more weak. Τὰς δὲ αὖ τῶν γυναικῶν, καὶ ἀσκήσεως χάριν σαρκωδίας ἀποχόρτο, καὶ τὴν μὴ σφραγῆν περὶ τὰ ἀρετῆστα τὴν σάρκα. Οὐδὲ γὰρ, φησὶν Ἀνδρόκυδης, καὶ σαρκῶν ἐμπορεύσεις, σῶμα μὲν βρωματικὸν ἀπεργάζονται, ψυχὴν δὲ νοχλεστικὴν. Fortasse autem ex his, qui sunt præditi cognitione, exercitationis quoque gratia abstinerit à carnibus aliquis, & ne caro nimis luxuriat, & nimio impetu feratur ad rem Venerem. Vinum enim, inquit Androcydes, & carnis ingurgitationes, corpus quidem robustum efficiunt, animam verò debiliorem (46). There are several sentences in the Greek Poets of the same nature. Consult Erasmus upon the Proverb Sine Cerere & Baccho Friget Venus (47). Especially they judged that Wine prompted to Lechery, and from thence Aristophanes called it the Milk of Venus (48). The ancient Romans prohibited it very strictly to the Women, because they considered it as an incentive to Adultery: 'Vini usus olim Romanis feminis ignotus fuit, ne scilicet in aliquod dedecus prolaberentur: quia proximus à Libero patre intemperantiæ gradus ad inconcessam Venerem esse consuevit (49).'

(45) Tertullian, de Jejun. cap. i,
pag. 544.

(46) Clem.
Alexandr. Strom.
lib. vii. pag.
718. C.

(47) It is the
xxviii of the 111d Century of the 11d Cbistad.

(48) Athen. lib.
x, pag. 444.

(49) Valer.
Maxim. lib. ii.
cap. i, n. 5, pag.
m. 134.

(50) Martial.
Epigram. lxxvi.
lib. iv.

Villica vel duri compressa est nupta coloni
Incaluit quoties faucia vena mero (50).

When'er the Bowl had fir'd his bloated Veins,
The Farmer's Wife allay'd his lustful Pains.

(51) Cornel.
Nepos, in Vita
Alcibiad. sub fin.

(52) Janus Geb-
hardus.

(53) Theron Aristo-
phan. in Acharn.

The Thracians were anciently stigmatized as a Nation equally abandoned to drunkenness and leudness: 'Fuisse apud Thracas (Alcibiadem) homines vinolentos & rebulque veneris deditos (51).' They are Cornelius Nepos's Words. One of his Commentators (52) has collected together a great number of Authorities to prove the Connexion between those two Vices. He has cited a Scholiast (53), who says, that the Tradition of the Pballus joined to Bacchus was founded upon venereal Actions being a Consequence of Wine.

He does not forget Agrippina, that abominable Woman, who to preserve her Authority endeavoured to contract an incestuous Commerce with the Emperor her Son: she took her opportunity, when he had well drunk, to shew herself to him with all her Allurements, and made her first Steps (54).

All these things favour the Opinion of those who pretend that Lasciviousness obtains no less in the Northern, than in the Southern Climate: for it is certain they eat much more Flesh, and drink more Wine in cold Countries, than any where else: Nay, the strongest Wines are not sufficient; they also consume a prodigious quantity of Brandy, and take great care to feed upon Aliments proper to warm them. These are great Obstacles to Chastity. What Opinion then must one have of those young Women in Flanders, who drink down the Officers of a Garrison (55)? If their Heads are strong enough to bear a great deal of Wine without being drunk, does it follow that they are secured from passing to the other debauch? It is to be feared the strength of the superior part is the weakness of the inferior. And what is more likely than the supposed Answer of one of these Heroines of Bacchus to an Officer; If we were as much Mistresses of Love, as we are of Bacchus, you should not do your business so well as you do in this Country. If they had read Ovid, they would have known that the Bottle was long since looked upon as the great Rouser of Cupid.

(54) See Tacitus, Annal. lib. xiv,
cap. ii.

(55) See the Fo-
retteriana, pag.
177, and following, Dutch Edit.

Dant etiam positis aditum convivia mensis:

Est aliquid, præter vina, quod inde petas.

Sæpe illic positi, teneris adducta lacertis

Purpureus Bacchi cornua prebit amor.

Vinaque cum bibulas sparsere Cupidinis alas,

Permanet, & capto stat gravis ille loco.

Ille quidem pennas velociter excutit udas:

Sed tamen & spargi pectus amore noceat.

Vina parant animos, faciuntque caloribus aptos:

Cura fugit, multo diluiturque mero.

Illic sæpe animos juvenum rapuere puella:

Et Venus in vinis, ignis in igne fuit (56).

In Feasts, as at our Shows, new means abound,
More Pleasure there than that of Wine is found.

The Paphian Goddess there her ambush lays,

And Love betwixt the Horns of Bacchus plays.

There Cupid's purpl'd Wings no Flight afford,

But wet with Wine he flutters on the board.

He shakes his Pinions, but he cannot move,

Fix'd he remains and turns a maudlin Love.

Wine warms the Blood, and makes the Spirits flow;

Care flies, and wrinkles from the forehead go.

Love sparkles in the Cup, and fills it higher,

Wine feeds the Flames, and Fuel adds to Fire.

DRYDEN.

A German Writer I have quoted gives his Evidence in favour of the pretension of the Italians. He confesses two things: first, that Wine is the forerunner and incentive of Lust; secondly, that the coldness of the Air increases the Violence of this Passion, by turning inwards the heat of the Body, and that Wine is like Oil, which being diffused over the internal Fire, provokes it to a great vehemence. These are his Words (57): 'Ebricitatis pedissequa est Libido, Bacchusque certus Veneris hortator & armiger Apuleio appellatur, neque fortius homines in Venerem stimulantur, quam cum mero alioque generosiore potu incaluerunt. . . . Alterum (frigidò cœlo esse natum) intendendam ad libidinem non minimum conferre norunt omnes, præsertim cum interiore parte per frigoris cohibitus calor vino, quasi suffuso oleo, gravior succendatur' (58). Another German laments (59) the Corruption which reigns in certain Colleges among the Scholars, and says it is most remarkable in Suevia vinosa.

(57) Janus Geb-
hardus, Not. ad Cornel. Nepos.
in Alcib. n. 67,
pag. m. 154.

(58) Idem, ibid.
pag. 155.

(59) Lyfius, in Polygamia triumphat. pag.
352.

V. But,

V. But, here is one thing which does not favour the pretension of the Italians: they drink too much in cold Countries; and by this excess they destroy what Wine moderately taken had produced: the Remedy arises from the height of the Distemper; for as it is true that a Man elevated with Wine finds himself more inclined and disposed to transgress the Laws of Chastity; so it is also true that a Man perfectly drunk has no great disposition that way. Ovid, who was capable to give Aphorisms upon this subject, as certain as those of Hippocrates, shall be my voucher here.

Quid tibi præcipiam de Bacchi munere, quæris?
Spe brevius monitis expedire meis.
Vina potant animum Veneri, ni plurima sumas;
Ut stupcant multo corda sepulta mero.
Nutritur vento, vento refingitur ignis.
Lenis alit flammam, grandior aura necat.
Aut nulla ebrietas, aut tanta sit, ut tibi curas
Eripiat: si qua est inter utramque, nocet (60).

(60) Ovidius, de Remedio Amoris, sub. fin. ver. 803.

Would you that I my Thoughts on Wine declare, Short my Advice, and few my Precepts are.
With Moderation drank, it warms the Blood,
But the Heart sinks beneath too great a load.
A gentle breath of Wind but fans the Fire,
Whose Flames would in a ruder blast expire.
Drink not too deep; but if you should transgress Drown all your Cares; there is no Mean in Drunkenness.

I shall add to this the Testimony of a modern Author, whose Wit will be admired as long as there are good judges in the World. I speak of Michael de Montagne. He observes that they began to drink less in France: 'Is it, asks he (61), that in some things we are going to be reformed? Certainly no: but it may be that we are much more given to Fornication, than our Fathers. There are two things which destroy each other's vigour. One weakens the Stomach; and on the other hand, Sobriety serves to render us more complaisant, and proper for the exercise of Love.' I should be to blame if I did not cite the Great Aristotle, who says, that too much drinking disqualifies for the venerable Act, for which he gives several Reasons. Athenæus mentions this, in the place where he speaks of the Drunkenness of Alexander the Great, a Vice, says he, which perhaps was the Cause of his little Inclination to the Love of Women (62): Μή ποτ' ἐν δὴδ τῷτο ἡδὲ πρὸς τὰ ἀφροδίσια εἶχεν ὀρμὴν ἐκρυπτοῦσαι γὰρ ἦσαν οἱ Ἀλεξάνδρου ἐν τοῖς περὶ ἡμέραις συστικοῖς τῶν τοιούτων τὴν γοῶν. Ob immodicam forte illam vini appetentiam, ad Venerem ideo proclivis non fuit (Alexander) quoniam, ut explicat Aristoteles in questionibus physicis, hominum ejusmodi genitura in aquam eliquescat.

(61) Montagne, Essais, lib. II, cap. II, p. m. 20.

(62) Athen. lib. x, cap. x, pag. 434.

VI. Upon the whole, I think it cannot be denied that the Vices of the South make more Progress in the North, than the Northern Vices do in the South; and consequently it must be said that Bacchus does not encroach upon Venus, so much as the latter does upon

Bacchus. Drunkenness is abhorred in most of the hot Countries; it is looked upon as infamous: the most outrageous Name you can give to a Spaniard is to call him Drunkard; and I have been told, that if a Master should call his Footman by that Name, he might complain to the Magistrates, and have satisfaction, though otherwise he bears with great patience, and without a Right of complaining, the Terms of Rascal, Scoundrel, Dog, &c. It does not appear that Fornication is treated in this manner in any Country in the World: Men in the most frozen Parts are at Liberty to divert themselves in amorous sports, without any injury to their Reputation, and, far from being ashamed of it, they glory in it, and ridicule those who live otherwise. The Empire of Venus ought not, like the Earth, to be divided into five Zones, one Torrid, two Temperate, two Frigid: they are all Torrid Zones, with this only difference of more and less (63). Never Monarchy was more universal than this; no corner of the World has been exempt from the Yoke of it: there are some particular Persons who aspire to a state of Independence, and who even bind themselves by a Vow not to acknowledge this Sovereign; but they are sometimes the most faithful subjects of that Empire. The Pagans professed to believe that the Monarchy of Venus extended farther than that of any other Deity. Heaven was the lot of Jupiter, Neptune ruled in the Sea, and Pluto in Hell; but Venus governed in all those three Worlds, the whole animated Nature being her Lot:

(63) Compare the Remark [E] of the Article BO-REAS.

Illis, quibus superas omnes, cape tela, Cupido, Inque Dei pectus celeres molire sagittas,
Cui triplicis cessit fortuna novissima regni.
Tu superos, ipsumque Jovem, tu numina ponti:
Tartara quid cessant? cur non matrisque, tumque
Victa domas, ipsumque regit qui numina ponti.
Imperium profers! agitur pars tertia mundi.

Dixit Venus. Ille pharetram

Solvit, & arbitrio matris de mille sagittis
Unam seposuit: sed quâ nec acutior ulla,
Nec minus incerta est, nec quæ magis audiat arcum:
Oppositoque genu curvavit flexile cornu,
Inque cor hamata percussit arundine Ditem (64).

(64) Ovidius, Metam. lib. v, ver. 365.

Go send a conquering dart

At once quite thro' the gloomy Tyrant's Heart.
Great Jove himself, and all the Gods above,
Neptune, and all his Court submit to Love.
Shall Hell be free? Enlarge our Empire, Boy,
Let's now at length the World's third part enjoy.

She spoke, the winged Boy, with eager cares,
One, and the surest, swiftest shaft prepare:
Then bends and shoots; the whirling Reed soon found,
And on his Heart impress'd a fatal wound.

ESCHYLUS, in Latin Æschylus, a Tragic Poet, was of Athens [A]. There are a thousand Disputes about the Year of his Birth [B]; but it may be certainly known when

(A) Suetonius, lib. vi, cap. xix.

[A] He was of Athens. Macrobius (1) who makes him a Sicilian is mistaken: nor can it be said he speaks of another Æschylus; for he speaks of him who made a Tragedy intitled Ætina. Now it is certain that he who wrote that Tragedy is the same with him that was vanquished by Sophocles, and who, out of vexation, banished himself from Athens his native City, and retired to Hiero, King of Syracuse. Hiero built at that time the City of Ætina, which was the reason of Æschylus's writing a Tragedy of that Name (2). The learned Giraldi would not have stumbled as he has done, if he had minded this particular. He pretends (3) that the Æschylus of Macrobius was of Sicily, and different from him of whom we have some Tragedies extant. Nay, he does not know whether Athenæus did not speak of that other Sicilian Æschylus, in saying (4) that Æschylus made use of Sicilian Terms. I do not understand the meaning of these words, Fuit

(2) Scholiastes, in Vita Æschyli.

(3) In D'alogis, Post. Græc.

(4) Athen. lib. ix.

Cyrenæus (Æschylus) familiaris Callimachi. Athenæus lib. viii. They are in Valerius Maximus Variarum upon the twelfth Chapter of the ninth Book. They are ascribed to Colerus.

[B] There are a thousand disputes upon the Year of his Birth. The Life of Æschylus composed by his Scholiast imports that he was born in the XLth Olympiad, and gave proofs of his valour in the Battle of Salamis. These two Facts are incompatible: for that Battle was fought the last Year of the LXXIVth Olympiad (5). Could Æschylus behave like a good Soldier at the Age of 140 Years, or thereabouts? It is not disputed among the Critics whether the number of forty has been soited into the Life of Æschylus by ignorant Transcribers: all confess it; but the question is what other number to substitute in the room of this. Casaubon (6) makes it 63; Samuel Petit (7) 65; Meursius (8) 70. This last Opinion cannot be defended,

(5) According to others, the first of the LXXVth Olympiad. A difference, which may arise from the last Months of an Olympiad, and the first of the following, answering to the same Year of the Romans.

(6) De Satyricis Poëtis, lib. i, cap. v, apud Stanleium Not. in Æschyl. pag. 702, 703.

(7) Miscellan. lib. iii, cap. xiv, apud eund. ibid.

(8) De Archont. apud eundem, pag. 704.

(a) Scholiastes, in Vita Æschyl.

(b) Fought the second Year of the LXXIII Olympiad.

(c) In the Lives of the Greek Poets. See also Mr. Baillet, Jugem. sur les Poètes, Tom. 1, pag. 143, & seq.

when he flourished, since it is agreed (a) he signalized his Courage at the Battles of Marathon (b), Salamis and Platea. He informed the public that he applied himself to the writing of Tragedies by the command of Bacchus [C]. Some have said, that he never set himself to work till he was drunk [D]. They meant perhaps that he indulged in such a manner the raving Transports of his Imagination, that he wrote more like a Man in Liquor than like a sober Man. The Character of his Genius has been admirably well drawn by Mr le Fevre of Saumur (c). This Poet is not indeed the Inventor of Tragedy; but he made several Alterations in it [E], which carried it so near to Perfection, that he deserves more Praise than those that preceded him. Upon some Occasions he did not shew respect enough to Religion, which drew upon him a Prosecution that had like to have been fatal to him [F]. The vexation to see his Plays less acceptable

ed, since Æschylus signalized himself at the Battle of Marathon the second Year of the LXXIII Olympiad, according to the Author of his Life. Vossius corrects it as Mæurius does, and, not to be perplexed with the objection, he supposes that the Scholiast has marked, not his Birth, but the flourishing State of Æschylus (g). But this is wrong; the Scholiast uses the word γεννηθείς. Stanley, depending upon the Arundelian Marbles, places the Birth of this Poet in the fourth Year of the LXXIII Olympiad. According to these Marbles Æschylus died at the Age of sixty nine Years, when Callias was Archon, that is to say, the first Year of the LXXXth Olympiad. The Consequence that Stanley (10) draws from this principle is right. Mr Barnes, in the Life of Euripides, follows the same Marbles relating to the Life of Æschylus.

[C] He informed the Public that he applied himself to the writing Tragedies by the command of Bacchus.] When he was a Youth he was sent into the Country to look after the Vineyards. He dreamt one Night that Bacchus commanded him to write Tragedies: as soon as it was day he obeyed the Deity, and happily succeeded in it without any trouble. Ἐφ' ἧ δὲ Αἰσχύλου μυστικὸν ἐν καθύδρῳ ἐν ἀγρῷ φυλάσσον σαρκῶδες, καὶ οἱ Διόνυσον ἐπιστάτα καλεῖσθαι τετραγῳδίαν ποιεῖν. ὡς δὲ ἢ ἡμέτερος (πεῖθεσθαι γὰρ εἰδέναι) ῥῆσα ἢ δὴ παρρησιῶν ποιεῖν. Hoc autem ipse de se scriptum reliquit, pueri sibi olim dum uvas custodiret, in agro dormienti Bacchum imperasse ut tragediam scriberet, seque cum primum illuxisset dicto audientem periclitatum quid in ea se posset, omniaque se minimo negotio consecutum (11).

[D] Some say he did not set about his Work till he was drunk.] This is what Chameleon had observed in his Book of the Life of Æschylus. Μεθύων δὲ ἐποίησε τὰς τετραγῳδίας Αἰσχύλου, ὡς φησι Χαμελέον (12). From hence they reproached him with making good Tragedies without knowing what he did. Sophocles gives him this rub: Σοφοκλῆς ἐν ὀνειδίζεν αὐτῷ ὅτι εἰ καὶ τὰ δέοντα ποιεῖ, ἀλλ' οὐκ εἰδώς γὰρ. Quapropter et Sophocles objectit etiam si ea traderet scriptis quæ oporteret, id tamen inscientem facere (13). He was happy to hit the point of perfection by chance, and in the dark, which so many others can never do with all their Study.

There is another fault objected to him, that he was the first who introduced drunken Folks into a dramatic Performance, as if he would justify his own defects by imputing them to the Heroes of his Tragedy (14). Chameleon is not the only witness to be called for this; Callisthenes having said the same thing. Οὐ γὰρ ὡς τὸν Αἰσχύλον δὲ Καλλισθένης ἐφ' ἧ λέγων, τὰς τετραγῳδίας ἐν οἶνῳ γράφειν, ἐξορμῶντα καὶ ἀναδερμαίνοντα τὴν ψυχὴν. Non enim ut Æschylum dixit alicubi Callisthenes tragedias scripsisse quum vino prolutus incalesceret (15). Plutarch relates the same, and pretends that all Æschylus's Pieces, not excepting that which they looked upon as an Enthufiasm of the God Mars (16), were the effect of a Bacchic Inspiration (17). To avoid all Equivocation, I must inform the Reader, that by a Bacchic Inspiration, I mean a real and true Drunkenness without Metaphor, and not such transports as Horace mentions in the nineteenth Ode of the second Book, and in the twenty fifth of the third, where it is plain he means the Enthufiasm of the God of Poetry. See Mr Dacier's Commentary: where you will find that Bacchus and Apollo were the same God.

[E] He made several Alterations in Tragedy.] Horace has not taken notice of them all:

Ignotum tragicæ genus invenisse Camœnæ

Dicitur, & plaustris vexisse poemata Thep̄is Quæ canerent agerentque peruncti sæcibus ora.
Post hunc personæ pallæque repertor honestæ
Æschylus, & modicis intravit pulpita tignis,
Et docuit magnumque loqui, nitique cothurno (18)

*Thep̄is, the first Professor of the Art,
In Baskins taught to tread; his Stage a Cart, His Actors grim with filth, and rude in every part.*

*Next Æschylus did greater Art express,
He built a Stage and taught them how to dress;
In decent Motions he his parts convey'd,
And taught them how to look like what they play'd.*

Upon which Mr Dacier makes this Note. 'It is not so easy to invent as to add to the Inventions of others. The Alterations that Thep̄is had made in Tragedy, gave Æschylus an occasion to make new ones, and more considerable. He gave his Actors a Mask: for persona is here a Mask, and not a person or Actor, dressed them in trailing Robes, put Baskins upon their Feet; instead of a Cart, got a Stage built of a moderate height, and changed entirely the file, which became grave and serious, whereas before it was burlesque, λέξις γελοία; but I wonder that Horace says nothing of the more important Alterations which Aristotle attributes to Æschylus; for he says in his Treatise of Poetry, that he added an Actor to that of Thep̄is, that he diminished the Songs of the Chorus, and that he invented a first Part, πρῶταγωνιστὴν λόγον. This deserved to be mentioned (19). They ascribe to Æschylus an Innovation little consistent with his Poetic Rapture. The Ancients give him the praise of being the first to remove from the Eyes of the Spectators all Murders and terrible Objects (20). So then it was he that first practised the rule of not staining the Stage with Blood. Mr Dacier pretends that those who find this rule not observed in Æschylus's Tragedies, are mistaken. Concerning what he says after Aristotle, that Æschylus diminished the Chorus, I have one word to add. An unhappy accident gave occasion to this Reform. In the Tragedy of the Eumenides (a piece of Æschylus) the Chorus composed of fifty Persons appearing upon the Stage in frightful Habits (21) so terrified the Spectators, that the Women with Child miscarried, and the Children swooned away. Whereupon a Law was made, reducing the number of the Chorus to fifteen (22). Philophrastus (23) hath spoken very advantageously of the Reformation of the Stage, invented and perfected by Æschylus. The Decorations, the Machines, Tombs, Altars, Apparitions, Furies, and Trumpets, which appeared upon the Stage were the invention of this Poet (24).

[F] He did not shew respect enough to Religion upon some occasions, which drew upon him a Prosecution that had like to have been fatal to him.] He had been condemned for an impious Man, on account of a dramatic Piece, and they were upon the point of stoning him, when his Brother Amyntas turning up his sleeve, shewed the People that he had lost a Hand in the Service of the Common-Wealth. Amyntas, had been maimed in this manner at the Battle of Salamis, where he had signalized himself above all the Athenians (25). The Judges, in consideration of his Valour, and the Friendship he expressed to his Brother, shewed mercy to Æschylus, and acquitted him in this manner. Ælian tells the Story (26). I have read somewhere (27) that he would have been stoned upon the Stage, if he had not fled

(18) Hæret. de Arte Poet. ver. 275.

(16) Dacier, in Horace, Tom. X, pag. 209, Edit. of Hæret.

(20) Dacier, ib. pag. 254, upon the Words of Horace. Nec pueri coram populo Mædem trucidet, &c. De Arte Poet. ver. 185.

(21) Æschylus was the first who put Serpents about the Heads of the Furies instead of Hair.

(22) See the Scholiast upon Aristophanes, in Equit. & Julius Pollux, lib. 10, cap. 37, apud Stenleum, pag. 704, 707.

(23) Philophrastus in Vita Apollinis, lib. vi, cap. vi.

(24) Vita Æschylus, Edition of Robertellus per Andr. apud Stenleum, pag. 702.

(25) See Dionysius Siculus, lib. 2, cap. xxvii.

(26) Var. Hæret. lib. 8, cap. xix.

(27) Apud Beroneum, Not. ad Malale Chronic. con. pag. 14.

(g) Vossius, de Poet. Græc. pag. 23.

(10) Not in Æschyl. pag. 704.

(11) Pausanias, lib. 1, pag. 19.

(12) Athen. lib. 3, pag. 22, & lib. 2, pag. 423.

(13) Id. ibid.

(14) Athen. lib. 2, pag. 423.

(15) Lucian. in Demosthenis Encomio, Oper. Tom. II, pag. m. 924.

(16) It is intitled, Ἐπτα ἐξ Ὁδυσσεύς. See contra Thebais.

(17) Plut. Symposium lib. vii, Cum. 2, x, pag. 715. Stanley, Not. in Æschyl. pag. 701, has very ingeniously referred this Palætes instead of μυστικόν Ἀρσένος ἔνθα Ἀρσένος.

acceptable to the Athenians than those of Sophocles, who was much younger than himself [G], made him leave his Country and retire to Hiero, King of Syracuse (d). This is not without it's Difficulties [H]. He lived but three Years after his Arrival in Sicily fled to the Altar of Bacchus, and that afterwards they accused him before the Judges for reflecting in one of his Tragedies upon the Mysteries of Ceres. Plato is much in the right, for not allowing any Tragedies to be acted, in which the Gods are abused, as they were in some Verses he cites: he also forbids the Tutors to use such Books for the instruction of their Pupils (28). The Verses I speak of were Æschylus's. In which he cruelly rallies the Gods: introducing Theitis as speaking almost in this manner. * Apollo on my Wedding-day sung a Hymn, in which he assured me, that I should have a Son that should live long without any Distemper; he filled me with joy by his Praises and the great hopes he gave me. I thought he would have been a true Prophet, and yet it is he himself that has killed my dear Son. No Men take so much Liberty in broaching impious Maxims, as those who write dramatic Pieces; for if you call them to an account for it, they may answer that they only make the prophane, or those that are enraged with their Fortune, speak according to the Rules of Probability. It is very certain that the Author of a Tragedy ought not to be charged with believing every thing he exhibits: but there are some affectations which discover what may be put to his account: however there are certain Plays, which may justly be prohibited the Stage, whether the Author does or does not declare his own sentiments therein. Cirano Bergerac inserted some Impieties in his Agrippina, which caused it to be suppressed (29).

[G] His Pieces pleased the Athenians less than those of Sophocles, who was much younger than himself. This is a disgrace to which the greatest Authors are subject. Some raise themselves in such a manner above their Rivals, that the public Voice loudly proclaims their Sovereignty in the Science they have cultivated. One reigns in dramatic Pieces, another in Romances, &c: unhappily, this Empire is not always for Life. There comes a rising Sun, who by little and little draws all the applause to himself; and then the great Author, who wore the Crown many Years, sees himself degraded by a young Man, which is as a hundred stabs to him, against which it is but a poor comfort to him to complain of the ill taste and injustice of the Public, and to appeal from them to the judgment of Posterity (30).

The Poet, who describes so well the disadvantages of a long Life (31), ought not to have forgot that it exposes Authors of the first Rank to this terrible disgrace. They ought to die as soon their Glory is arrived at it's Meridian, and not give time to a new Star to gain an ascendancy over them (32). However it is pretended, that Sophocles's triumph over Æschylus was attended with a remarkable Circumstance. The Contest had been appointed in honour of a famous Solemnity which was then celebrating (33). Cimon, who was chief Actor in this Festival, nominated the Judges, one of each Tribe, and this was the first time Sophocles had presented a dramatic Piece to the Public. What a killing blow must this be to Æschylus, to see himself vanquished by a first Essay, he, a Veteran, covered over with Glory, and proud of several poetical Triumphs! This made him fly from his Native Country.

*Nίκησαν δὲ τὸ Σοφοκλῆς, λέγεται τὸν Αἰσχύλον περὶ τῇ γένεσιν καὶ βαρύνει ἐν τῇ πόλει, χρόνον ἢ πολὺν Ἀθηνῶν διαγαγὼν, εἰς οὐρανὸν δὲ ὄρνυ' εἰς Σικελίαν, ὅπου καὶ τελευτήσας περὶ Γέλαν τὴν πατρίαν. Victore Sophocle, Æschylum fama tenet discruciatum, atque id iniquo animo ferentem non diu Athenis hæsisse, inde profectum fuisse ex indignatione in Siciliam, ubi defunctus quoque & circa Gelam humatus est (34). — It is said, that, after the Victory had been obtained by Sophocles, Æschylus did greatly and highly resent the affront: he stayed not long at Athens, but went into Sicily, where he died and was buried near Gela.* The Scholiast relates this; it is true he adds that others will have it that it was Simonides, and not Sophocles who triumphed over Æschylus. The Dispute between Simonides and Æschylus was not of Tragedy against Tragedy, but of Elegy against Elegy. Wherein Simonides contended on his strong, and Æschylus on his weak side. A gigantic Imagination like that of Æschylus, a turn of Wit like his, his Affectation of the strained Sublime, were not fit for Elegy (35). It is observed that Women in love never appeared in his Tragedies; he would have drawn that Passion ill: but he was inimitable when he was to represent a Woman transported with Fury. * Fœminam amantem nunquam exhibuit, sicut ab Aristophane in Ranis oblatum est: at in exprimenda infania usque ad stuporem simul & commilationem elicendum, qui Castandæ orationem in Agamemnone legerit nemo unquam superatum agnosceret (36). As to the rest, it must be confessed the subject of that Elegy was favourable to Æschylus; for it was to be composed in honour of those who lost their Lives at the Battle of Marathon: now he had a particular concern in that Battle, having given proofs of his Courage therein, and he preferred the Glory of that to all he had acquired by his Verses: See the following Remark. I must observe, by the way, that every body has not understood Suidas, when he said that Æschylus retired into Sicily, because the Benches broke while one of his Tragedies was acting. Some have taken it in a literal Sense, not considering that in such a sense the Adventure would do a great deal of honour to Æschylus; it would be a sign that his Pieces drew such a Crowd of Spectators together, that the seats not being able to bear them broke under them. The thing must be taken as Scaliger has understood it; that is to say, that Æschylus's Play, upon this occasion, was condemned and exploded. Eamden forsan occasionem innuit Suidas qui Æschylum in Siciliam demigrasse refert, quod dum fabulam exhibuerit ruerent subsellia sua τὸ μέγεθ' ἢ τῇ ἰσχύϊ ἐπιδεικνυμένων αὐτοῦ, Subsellia frangere dicebatur, qui ut Comici loquuntur non fletit, sed excidit, hoc est non placuit, sicut à viro doctissimo Josepho Scaligero jam diu monitum est Aulon, lect. Nec me movet quod alii aliter Juvenalis verba fregit subsellia versa, sunt interpretati (37).

[H] This is not without it's difficulties. I have already said, that according to the Arundelian Marbles the Birth of Æschylus must be placed in the last Year of the LXIII Olympiad, and his Death in the first Year of the LXXXIII. Now according to Diodorus Siculus (38) we must place the Death of Hiero in the second Year of the LXXXVIII Olympiad: therefore it is not true, as so many People affirm, that Æschylus retired to King Hiero, and died three Years after. He survived that Prince about twelve Years. I know not whether we might not suppose that he retired twice into Sicily, and that the Authors who speak of him do not distinguish those two Journeys. It is agreed that the Victory Sophocles obtained over him forced him to go to Hiero's Court. At which time Sophocles began to enter the Lists, and might be about twenty eight Years old. This dispute falls upon the last Years of the LXXVII Olympiad. Hiero died three Years after more or less. It is probable that Æschylus upon the loss of so good a Patron left Sicily, and returned into his own Country, from whence he was driven again by some fresh discontents some Years after. What better retreat could he choose than Sicily, where no doubt he had left some Friends when he departed from it the first time? Note, it was the Inhabitants of Gela that built him a Monument (39). If Hiero had been then alive, would he not have had the Honour of that Monument? And it is probable he would have built it in Catanea his favourite City, which he had ordered to be called Ætina (40). Here is a new difficulty. In the beginning of the LXXVI Olympiad (41), he would have the City of Catanea change both it's Name and Inhabitants, and hastened the settlement of that new City. Now Authors say that when Æschylus retired to Hiero's Court, he found him busy in building the City of Ætina, and that he made a Poem upon this new Town. He did not then retreat thither out of vexation at Sophocles's triumph; for that young Poet did not vanquish him till after the middle of the LXXVII Olympiad (42). Of all the parts of ancient History, that which concerns learned Men is without Contradiction the most confused, and the most inaccessible to the exact Calculations of a Chronologer.

(28) Plato, de Resub. lib. ii. sub fin.

(29) Ser la Guerre des Auteurs, par Gucret, pag. m. 155.

(30) This is what Æschylus did when he fell. I confess, said he, my Works to Time. Athen. lib. viii, pag. 374.

(31) Juvenal. Sat. X, ver. 190, & seq.

(32) Hæc data poena diu viventibus. Id. ibid. ver. 243.

(33) It was the Discovery and Translation of the Bones of Theus. Plat. in Cimonæ, pag. 483.

(34) Plot. lib. F.

(d) Scholiast. in Vita Æschyli.

(35) See Mr le Fevre, in the Life of Æschylus.

(36) Stanleyus, pag. 706. The Passage of Aristophanes, in Ranis, is in the second Scene of the fourth Act, pag. 243.

(37) Stanleyus, pag. 707.

(38) Died Scul. lib. xi, cap. lxxv.

(39) See the Remark [I].

(40) Diod. Sicul. lib. xi, cap. xlix.

(41) Ibid.

(42) Anno tertio Olympiadis septuagesime septime. Samuel Petit. Miscellon. lib. iii, cap. xviii, pag. 173.

Sicily. The Inhabitants of Gela erected a Monument to him with a fine Inscription [I]. The Athenians publickly expressed the particular Esteem they had for his Tragedies [K]. We have but seven of them remaining, tho' he composed a very great number: The best Edition of Eschylus, is that of London in 1663 [L]. See in

[I] The Inhabitants of Gela erected a Tomb for him with a fine Inscription. The Words of the Scholiast who has written the Life of Eschylus are. Ἀποθανόντα δὲ Γελῶσι πολυτελῶς ἐν τοῖς δημοσίοις μνημασι θάψαντες, ἐτίμησαν μέγα λοπρεπῶς ἐπιγράφαντες ὕτως:

Αἰσχύλον Εὐφορίωνος Ἀθηναῖον τόδε κεύθει
Μνῆμα καταφθίμενον πυροφόροιο Γέλαι.
Ἀλλήν δ' εὐδόμενον Μαραθῶνιον ἄλσος ἀνείποι Καὶ βαθυχαυτῆις Μῆδος ἐπισαμνῶ.

Mortuum Geloi inter publica monumenta sepelientes magnificè honorarunt, hoc inscribentes Epitaphium:

Euphorione patre & patria Eschylus ortus Athenis
Mortuus ad læti conditur arva Gelæ,
Virtutis specimen, Marathonie campe, fateris Atque experte tuo, Mede comate, malo.

The Inhabitants of Gela buried him in a magnificent Manner amongst the Public Monuments, and inscribed this Epitaph on his Tomb.

Eschylus, Euphorion's Son, whom Athens bore, Lies here interred on Gela's fruitful Shore.
The Plains of Marathon his Worth record,
And heaps of Medes, that fell beneath his Sword.

Pausanias does not leave us room to doubt that Eschylus himself was the Author of this Epitaph. I shall produce his Words, because Remulus Amasæus has misunderstood them. Φρονῆσαι δὲ Ἀθηναίους ἐπὶ τῇ νίκῃ ταύτῃ μαλιστα εἰκόλει. Καὶ δὴ καὶ Αἰσχύλος, ὅς οἱ τὸ βίῃ προσεδόκατο ἢ τελευτῇ, τῶν μὲν ἄλλων ἐμνημόνευσεν ἰδένος δόξης ἐς τοσούτον ἥκων ἐπὶ ποίνῃσι. καὶ πρὸ Ἀρτεμισίου καὶ ἐν Σαλαμῖνι ναυμαχίας δὲ δὲ, τὸ τε ὄνομα προτίδεν, καὶ τὴν πόλιν ἔγραψεν, καὶ ὡς τῆς ἀνδρείας μάρτυρας ἔχοι τὸ Μαραθῶνιον ἄλσος καὶ Μῆδων τὰς ἐς αὐτὸ ἀποβάτας. Nullam autem fuisse viatoriam qua sint magis Athenienses gloriati, quam ea quam ex Marathonica pugna sunt adepti, hinc præcipuè ut credam adducor; quid Eschylus, cum propè jam esset ut à vita decederet, qui de seipso antè proposita conticuerat, vir tanta in pœssi nominis celebritate, cuiusque virtus navalibus præliis antè ad Artemisium & Salaminem enituerat, de Marathonica pugna cum suum carmen ederet, in ipsa operis fronte suum & patriæ nomen inscripsit: Marathonium enim salum, & Persas qui illuc descenderunt, suæ testes virtutis citat (43). The Translator, in my Opinion, is three times mistaken. I. When he says that Eschylus never spoke of himself before. II. In presupposing that That Poet signalized himself at the Naval Battle of Artemisium, and that of Salamis, before he did so at the Battle Marathon. III. When he imagines that Eschylus placed at the beginning of a Poem upon the Battle of Marathon, what is mentioned by Pausanias. This is not the drift of the Greek Author: his Design was to prove that the Victory of Marathon was that in which the Athenians gloried most; to this end he alleges that Eschylus, perceiving himself near Death, laid aside every thing else, and contented himself with writing his Name, and the Name of his Country, adding that Marathon and the Medes who lost their Lives there were the Evidence of his Valour. Nevertheless he had obtained great Fame by his Poems, and was present at the Battles of Artemisium and Salamis. When one compares the Words of Pausanias with the Epitaph of Eschylus, one cannot doubt that he had a view to that Epitaph. But if any one will obstinately question whether that Poet was the Author of the Inscription which the Inhabitants of Gela engraved upon the Tomb, he may be referred to Athenæus (44), who observes that Eschylus, having acquired a great Reputation by his Verses, yet did not make choice of that part of his Glory for the subject of his Epitaph, but rather what he had obtained by his Valour (45). For a Proof of this Athenæus quotes the two last Verses of the Epitaph mentioned above.

[K] The Athenians publickly expressed the Esteem they had for his Tragedies. They made a public Decree that his Tragedies should be acted after his Death, and he was the only one whose Performances were thus honoured (46). Therefore they introduce him boasting that his Poems did not die with him, as those of Euripides expired with their Author (47). Philostratus observes in the sixth Chapter of the sixth Book of Apollonius's Life, that the Athenians considered Eschylus as the Father of Tragedy, and he seems to say that after his Death they invoked him in the Feasts of Bacchus. Ἐκάλουν δὲ καὶ τεθνεώτα ἐς Διονύσια, in Dionysii festis etiam mortuum invocant: so Rhinuccinus has translated it. Morellus has rendered it convocant. Vigener translates it, being still used to invoke him at the Games and Feasts of Dionysius. But without doubt he meant no more than that they invited him to those Feasts, in as much as his Tragedies were ordered by a public Decree to be then acted, by which he obtained fresh Triumphs. Consult Vossius at the thirtieth Page of his Treatise of the Greek Poets. Quintilian diminishes his Honour a little; for he only says they permitted Eschylus's Tragedies to be acted at Athens after they were corrected, and he observes that several of those who corrected them carried away the Prize. Of this number were Euphorion and Bion the Sons of Eschylus (48). The Scholiast who has written the Life of Eschylus gives another turn to the Athenian Decree: he pretends that they ordered that those who would act Eschylus's Tragedies should have a Chorus allowed them (49). He says also that it was the custom of all the Tragic Poets to go to the Tomb of Eschylus, in honour of his Memory, and that they acted their Pieces there. Once more, Quintilian was not a Man that would mention these Stories; for he degrades that Poet from the Rank that others give him. Some (50) set him above Sophocles and Euripides, others without determining the Superiority will have it that each of these three Poets excelled in certain things (51). But this is the Judgment of Quintilian. Tragedias primus in lucem Eschylus protulit, sublimis & gravis, & grandiloquus sæpe usque ad vitium: sed rudis in perificatione & incompositus propter quod correctas ejus fabulas in certamen deferre posterioribus Poëtis Athenienses permiserunt; suntque eo modo multi coronati. Sed longe clarius illustraverunt hoc opus Sophocles & Euripides: quorum in dispari dicendi via uter sit poeta melior, inter plurimos quaeritur (52). — Eschylus was the first that offered Tragedies to the Public: he was Majestic and Sublime, and often lofty to a Fault. But in many Places he is uncouth and loose; for which reason the Athenians permitted his Plays when corrected to be represented in the Games by the later Poets, by which means many carried off the Prize. But Sophocles and Euripides brought that Work to far greater Perfection. It is a question whether of them excels in their different way. Menedemus the Philosopher always assigned the first Rank to Eschylus. See his Life in Diogenes Laërtius, second Book, Section 133.

[L] The best Edition of Eschylus is that of London (53). Thomas Stanley published it in 1663, in Folio. He added a Latin Translation to it, and a learned Commentary of his own, together with the Notes of the old Scholiast, the Fragments of Pieces lost, the different Readings of the Manuscripts, and the Observations of some learned Critics who have commented on this Poet. The preceding Editions were published in the following Order. The first was that of Aldus Manutius at Venice in 1518: it contained only six Tragedies (54). Turnebus reprinted them at Paris in the Year 1552, with the variorum Lectiones. The same Year Francis Robertel published the seven Tragedies of Eschylus at Venice, with his Conjectures, and those of Michael Sappiani; and with as many Scholias as he could collect together by consulting the old

(45) Alicius had the same Taste. See Citat. (51) of the Article ARCHILOCHUS.

(46) Scholiast Aristophanis, apud Stancium, pag. 707.

(47) Aristophanes, in Rana.

(48) Vide Vossium de Poët. Græcis, pag. 32.

(49) Τὴν βουλὴν δίδασκον τὰ Ἀρχαῖα καὶ ἡρώδη λαμβάνειν (ὁμοῖον) quod quicunque fabulas Eschylus docere vellet choro (juxta alios auro) daretur.

(50) Aristophanes, in Rana.

(51) Plotarchus apud Stancium, & Phrynicus apud Plotarchum, citante eodem Stancio, pag. 701, 702.

(52) Quintilianus lib. 2, cap. 1.

(53) See the Journal des Savans, March 2, 1665.

(54) This included Choephores is wanting in it.

(43) Pausanias, lib. 1, pag. 13.

(44) Αἰσχύλος τηλικαύτην δόξαν ἔχων διὰ τὴν ποιητικὴν, ἔδωκεν ἥττον ἐπὶ τῷ σώματι ἢ τῇ ψυχῇ. ἥτις ἡ μάλλον τὴν ἀνδρείαν. καὶ ὡς ἀλλοῦ δ' εὐδόμενον, ὅτι Eschylus quamvis maximam famam consecutus esset — ob politiam, nihilo fecius monumentum inscribi fortitudinem maluit, dicens præclarum animi fortis constantiam, &c. Athen. lib. 10, pag. 627.

in Moreri in what manner that Poet is said to have been killed, viz. By a Tortoise [M], which an Eagle let fall upon his Head. I forgot to observe, that Salmastius, discouraged with the difficulties he found in Æschylus, has declared, That this Poet was more obscure than the Holy Scripture [N]. Moreri has committed many Faults [O].

old Copies. Five Years after, Henry Stephens published an Edition which surpassed the preceding ones. It contained the whole Agamemnon which till then had appeared imperfect: in many places Æschylus's Text was corrected, and also the Scholia which were enlarged. This was the performance of Peter Vißorius. To which were added the Observations of Henry Stephens. Lastly, William Canterus published a new Edition at Antwerp in 1580, in which he corrected an infinite number of Errors, and disposed each Verse in it's proper order, which had never been done before. The Latin Version published by John Saurmannus, and printed by Oporinus, is good for nothing (55). The Authors of Historical Dictionaries should not omit the History of Editions.

(55) Taken from Stanley's Preface.

(56) Lib. ix, cap. xii.

(57) In Voce Αἰσχύλος & in Voce Χάδων.

(58) In Vita Æschyli.

(59) This does not agree with Valer. Maximus.

(60) Plin. lib. x, cap. iii, pag. m. 391.

(61) De Helenica, pag. 37. Epist. Dedicat.

[M] He was killed . . . by a Tortoise. Valerius Maximus (56), cited by Moreri, is not the only one who says this: Suidas affirms the same in two Places (57): also the Scholiast upon Æschylus (58). Pliny had said the same before them (59), and with this Circumstance that Æschylus went into the open Country in order to shun the Effect of a Prediction which threatened him that Day with the fall of something. Ingenium est ei (aquile) testudines raptas frangere & sublimi jaciendo, quæ fors interemit poetam Æschylum prædictam, satis (ut ferunt) ejus diei ruinam secura cæli fide caventem (60).

[N] Salmastius . . . has declared that this Poet is more obscure than the Holy Scripture. These are his Words (61): 'Quis Æschylum possit adfirmare Græcæ nunc scienti magis patere explicabilem quam Evangelia aut Epistolæ Apostolicas? Unus ejus Agamemnon obscuritate superat quantum est librorum sacrorum cum suis Hebraicis & Syriacis, & tota Hellenistica suppellectili vel farragine. — Who can affirm that Æschylus is more intelligible at this Day than the Gospels or Apostolical Epistles? His Agamemnon alone is more perplexed with Obscurities, than the whole Holy Scripture, with all it's Hebraisms, Syriacisms, and the whole Poss of Hellenisms.'

[O] Moreri has committed a great number of Faults. Having said that Æschylus had shewed in three Battles 'that he was no less a Soldier than a Man of Learning, he adds that, to give a particular Proof of his Courage, it is sufficient to say that he was the Brother of that famous Cynegirus, who when both his Hands were cut off, upon going to stop one of

'the Enemies Ships, yet did not desist fighting with the Barbarians. I find four faults in these Words. I. It is no Proof of the Bravery of a Man, that he has a very brave Brother. II. At least this is not so convincing a Proof as to persuade the Reader by the bare proposing of it. III. At least it is not so particular a Proof as that which is taken from the Courage a Man has shewn on three great Occasions. IV. As to Cynegirus, he should have kept to what Herodotus says of him: that he was killed having had his Hand cut off, the Hand, I say, with which he held one of the Persian Ships. The other things which the Greeks have added are more like the Legends of Roland, and St George, than History. Who can believe that a Man who had both his Hands cut off should be able to catch a Ship of War with his Teeth and hold her fast? 'Cynegiri quoque militis Atheniensis gloria magnis Scriptorum laudibus celebrata est, qui post prælii innumeras cædes, cum fugientes hostes ad naves egisset, omnium navem dextra manu tenuit, nec prius dimisit quam (manum) amitteret; tum quoque amputata dextra, navem sinistra comprehendit, quam & ipsam cum amisisset, ad postremum morfu navem detinuit. Tantum in eo virtutem fuisse, ut non tot cædibus fatigatus; non duabus manibus amissis victus; truncus ad postremum, veluti & rabida fera, dentibus dimicaverit (62). — Historians likewise bestow uncommon Encomiums on the Bravery of Cynegirus, an Athenian Soldier, who, after an incredible Slaughter, having driven his flying Enemies to their Ships, seized one that was laden with his right Hand, nor loosed his hold till his Arm was lopped off, then immediately layed hold of it with his left, which having undergone the same fate with the other, he held it with his Teeth. So great was his Valour, that, not wearied with such a number of Encounters, nor disheartened by the loss of both his Hands, he fought at last with his Teeth like a Wild Beast.' I should as easily believe what Pliny says of the Remora in the first Chapter of the third Book. Moreri's fifth Fault is saying that Æschylus, after the Battles of Marathon, Salamis, and Platæa, applied himself to Tragedy. He has said before (63) that he applied himself to it whilst he was a Youth, and disputed the prize of Tragedy against Pratinas about twenty Years before the Battle of Platæa (64). VI. The Scholiast does not place the Death of this Poet under the LXXVIIIth Olympiad.

(62) Justinus, lib. ii, cap. ix.

(63) Citat. (11).

(64) In the LXXth Olympiad. Suidas, in Πρατίναν.

ESMENDREVILLE (JOHN DU BOSQ Lord of) President of the Court of Aids at Roan, died by the hands of the Executioner, with the Minister Marlorat and some others, as one of the principal Authors of the Resistance of that City to the Arms of the King in the first Civil War under Charles IX (a). He was worthy of a better Fate, having, in his Person, all the great Qualities that are to be desired in an accomplished Magistrate. He had been educated like the illustrious Men of his Time, who aspired to a thorough Knowledge of the Sciences, and particularly the Civil Law, having travelled on purpose into Italy to derive it from it's very fountain Head . . . He was admitted Counsellor and Commissary of the Requests of the Palace of Roan, the last Day of June 1544, and from thence was promoted to the Office of Second President of the Court of Aids, in the same City, the 26th of January 1562, which was the very Year of his Death, having been beheaded, and his body hanged the first of November following (b). He left by N. Guyot, his first Wife, three Sons and two Daughters, who had nothing of his Estate. Catherine Guerin, his second Wife, was afterwards married to Robert du Tour. Martin du Bosq, Lord of Bourneville, his younger Brother, who belonged to the Company of the Vidame of Chartres, obtained, by a Decree, the Lordship of Esmendreville, and from him and Isabel le Moine, his Wife, Lady of Surdeval, are descended the other Lords of Esmendreville: He was a Catholic, and is mentioned in the Spanish Catholicon, as a great Leaguer. This Family is ancient [A], and has

(a) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mémoires de Castelnau, Tom. 1, pag. 878, 879.

(b) Id. ibid. pag. 881.

[A] This Family is ancient. He was the Son of LEWIS DU BOSQ, Lord of Radepont, Esmendreville, &c. and his elder Brothers were, 1. LEWIS DU BOSQ, Lord of Radepont, from whom descended the Lords of Radepont and Fleuri; 2. ROBERT DU BOSQ, Lord of Beaumencel, who left only two Daughters. He was Grandson of LEWIS

DU BOSQ, Lord of Radepont, and Great Grandson of ROBIN DU BOSQ, Lord of Esmendreville, Branville, &c. whose Father WILLIAM DU BOSQ, Lord of Ténor, of la Chapelle, and Esmendreville, was a Hostage for King Charles VII, in England, and died the first of November 1430. He was the Son of WILLIAM DU BOSQ, Lord of Coquerbaumont,

(c) Mezerai, Hist. de Charles IX, pag. 86, of the third Volume, in Folio.

has produced several Branches. The President of Esmendreville is the Author of some Books [B]. Mezerai calls him James du Bosq Mandreville [C], a zealous Huguenot, adds he, but who ruined himself by his ill Oeconomy (c). Mr le Laboureur (d), relates this last Circumstance.

(d) Addit. to Castelnau, ubi supra, pag. 279.

Coqueramont, Fescamp, Esmendreville, &c. who died in the Year 1409, and Grandson of JOHN DU BOSQ, who died in the Year 1381, the Son of MARTIN DU BOSQ, Lord of Tendar, Lord Chief Justice in Eyre of Normandy. This Martin died in the Year 1360, and was Father of two other Sons, viz. 1. of MATTHEW DU BOSQ, Lord of Breteville, who was the Father of SIMON DU BOSQ, Doctor of the Canon-Law, Monk of St Ouen, Abbot of Jumièges, and Chamberlain to the Pope; 2. of NICOLE (1) DU BOSQ, Bishop of Baieux. This Prelate equally advanced the Honour and Possessions of his House; for it was he that bought the Lands of Esmendreville, Espinai, Bois d'Anneboub, and other Estates. . . . He was first Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, afterwards Bishop of Baieux, in the Year 1374, then First President Clerk of the Chamber of Accounts, with a thousand Paris Livres a Year, during his Life. The Letters of his Creation, bearing Date the thirtieth of February, 1398, import, that this Post was given him in Reward of his faithful Services for forty Years. By other Letters, of the last of December, 1380, he was made Counsellor to the King for his Demerits and Subsidies, with a Salary of a thousand gold Franks, continuing (2) still First President of the Chamber of Accounts. He died the nineteenth of September, 1408. He had been employed in two important Embassies, one into Bretagny, in the Year 1394, with the Duke of Burgundy, and the other to Arras, in the Year 1381, for the Negotiation of Peace with the English, at twelve Franks a Day for his Expences. He was buried in the Chapel of St Lewis, in the Church of the Franciscans (3). See, in Mr le Laboureur, divers Branches of this Family.

(1) See the Errata of Mr le Laboureur.

(2) I copy Mr le Laboureur's Word for Word; but it is plain there is a Mistake in the Numbers; for if this Bishop was made First President in 1398, he could not join that Office, in the Year 1380, with that of Counsellor for the Demerits.

(3) Taken from Mr le Laboureur's Additions to Castelnau, Tom. I, pag. 297, & seq.

(4) It is in Mr le Laboureur's Δικαιωματίας. This Book is commonly mentioned under the Title De Legitimis Nuptiis.

[B] He is the Author of some Books.] During his Travels into Italy he composed a Latin Book, printed in the Year 1532, intitled, Joannis Bosqueti Nuptii (4). Besides this he wrote a Treatise of the Virtue and Properties of the Number seven, and of the Reason why Justinian divided his Pandects into seven Parts. In which he con-futes some Opinions which he had seen publicly defended by the famous Dr Alciat, his Contemporany; and there are also some other Works of his in Manuscript (5). Theodorus Beza (6) makes him the Author of a Book de Numeris Pompiliis sacris, which was very displeasing to the Roman Catholics.

(5) Le Laetor, recur, ubi supra, pag. 278.

[C] Mezerai calls him James du Bosq Mandreville.] Mr Mezerai is often mistaken in Christian Names. As to the Mistake of Mandreville for Esmendreville, it is to be accounted for in this manner. The Pronunciation is the same in the greatest Part of the Provinces, and among abundance of People all the Kingdom over, whether you say the President of Mandreville, or the President d'Esmendreville. Those who would be exact in the least Particulars do not rely upon the Pronunciation; they consult the true Orthography of proper Names. Thuanus had not consulted it when he latinized the Name of this President by Mantrevilla (7). This is not at all surprizing in comparison of what we see in the Ecclesiastical History of the Reformed Churches. Beza, who is the Author of it, relates the Proceedings that were carried on, and the Decrees that were made against Esmendreville, Marlorat, &c. and always calls him Mantreville. Is it because the Registers themselves, who drew up those Proceedings, and those Decrees, did not know the true Name of those Criminals? Or did Theodore Beza make use of a defective Copy (8)?

(6) Beza, Resp. ad Baldin. pag. 279, Tom. II, Operum.

(7) Thuan. lib. xxxiii, pag. 668, ad Ann. 1562.

[8] (a) In Beza's Ecclesiastical History, Vol. II, pag. 620, he is called Mandreville, and the Index of that Volume supposes it read no otherwise in the whole Volume, wherever mention is made of that unfortunate Magistrate. The Index Thuanus calls him Mantreville, and d'Aubigné, Mandreville, Tom. I, pag. 222, of his History, last Edition. But it is probable they said indifferently Mantreville, or Mandreville, and Esmendreville, as Pajquier, lib. iii, cap. xxix, of his Recherches, calls Touteville, the famous Cardinal, Reformer of the University of Paris, called Esouteville by Naudé, cap. vi. of his Addition to the History of King Lewis XI, pag. 192, of the Edition of 1630. REM. CRIT.]

ESOP, in Latin Æsopus, the Name of several ancient Personages whom I shall treat of in separate Articles. I shall begin with him upon whom both the order of Time and his own Merit ought to bestow the first Place.

ESOP, or Æsop, the first or chief Author of Fables [A], was a Phrygian, and flourished in the time of Solon; that is to say, towards the Lth Olympiad (a). His Life, such as Planudes has given it us, is so well known to every body, even to the very Children, that That alone might determine me to make no Extracts out of it. But

(a) See the Remark [C].

[A] He is the first or chief Author of Fables.] I would not say, that Æsop was the Inventor of them, for Quintilian is not of this Opinion. 'Ille quoque fabulæ says he (1), quæ etiam originem non ab Æsopo acceperunt, (nam videtur eorum primus autor Hesiodus) nomine tamen Æsopi maxime celebrantur, ducere animos solent, præcipue rusticorum & imperitorum, qui & simplicius quæ ficta sunt, audiunt, & capiti voluptate, facile iis quibus delectantur consentiunt. — These Fables likewise, which, though they do not derive their Origin from Æsop (for Hesiod seems to have been the first Author of them), are however known by the Name of Æsop, usually command the Attention, especially of the ignorant and rustic Part of Mankind, who listen to Fictions, and being charmed with it's Simplicity, give a ready Assent to that wherewith they are pleased. It is therefore to Hesiod I should rather ascribe the Glory of the Invention; but without doubt he left the thing very imperfect. Æsop brought it to that Perfection, that he was looked upon as the true Father of this sort of Productions.

(1) Quint. Instit. Orator. lib. v, cap. xi, pag. m. 241.

Æsopus auctor quam materiam repperit, Hanc ego polivi verbis senariis.

The Plan which Æsop first design'd I, in Iambics, have refin'd.

Thus Phædrus begins his Fables. Avienus makes the same Observation in the Preface to his (2). Priscian makes use of the Word Inventor with respect to Æsop, but a little after he corrects himself, and speaks as he should do. 'Usi sunt ea (Fabula), says he, vetustissimi quoque autores, Hesiodus, Archilochus, Plautus, Horatius. Nominantur autem ab inventoribus fabularum aliae Æsopiæ, aliae Cypriæ, aliae Libyæ, aliae Sybariticæ, omnes autem communiter Æsopiæ; quoniam in conventibus frequenter solebat Æsopus fabulis uti. — The most ancient Authors likewise, as Hesiod, Archilochus, Plautus, and Horace, made use of Fable. They derive their Names from their Inventors, as Æsopian, Cyprian, Libyan, Sybaritic, but all taken together are called Æsopian, because in public Debates Æsop frequently made use of Fable. This is not exact; for if Hesiod, who is more ancient than Æsop, made use of Fable, it follows, that Æsop was not the Inventor of it. Of the four sorts of Fable mentioned by Priscian, three of them are denominated from the Country, and not from the Inventor. Lastly, if all those four kinds are commonly called Æsopiæ, because Æsop usually spoke by Fables, why was it said, a few Lines before, that the Fables named Æsopiæ were so called from the Inventor of them? Apollonius is fallen into almost all these Mistakes: καλεῖται δὲ, says he (3), συβαρατινὸς, καὶ Κίλιξ, καὶ Κύπριος πρὸς τὴν εὐρύπλιν μέλας τὴν δὲ οὐκ ἐκ τῆς οὐρανίας.

(2) Hujus Materie ducenti nominis Æsopi nominis qui responso Delphici Apollinis monitus ridicula oris est ut legenda firmaret. . . . You know that Æsop is our Guide in these Points, and according to the Directions which he received from Apollon at Delphi, to establish Fable.

(3) In Proæceticis.

But another Reason makes me resolve to have no manner of regard to that Work; which is, that all learned Men are agreed it is a Romance [B], and that the gross Aburdities, found in it, render it unworthy of any Credit. Therefore referring those to Moreri, who desire an Article taken from Planudes, I shall say nothing but what I have from μαῖα, νικᾷ δὲ μάλλον Ἀίσωπος λέγεσθαι τῷ τῶν Αἰσώπων ἀνὴρα πάντων συγγραφεὶ τὸς μυθῶν. Vocatur autem & Sybaritica, & Cilix, & Cypria accepto ab inventoribus nomine. Verum quoniam Æsopus egregie præter ceteros conscripsit fabulas, evicit ut potius Æsopia diceretur. — It is called, says he, Sybaritic, Cilician, and Cyprian, borrowing it's Name from the Inventor; but because Æsop was eminent above others for writing Fables, the Name of Æsopian prevailed above the rest. Macrobius makes one Remark, which will not be amiss here. He distinguishes between fabula and fabulosa narratio; he pretends that a Fable is a Narrative absolutely false, and that a fabulosa Narratio is a heap of Fictions, built upon a true Foundation. This is the Nature of Epic Poems and Romances. Macrobius gives the Fictions of Æsop for an Example of Fable; and the Accounts of Hesiod, the Rituals, or Books of Religion, for an Instance of fabulosa Narratio. In quibusdam & argumentum ex ficto locatur, & per mendacia ipse relationis ordo contextitur, ut sunt illæ Æsopiæ fabulæ elegantia fictionis illustres. At in aliis argumentum quidem fundatur veri soliditate: sed hæc ipsa veritas per quædam composita & ficta profertur, & hoc jam vocatur fabulosa narratio, non fabula, ut sunt cerimoniarum sacra, ut Hesiodi & Orphei quæ de Deorum progenie ac rebus narratur (4). — In some both the Argument is fictitious, and the whole Superstructure is connected by Fiction: such are the Fables of Æsop, admirable for the Beauty of Invention. But in others the Argument is founded on solid Truth, but that Truth is afterwards compounded and wrought up with Fiction; and this then receives the Name of a fabulosa Narratio, not of a Fable: such are the sacred Solemnities, the Accounts of Hesiod and Orpheus concerning the Descent and Exploits of the Gods. Freinhemius did not well comprehend Macrobius's Thought, when he brings it to explain the Passage in Priscian, where it is said, that Hesiod, Archilochus, &c. made use of Fable. Whereupon Freinhemius makes this Observation, that there is a great Difference between Hesiod's Fables and those of Æsop: Hesiod's are fabulous Narrations; Æsop's are properly a Fable (5). He takes this Distinction in Macrobius's Sense, and quotes him: this is wrong; for when Quintilian, Priscian, and others say, that Hesiod used Fable; they mean he made use of the Fictions of the Apologue: not thinking of the fabulous Narrations he has sung upon the Birth and Actions of the Gods (6). So that the Fables of Hesiod here in question, and those of Æsop, are of the same Nature.

[B] All learned Men agree, that his Life, by Planudes, is a Romance. It is with reason that the Reader is told in the Moreri, printed in Holland, that Planudes had not written the Life of Æsop, but collected a Heap of Lies and Aburdities. Mr de la Fontaine was not ignorant of the Judgment of the Public upon that Life of Æsop. I hardly know any body, says he (7), who does not look upon what Planudes has left us as fabulous; yet he follows him, and even says, that after all he finds but little Certainty in the Criticism upon that Work of Planudes. It is partly founded, continues he, upon what passes between Xanthus and Æsop, in which there are too many Trifles. He answers, that such things happen to all wise Men. But if that Answer appeared sufficiently solid to him, why has he retrenched from Planudes's Work what seemed to him too childish, or was in some manner inconsistent with Decency? Thus Mr de la Fontaine approves, by his Actions, a Criticism he condemns by his Words. This is not the only thing he is to be charged with; it may be maintained against him, that the Historical Fables, Lycæus, King of Babylon, Cotemporary with Nestor, King of Egypt, and such like ignorant Passages, are the chief Reasons for rejecting the Life of Æsop. Mr de la Fontaine did not retrench that for this Reason: As Planudes, says he (8), lived in an Age in which the Memory of the things which happened to Æsop might not be yet forgotten, I supposed be knew, by Tradition, what he has transmitted to us. If Planudes had lived two hundred Years after Æsop, his Knowledge from Tradition would have been very uncertain. A Man, who is upon his Guard, believes but little, concerning the Life of a private Person, the Traditions of two Ages. He asks, if the Facts related were committed to writing at the time they were fresh; and if it is told him no, but the Memory of them is preserved from Father to Son by word of Mouth, he knows well, that in such a case a wise Man will be a Sceptic. With much more reason should Planudes's Facts be rejected, if they come only from Tradition, since he did not come into the World till eighteen Ages after Æsop, more or less. If Mr de la Fontaine had minded this, would he have said, that Planudes lived in an Age, in which the Memory of the things that happened to Æsop might not yet be forgotten. Some body has very well observed, that, in things which concern the Patriarchs and Prophets, the Jews of the VIth Century are no more to be believed than the Jews of the XVIIth; I mean the Jews who only quote Traditions handed down by Word of Mouth. We may say the same thing concerning Æsop. He was not known with more Certainty by Tradition to the Greek Monks of the XIIIth or XIVth Century, than he is to those of the present time.

I forgot the gross Ignorance of Planudes in point of Chronology. He did not know, that Æsop lived a long time before Euripides, but has introduced Æsop alledging two or three Verses of Euripides, and even naming Euripides. From whence we conclude, that all the rude things Æsop said to his Master's Wife, the first time he saw her, are the Invention of Planudes; and if he forged that first Conversation, he might also forge other things. He supposes, that Xanthus, the Philosopher, having bought Æsop, was blamed for it by his Wife, on account of the prodigious Deformity of that Slave, and that Æsop said to her thereupon. Σὺ, ὦ δούλω, ἐβόη τὸν ἀλδοσφορὸν ἀνέσασθαι σοὶ δέλον νύον, εὐσεμῶς ἴσῃ, σφριγῶν, ἐν ἔδει γυμνὴν σε καὶ τῷ βαλανίῳ θάσασθαι, καὶ σοὶ προσπαίξεν τὰ εἰς ἀσχυνὴν τῷ φιλοσοφῷ; Εὐρίπιδην, χρυσὸν ἰγὼ σε φημί τὸ σῶμα τοιαῦτα λέγων. Tu, o domina, velles philosophum emisse tibi servum juvenem, bono habitu, vigentem, qui ne nudam in balneo spectaret & tecum luderet in dedecus philosophi; O Euripides, aureum ego tuum inquam ostalia dicens (9). — You wish, Madam, your Husband had bought you a young, handsome lusty Fellow, who should see you naked in the Bath, and play with you at a Game fatal to the Honour of your Husband. O Euripides, thy Mouth was of Gold to pronounce the Words thou hast done! Upon which he repeated Euripides's Verses against Women. Is it not true, that Planudes, having a Common-place in his Head, makes Æsop speak in this manner without Judgment? I have read, in Mr Menage (10), that this chronological Error has been observed by Meziriac and Father Vavassour. As to the latter, as I have his Book de Ludicra Distine, I can verify Mr Menage's Quotation. It is very just; for these are the Words of that Jesuit (11): 'Quale autem, Balzac, putas quod Æsopo primum in herilem domum ingresso, cumque hero (12) colloquenti sententiam affingit Euripidis adversus mulieres, atque ipsum etiam Euripidem appellari nomine facit qui octoginta (13) minimum annis natus est postquam Æsopus vivere desit? — What an Absurdity, my Friend, must it appear in him to put into Æsop's Mouth, at his first Entrance into his Master's House, and whilst he talked to his Master, a Sentence of Euripides, and to make him call him by Name, when Euripides was not born till at least eighty Years after Æsop died.' As for the Life of Æsop by the learned Meziriac, it has been impossible for me to get it. I am no otherwise acquainted with it than by these Words of Mr Pellisson, in the Catalogue of Meziriac's Works (14): 'The true Life of Æsop l'Academie Françoise, p. m. 26a nudes

(9) Planudes, in Vita Æsopi, pag. m. 25.

(10) In Diog. Laërt. lib. i, dium. 72.

(11) Vavass. de ludicra Distine, pag. 19.

(12) It should be hera.

(13) Tois des not agree with the Extract of Æsop's Fables published by Le-Strange: Among others Father Vavassour observes, that they make Æsop cite Euripides, tho' he lived near 200 years before Euripides. The Anachronism is a little gross. Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans, Decembre 1692, pag. 153.

(14) Histoire de Meziriac's Works (14): The true Life of Æsop l'Academie Françoise, p. m. 26a nudes

(4) Macrobius, in Somn. Scipion. lib. i, cap. ii.

(5) Freinhem. in Notia ad Fabulis Phædri, tit.

(6) Consider the words of Mr Menage in Laërt. lib. i, num. 72. Dicitur est Æsopus λογοποιός, non quod primus muta loqui docuerit, nam ante eum Hesiodus hoc fecerat in sermone Luciniae ad Accipitrem, sed quia præcipue hoc scribendi genus sectatus est. Æsop had the name of Fabulist given him, not because he first taught the dum's part of the Creation to talk; for Hesiod had done this before him, in his Dialogue between the Night-ingale and Hawk; but because he followed this method of writing in a more peculiar manner.

(7) La Fontaine's Preface to his Fables choisies.

(8) Ibid.

(b) That is to say, borrowed from ancient Authors.

(c) In Convivio Sapientum, pag. 150.

from very good Hands (b). Plutarch assures us (c), I. That Cræsus sent Æsop [C] to Periander, Tyrant of Corinth, and to the Oracle of Delpbi. II. That Socrates found no other Expedient to obey the God of Dreams, without doing an Injury to his Profession, than to turn Æsop's Fables into Verse (d) [D]. III. That Æsop and Solon saw each other at the Court of Cræsus, King of Lydia (e). IV. That the Inhabitants of Delpbi having cruelly and unjustly put Æsop to Death [E], and finding themselves, (d) De Audientia Poëtarum, p. 164.

(e) In Vita Solonis, pag. 94.

exposed

nudes is held to be fabulous by the Learned. See the Remark [O].

[C] Plutarch assures us, that Cræsus sent Æsop. I find it probable, that Æsop was at the Court of Cræsus, tho' I have read, in Seibus Calvifius, that he flourished in the third Year of the XLVth Olympiad, that he died the fourth Year of the LIIIrd, and that Cræsus ascended the Throne the second Year of the LIVth. In vain does Calvifius cite Suidas: I rather depend upon Plutarch, who observes, in divers Places, that Æsop appeared at the Court of Cræsus, and went several Journeys for that Prince. Madam Scuderi (15) then might well make him meet Solon; and several other great Men at that Court; I say he might suppose this without making use of the Privilege of Anachronisms, which the Writers of Romances are allowed no less than the Poets. She has made Æsop maintain his Character excellently well, whose ingenious Fables, says she, conceal a solid and serious Moral, under plain and merry Inventions. I am afraid Mr de la Fontaine has not adjusted his reckoning in an historical Performance so well as Madam Scuderi has done in a Romance. He places (16) the Birth of Æsop towards the LVIIth Olympiad: now we find, that Cræsus lost his Kingdom and Liberty in the LVIIIth Olympiad: where then shall we place what passed between Cræsus and Æsop, even according to Mr de la Fontaine himself? I have said, that I preferred the Authority of Plutarch to that of Suidas, nor do I repent of it, for there is nothing but inconsistent Intricacies in Suidas. On one side he says, the Inhabitants of Delpbi threw Æsop down a Precipice in the LIVth Olympiad; and on the other, that Æsop composed two Books towards the middle of the XLth Olympiad, concerning his Adventures at Delpbi. He adds, that Æsop lived with Cræsus (17), with the Advantage of sharing in the Friendship of that Prince. Scaliger (18) pretends, that the latter of these two Passages refutes the other. His Reason is, that a Man who writes a History of what happened to him at Delpbi could not have been thrown down a Precipice at Delpbi. But this is no Proof that Suidas is mistaken as to the first Passage. Æsop might have been at Delpbi more than once, and the History of his Adventures might only relate to his first Journey: to confute Suidas he should have said, I. That a Man of Æsop's Condition could not be of any Note in his Youth; that therefore he must have been at least thirty Years of Age, when, in the XLth Olympiad, he wrote the History of his Travels to Delpbi. So then he must have been Eighty six Years old when those of Delpbi threw him down a Precipice in the LIVth Olympiad. Now it is absurd to make him so old. II. If Æsop had been of such Importance as to publish his Adventures at Delpbi, in the Lth Olympiad, he could not have lived till the Reign of Cræsus. The Authority then of Suidas is nothing here. That of Eusebius is of more weight; who places the Death of Æsop in the fourth Year of the LIVth Olympiad.

[D] Socrates found no other expedient to obey the God of Dreams . . . than to turn Æsop's Fables into Verse. To understand this Matter fully we must have recourse to Plato, who will inform us that Socrates was often advised in a Dream to apply himself to the Exercises of the Muses (19). He took this for an Admonition to continue in his Profession, believing that Philosophy was the great and true employment of the Muses. But when he saw himself condemned to Death, he thought that perhaps Poetry was the Exercise intended by his Dreams. So that to act surely he resolved to obey the Orders of the God of Dreams by interpreting them in the common Sense. "Ασφαλέστερον γὰρ εἶναι μὴ ἀπέναντι πρὶν ἀποσιώσασθαι ποιήματα ποιούμενον τῷ ἐνυπνίῳ. Tullius enim fore arbitratum antequam à vita migraret ab hoc me officio liberare, et parentem in somno prœmata facere (20). Therefore he made Verses, and began with a Poem in honour of the God (21) whose Festival was then celebrating. Afterwards considering that to be a Poet, he must publish Fables, which his Profession did not allow, he turned some of Æsop's Apologues into Verse, the first that came into his Mind (22). This is the account Socrates gave Cebes (the very day he was put to Death) of the Poems he had made in Prison. The occasion of writing which Cebes had enquired of him. Plutarch will explain to us the Medium Socrates invented to reconcile the Character of a Poet with that of a Philosopher. Which was to chuse a subject for his Fables containing solid Truths, and excellent rules of Morality. "Ὅθεν ὁ Σωκράτης ἐκ τινῶν ἐνυπνίων ποιητικῆς ἀφάμενος, αὐτὸς μὲν, ὅτε δὴ γενομένης ἀνδρείας ἀγωνισθεὶς τὸν ἅπαντα βίον, ἡ περὶ τὰς ἡδὲ εὐφροσύνης λευδῶν δημιουργῶς. τὰς δὲ διὰ δίσκων τοῖς ἑσπερίαις μὲν ἐνέμιεν, ὡς ποίησιν ἐκ ὧν ἡ λευδὸς μὴ ἀποσεί. Itaque Socrates quibuscumque somniis ad scribendum carmen compulsus, quum ipse, ut qui per omnem vitam pro veritate decertasset, facultate probabilia mendacia fabricandi destitueretur, Æsopi fabellas argumentum sibi delegit: postquam non putans eam à qua abesset mendacium (23). — Socrates being directed in several Dreams to apply himself to Poetry, but having been all his Life-time a Champion for Truth, he was at a loss how to proceed in the management of Fiction. He therefore chose for his Subject the Fables of Æsop, thinking nothing could be Poetry where Fiction was not an Ingredient. Mr de la Fontaine, a Man of all France who knew how to give a happy turn to a Tale, did not think himself obliged to follow, in a servile manner, Plato's Narrative. The Reader will judge by the following Remarks if the turn he has given to this account be as just as it ought to be coming from such a Pen.

I. The beginning and end of Mr de la Fontaine's Narrative do not seem adapted to each other (24). The Fables which are attributed to Æsop were hardly published when Socrates thought fit to dress them in the Livery of the Muses. This is the beginning. He spent the last Moments of his Life, to turn them into Verse. This is the end. The beginning intimates a great deal of Impatience in Socrates: The end informs us that he stayed till the hour of his Death: and as he lived seventy Years it is easy to know he was in no great haste, for it cannot be said Æsop's Fables did not appear till the last Years of Socrates's Life: they were published during the Life of the Author, and about a hundred Years passed between the Death of Æsop, and the Birth of Socrates. Judge then if one may say that hardly were those Fables published when Socrates thought fit to turn them into Verse. II. Mr de la Fontaine has spun in such a manner the Thread of his Narrative, that it does not appear by it whether Socrates translated Æsop's Fables the very day of his Death, or some days before, and the first seems more probable by it than the last. Nevertheless the first is false. III. The Author advances that Socrates had the dream after his Condemnation; and yet Socrates did not say this to Cebes. IV. The Author supposes that Socrates was warned in a dream to apply himself to Music, and that he was in Pain about the meaning of such a dream because of the uselessness of Music, with respect to Morality. But it is plain by Plato's Account that Socrates never imagined the God of Dreams required him to learn to sing and play on Instruments. That Philosopher always supposed that in a literal Sense his Dreams exhorted him to Poetry.

[E] The Inhabitants of Delpbi having put Æsop to Death. This History is found in Plutarch (25). He says that Æsop came to Delpbi with great store of Gold and Silver, being ordered by Cræsus to offer a great Sacrifice to Apollo, and to give every Inhabitant a considerable Sum. The Quarrel, which arose between him and the Inhabitants, caused him to send back to Cræsus the Money he had received of him, after he had ended his Sacrifice, judging those, he had appointed it for, were unworthy of it. The Delpbians contrived hereupon

(22) Plato, in Phædon, pag. 46, C.

(23) Plutarch, de audientia Poëtarum, pag. 10, C.

(24) La Fontaine, Preface to Fables choisies.

(25) Plut de solonis Vita, pag. 557.

(15) See the 4th part of the Grand Cyrus.

(16) In Æsop's Life.

(17) Διότι οὐκ ἀποσιώσας τοὺς Κροίσου Φιλίστους.

(18) Animadv. in Euseb. n. 1453, pag. 92, 93.

(19) Μουσικὴν τοῖς καὶ ἑγὼ ἐξέτερον. Fac multam atque exercitum. Plato in Phædon, pag. m. 45, C. It appears by what follows, that (μῦθος) is to be taken for Poetry, that Art over which the Muses preside.

(20) Plato, ibid.

(21) It was Apollo.

exposed, by Injustice, to divers Plagues, they published that they were ready to make satisfaction to the Memory of Æsop (f). V. That having compromised this with a Man of Samos, they were delivered from the Evil that afflicted them. One may easily know, by the Conversation that Æsop and Solon had together, that the former talked like a perfect Courtier, and the latter like a true Philosopher [F]. Notwithstanding this, it must be confessed that Æsop used the most judicious and the most ingenious Lessons that could be contrived against the Vices of Mankind [G]. Those who have said that his Apologues are the most useful of all the Fables of Antiquity [H], make a right Judgment of things. The Answer he made to Cbilo is admirable

(f) De Sera Numinis Vindicta, pag. 556, 557.

(26) He was called Idmon according to Plutarch, and Tadmon, according to Herodotus, lib. ii, cap. 234, who says that he was the Son of a Son of Tadmon, whom Æsop had served at the same time with Rhodope the Courtesan.

(27) Plut. de Sera Numinis Vindicta, p. 557, d.

(28) Plut. in Solone, pag. 94.

(29) Horat. de Arte Poetica, ver. 343.

hereupon to accuse him of Sacrilege, and pretending to have convicted him of it, threw him from the top of a Rock. The Gods provoked by this action chastised them for it by a Pestilence and Famine: so that to make these Plagues cease, they gave notice in all the Assemblies of Greece, that if any Body in honour of Æsop would come and demand Justice for his Death they would give him Satisfaction. In the third Generation a Man of Samos (26) presented himself, who had no other Relation to Æsop, than being descended from some Persons that had bought that Writer of Fables at Samos. The Delpbians gave Satisfaction to this Man, and were thereby delivered from the Diseases and Famine that tormented them. Καὶ τὸν τινὰς δίκας δόντες οἱ Δελφοὶ τῶν κακῶν ἀπαλλάγησαν. Huic pro delicto satis dedisse Delpbos, itaque eos malis liberatos fuisse (27).

[F] If Æsop spoke like a Courtier, Solon spoke like a true Philosopher. Solon abated nothing of his rigid Maxims before Cræsus: he discoursed with him of the Vanity of humane Greatness in the same Tone, as if he had been comforting a poor sick Man, nor had he any Complaisance for the Prejudices of a Monarch, insatuated with a Persuasion that Riches are the source of Happiness. This displeased Cræsus to such a Degree, that he dismissed Solon without any mark of his Esteem. Æsop, who had been sent for by that Prince, was very much respected at Court: he was concerned for Solon's Disgrace, and talking with him as a Friend, you see, Solon, said he either we must not come near Kings, or we must entertain them with things agreeable to them. That is not the Point, replied Solon, you should either say nothing to them, or tell them what is useful. Οὐδὲ λαχόντοῖς Αἰσώπου (ἐπύχευε γὰρ εἰς Σάρδεις γεγονώς, μεταπειρῶντο ὑπὸ Κροίσου, καὶ τιμώμενος) ἤχρησεν τῷ Σόλωνι, μηδεμίαν τυχάντι φιλικὴν φιλίας, καὶ ἀρετρίαν αὐτῶν, ὃ Σόλων (ἐπὶ) τοῖς βασιλεῦσι δὲ ὡς ἡδίστα ὀμιλεῖν. καὶ ὁ Σόλων, Μὰ Δι' (εἶπεν) ἀλλ' ὡς ἡκιστα ἢ ὡς ἀρίστα. Erat eadem tempestate Sardibus fabularum scriptor Æsopus, quem Cræsus acutum in honore habebat. Hic vicem Solonis doluit illiberaliter dimissi, monebatur enim, cum regibus, Solon (inquit) est aut nequaquam aut quam jucundissimè agendum. Cui Solon, Minime, inquit, imò nequaquam aut quam optime (28). It must be confessed this caution of Æsop argues a Man well acquainted with the Court and Great Men: but Solon's answer is the true Lesson of Divines who direct the Conscience of Princes.

[G] Æsop employed the most judicious and most ingenious Lessons he could devise against the Vices of Men. Can there be more happy Inventions than the Images made use of by Æsop to instruct Mankind? they are very proper for Children, and not without their use to Persons in Years: they have all that is necessary to the Perfection of a Precept, I mean the mixture of the profitable and delightful.

Omne tulit punctum qui miscuit utile dulci,
Lectorem delectando pariterque monendo (29).

But he's the Man, he with a Genius writes,
Who joins them both, who profits and delights.

Anlus Gallius has expressed this very well in the Twentieth Chapter of the second Book of his Noctes Atticæ. Æsopus ille è Phrygia fabulator haud immeritò sapiens exillimatus est: quum utilia monitu suasque erant, non severe, non imperiosè præcepit & censuit, ut philosophis mos est, sed festivos delectabilesque apologos commentus, res salubriter ac prospicienter animadversas, in mentes animosque hominum cum audiendi quadam illecebra induit. — Æsop the Phrygian Fabulist was justly esteemed wise, since he did not deliver or enjoin his useful Precepts in a pedantic imperious Manner, as is usual with Philosophers, but contrived agreeable and entertaining Fables, whereby he instilled into the Mind a fondness for profitable and prudent Advice. In all times they have been made to succeed the Tales of Nurfes. Æsopi fabellas quæ fabulis nutricularum proximè succedunt narrare sermone puro & nihil se supra modum extollente, deinde eandem gracilitatem stylo exigere condiscant (30). And they have never fallen into Contempt. Our Age, as delicate and haughty as they are, admire and value them, and dress them up in a hundred Shapes. The inimitable la Fontaine in our Days has added great Honour and Lustre to them. And they speak with great Encomiums of the Work of an English Wit upon the same Fables. His Name is Sir Roger l'Estrange. See what Mr de Beauval says of it in his Journal of the Month of December 1692.

[H] His Apologues are the most useful of all the Fables of Antiquity. Plato makes this Judgment of them; for having banished Homer from his Commonwealth, he has given Æsop an honourable place in it. He wishes that Children would suck in those Fables with their Milk, and recommends them to the Nurfes to teach them, for one cannot be too soon accustomed to Wisdom and Virtue. I borrow these Words from Mr de la Fontaine's Preface, who justly speaks in this manner: for tho' Plato names no Fabulist, whose Inventions he would have Children learn, it is enough that he says, there are Fables to be rejected, and Fables to be retained, and that he puts among the Fables to be rejected such as represent the Gods as Authors of divers blameable Actions. Such, he adds, are the Fables of Homer and Hesiod. From whence it may be inferred that he puts Æsop's Fables among those that are to be retained: now he recommends the Fables of this kind in the following manner (31): Τὰς δὲ ἐγκριθέντας (μυθὰς) παίσσοντες καὶ τὰς τροφὰς τε καὶ μνῆρας λέγειν τοῖς παῖσι καὶ πλάττειν τὰς ψυχὰς αὐτῶν τοῖς μυθοῖς πολὺ μᾶλλον ἢ τὰ σώματα ταῖς χερσίν. Quas denique elegerimus (Fabulas) per nutrices & matres pueris narrandas curabimus, ut ipsorum animi fabulis multo magis informantur quam corpora manibus.

— Especial care shall be taken that the Fables, which we have approved, be read to the Children by their Mothers and Nurfes, that their minds may be formed with far greater care by the Fables, than their Bodies by Hands. Apollonius Tyanaeus expresses himself more clearly than Plato upon the preference of Æsop's Fables: they are more proper, says he (32), than all other Fables, to inspire us with Wisdom: for those of the Poets only infect the Ears of the Auditors; they represent the infamous Amours of the Gods, their Intells, their Quarrels, and a thousand other Crimes: they offer to our view, Fathers devouring their Children: those who hear such things related by the Poets as certain Truths, learn to lust after Women, Riches, Dominion; to believe they commit no Crime in gratifying their most inordinate Desires, since they do but imitate the Gods. Æsop, not content with rejecting this kind of Fables, in behalf of Wisdom, has invented a new method. Apollonius, continuing his Parallel, shews by many other Arguments how much Æsop's Fables excel those of the Poets; after which he tells a Story he had learnt from his Mother in his Infancy. That Æsop being a Shepherd, and feeding his Flock near a Temple of Mercury, often begged of that God with ardent Vows the enjoyment of Wisdom. He had a great number of Competitors; what was the Consequence? They all went into Mercury's Temple, each carrying rich Offerings in their Hands. Æsop, who was poor, was the only one who had nothing valuable to offer: he only presented a little Honey

(30) Quintil. Institut. lib. i, cap. ix.

(31) Plato, de Republica, lib. ii, p. m. 604, E.

(32) Sto Philostratus in the Life of Apollonius, lib. v, cap. vi.

Whether the Ancients gave Fable a divine Original.

admirable [I]. There is no probability that the Fables, which now bear his Name, are the same which he made. They proceed from him for the most part as to Matter and Thought; but the Words are another's [K]. If all the Fables of the Poets had been like

(33) He had not taken the pains to make a No-gay of them: Would it be just, said he to Mercury, that I should neglect my Flock, while I should mind Nogays.

(34) La Fontaine ubi supra.

ney and Milk, and some Flowers, which were not so much as tied together (33). Mercury, in the distribution of Wisdom, regarded the value of the Offerings: according to this Proportion he gave to one Philosophy, to another Rhetoric, to another Astronomy, to another Poetry. He did not remember Æsop till after he had made his Distribution, and at the same time recollecting a Fable, the Hours had told him in his Cradle, he gave Æsop the Gift of inventing Fables, which was the only thing left in the House of Wisdom. An angry Critic relying upon this account of Philophrastus would have quarrelled with Mr de la Fontaine, for saying, I do not know why the Ancients did not make these same Fables come down from Heaven, and why they did not appoint a God over them, as well as over Eloquence and Poetry (34). One might have remembered this Passage in Philophrastus, and yet have spoke as Mr de la Fontaine has done: for there was never any well established Tradition among the Ancients, concerning the divine Original of the Apologue. I shall not cite Strabo; for though his Apology for Fables comprehends the Fictions of Æsop, it is certain it is principally designed in Vindication of those of Homer. It is a strange sort of Apology, since Strabo ingenuously confesses that it was necessary the Legislators and Commonwealths should adopt the Tales of the Poets, in order to impress Sentiments of Religion upon the Minds of the People: for you are not to imagine, says he, that Women, and the Common People, can be led to Faith and Piety by philosophical Discourses; there is need of Superstition to do this, and without Fables Superstition can never be produced; it was therefore necessary to invent Fables in order to make use of them as Spectres and Phantoms to terrify the ignorant. Philosophy is only for a few. Fables are a public Benefit: they fill the Theaters. Οὐ γὰρ ὅχλον τε γυναικῶν, καὶ πάντας χυδαῖς ἀλλήδης ἐπαγαγεῖν λόγῳ δύνατον φιλοσόφῳ, καὶ προκαλεσασθαι πρὸς εὐσεβείαν, καὶ ὁσιότητα καὶ πίστιν, ἀλλὰ δεῖ καὶ διὰ δεισιδαιμονίας τῶτο δ' ἐκ ἀνεν μυστοποιίας, καὶ τερατείαις. Κεραιὸς γὰρ, καὶ αἰγίς, καὶ τρίακτα, καὶ λαμπάδες, καὶ δρακόντες, καὶ θυρολόγια τῶν οἰῶν ὅπλα μύθοι, καὶ πάντα θεολογία ἀρχαῖκή. ταῦτα δ' ἀπεδείκνυτο οἱ τὰς πολιτείας καταστράμνοντες μορμολύκας τινὰς πρὸς τὴν νηπιόφροναν. . . . Ἀυτὴ μὲν ἐν πρὸς ὀλίγῃς, ἡ δὲ ποιητικὴ δημοφιλέστερα, καὶ δεῖατρα πολλῶν δυναμένη. Fieri enim non potest, ut mulierum, ac promiscue turbæ multitudo, Philosophicæ oratione excitetur: necaturque ad religionem, pietatem, ac fidem: sed superstitionis præterea ad hoc opus est quæ incuti sine fabularum portentis nequit. Etenim fulmen, ægis, trident, facies, angues, hæcque Deorum thyrsis præfixæ, atque uniuersa præca theologia, fabulæ sunt, receptæ à civitatum autoribus; quibus veluti larvis insipientium animos terrent. . . . Verum hæc ipsa (Philosophia) ad paucos pertinet: poetica in publicum utilior est, quæ etiam theatra implere valet (35).

(35) Strabo, lib. 1, p. 13.

(36) Diog. Laërt. lib. 1, num. 72, in Chilone.

(37) Ibidem, ibid. num. 90. See the Index Achilleus of Mr. Dreincourt, num. 377.

THE World a Wheel of Fortune.

[I] The answer he gave Chilo is admirable. Chilo one of the seven Wise Men of Greece was already an old Man in the LIId Olympiad (36), when Æsop was in his Bloom. Chilo, it is not well known where and when, having asked Æsop what was the Employment of Jupiter, received this Answer: *he lowers things that are high, and raises those that are low. φασὶ δ' αὐτὸν καὶ Αἰσώπου πρὸς δεῖναι, ὁ Ζεὺς τί ἐστὶν ποιεῖν, τοῦ δὲ φάσαι, τὰ μὲν ὑψηλὰ ταπεινῶν, τὰ δὲ ταπεινὰ ὑψηλῶν. Ferunt eum & Æsopum interrogasse quidnam faceret Jupiter, illumque respondisse, excelsa humiliat, & humilia extollit (37). Without doubt this answer is an exact Epitome of the History of Mankind. Take that History at which end you please, and follow the Course of it, from the beginning to end, you will see every where Instances of the Alternative meant by Æsop. The World is a true Wheel of Fortune, where every thing by turns ascends and descends, and wherein we ought to admire the depths of a wise Providence, and the Activity of our Passions. Does a Man grow rich, his Children, brought up in Wealth, are puffed up with Vanity, become prodigal, and ruin themselves. The Children* of the latter, having nothing to trust to but their Industry, labour Day and Night to enrich themselves, and succeed accordingly. A Kingdom acquires great Power; they grow proud, and treat their Neighbours haughtily: each fearing to be subdued, to secure themselves from Danger, make such formidable Leagues, that they humble the Prince who had raised himself so high. This Rule is not without its Exceptions; for there are Families and States who preserve their Grandeur a long time. The Roman Commonwealth, which pulled down so many Sovereigns, encreased in Greatness for many Ages. The Pagans were so thoroughly persuaded that Heaven purposely humbled high things, that they feigned there were some Gods, who were filled with Jealousy at the Prosperity of Men. The Philosophers themselves, who denied a Providence, acknowledged I know not what which affected to overthrow great things.

Usque adeo res humanas vis abdita quædam
Obterit, & pulcros falces, sævæque secures Proculcare ac ludibrio sibi habere videtur (38).

(38) Lucret. lib. 5. ver. 1233.

And hence we fancy unseen Powers in things,
Whose Force and Will such strange Confusion brings,
It spurns and overthrows our greatest Kings.

CREECH.

If Man was not an undisciplinable Animal, would he not have been cured of his Pride, after so many Proofs of Æsop's Maxim reiterated in every Country, and every Age? two thousand Years hence, if the World should last so long, the continual Revolutions of the Wheel will have made no changes in the Heart of Man. Why then are they repeated without Intermission or end? here it becomes us to adore in humble Silence the Wisdom of the Governor of the Universe, acknowledging at the same time the infinite Corruption of our Nature, and its Servitude under the Yoke of machinal Impressions, an inveterate Disease which yields to nothing but the miraculous Operations of Grace. If we understood the full extent of this Servitude, and the Nature of the Laws of the Union of the Soul with the Body, one might write a Book upon the Causes of the Reciprocal contained in Æsop's Answer; I say a Book, which might be intitled, De centro oscillationis moralis, in which one might reason upon Principles almost as necessary as those of Mr Hugens and other Philosophers, who have treated De centro oscillationis, or of the Vibrations of Pendulums.

[K] His Fables are derived from him as to the Matter; but the words are another's. I mean of Planudes. This is the Opinion of a very good Critic. ' Verificum ac prope certum videtur says he (39), Planudem partim auribus accepisse à majoribus natu commenta Æsopica, partim legendo diversis ex auctoribus mutuatum: quædam etiam invenisse per se & concinnasse ad arbitrium suum: etiam ἐπιμύθητον & appendiculam illam explicatricem fabulæ subiecisse plerumque ex suo sensu: omnia porro verbis complexum fuisse propriis & suis. — It seems probable, and almost certain, says he, that Planudes collected the Fables of Æsop partly from his Ancestors, partly from reading several Authors, that some were his own Invention, that he added the Moral and Explication of the Fable, and often agreeably to his own fancy, and that the whole was put into his own Form and Words. He confirms his Conjecture by the conformity of Style which is observed between the Life of Æsop, and the Fables of Æsop. Now no body is ignorant that Planudes is the Author of that Life. It is remarkable that Henry Stephens, in his Thesaurus Linguae Græcæ, never cited Æsop's Fables (40); which shews that he took them for the Work of a modern Greek. The Reader will not be sorry to find here some other proofs of Francis Favosser's Opinion. That learned Jesuit observes (41), that there is mention made of the Piræus in one of Æsop's Fables: now the Piræus was not built till about the LXXVth Olympiad; before that time the Phalerum was the Port of the Athenians: so that it would have been the Phalerum, and not the Piræus, that Æsop

(39) Franciscus Vavassor, de ledica dictione, pag. 21.

(40) Faber Vavassor, de ledica dictione, makes this Remark.

(41) Ibidem, pag. 19.

like his, Strabo would have had no need to have undertaken an Apology for them [L]. It is not easy to comprehend why Seneca lays it down, for Matter of Fact, that the Romans had not yet attempted this kind of Compositions [M]. The Athenians erected a Statue to Æsop (g). Some think it is he, who under the Name of Lockman is become so famous among the Eastern Nations. He has been placed in the Number of Persons that are risen from the Dead [N].

Since the first Edition of this Work, I have read Æsop's Life composed by Meziriac. Out of which the Reader will find some Extracts below [O].

Æsop would have mentioned: Æsop, I say, who died (42) long before Themistocles built the Piræus. We find in the Explanation of one of Æsop's Fables these words of St James (43). God resisteth the proud, but giveth Grace to the humble. Ὁ μὲν οὖν ἄνθρωπος, ὅτι κύει οὐκ ἐπερφηνοῖς ἀντιτάσσεται, ταπεινοῖς δὲ διδωσὶ χάριν, Fabula declarat quod Deus superbis resistit, humilibus autem dat gratiam. From whence we may conclude, that Planudes made that Fable, or at least added that Explanation to it. If it is not Planudes, it is some other Christian, or at least a Jew (44). Nor can it be said that there are certain common notions which may as well come from the Pen of a Phrygian, as from that of Solomon, or Planudes; for besides that it is very rare, that two Persons should chance to light upon the same words, and the same disposition of Letters, to express the same thought, it is certain that Æsop would not have put κύει into the Maxim here in question. That word is taken for God only in the LXX, and in the Authors who follow them (45).

Father Vassaff is not the first who has taken Planudes for the Author of Æsop's Fables now extant. Nevelet, who published in 1610 a Collection of Fables, declared himself of this Opinion. Ex MSS. illis quos habui ne unicus quidem vulgatas jam habuit Æsopi fabulas quas à Planude, ut Æsopi Vita est, scriptas existimo (46). — Of all the MSS. in my Possession, not one had the Fables of Æsop which now are published, which I imagine to be written by Planudes, as well as Æsop's Life. The Manuscripts he speaks of were in the Library of Heidelberg, and had furnished him with about 136 Fables, which he added to those of Æsop already printed. But if he added those 136 Fables to those of Æsop, it was not that he thought him the Author of them; for he confesses he knows not who to attribute them to, and that they seem to be of several Authors: those wherein the Monastic Life is applauded he ascribes to certain Monks (47). Father Vassaff (48) observes, that there are 150 Fables in the Compilation of Æsop's done by Planudes, and that three are wanting therein, which Antiquity ascribed to Æsop (49). Nevelet's Collection contains 296 Fables of Æsop.

Note, the observation concerning the word κύει needs an amendment. Father Vassaff pretends that it is peculiar to the seventy Interpreters to make use of this word for God, and that therefore Æsop would not have used it in that sense. Adde quod horum Interpretum proprium fuit pro κυεῖν hic, ut ubique vertunt, usurpare: quod Æsopum facere non convenit, sed τὸν Θεὸν appellare, seu τὸ Θεῖον (50). I believe he is right with respect to Æsop; but I am not of the same Opinion I was at the first Edition of this Work: Knowing at present that a Pagan Author, who lived since the Apostles, has given to God the Name of κύριος, and has even joined it with that of εὐαγγέλιον, as they have done in the Litany of the Church. Arrian is this Author; his words are: Νῦν δὲ τρέμοντας τὸ ὀρνιθόειον κρατῶμεν καὶ τὸν Θεὸν ἐπικαλούμενοι δέομεθα αὐτοῦ, κύριε ἐλέησον, ἐπίτρεψόν μοι ἐξελεῖσθαι. At nunc tremebundi moramur aviculam, & Deum implorantes rogamus ipsum supplices: Miserere mei Domine, da ut possim evadere (51). It must be remembered that he observes in the same Chapter, that those who went to consult a Diviner gave him the Name of κύριος; let us quote this. Διὰ τὸ τοιαυτὸν μὲν τὰς Μάντιες κληρονομίῳ κύριε τὸν πατέρα; ἰδωμεν. ἐπεκδυσάμεθα. καὶ κύριε, ὡς ἡ τυχὴν θίλει; ἔπειτα εἴπη κληρονομίῳ αὐτῶν αὐτὴν κληρονομίαν ἐληφότες, εὐχαριστοῦμεν αὐτῷ. That is to say, Therefore we flatter the Diviners: My Lord, shall I inherit my Father's Estate? Let us see, let us consult the Entrails of the Victims. Yea, my Lord! what is the Will of Fortune? and when be has answered, you shall inherit, we thank him as if we received the inheritance from him. Arrian justly ridicules that Practice.

VOL. II. No. LVII.

[L] If all the Fables of the Poets had been like his, Strabo would have had no need to have undertaken an Apology for them. We have already seen (52) what that Apology is. The Author has forgot the chief Point in it. Which Plato and Apollonius Tyanæus touched upon, when they said that those, who see the Gods commit all manner of enormous Crimes, are apt to believe there is no harm in doing the same (53). What could Strabo answer to this objection? His Rhetoric taught him to conceal his knowledge of such Objections being made against the Fables of the Poets.

[M] Seneca lays it down for Matter of Fact, that the Romans had never attempted this kind of Compositions. These are Seneca's words: Non audeo te usque eo producere ut fabellas quoque & Æsopos logos, intentatum Romanis ingenii opus, solita tibi venustate connectas (54). — I dare not proceed so far as to point out Fables, and the Stories of Æsop, as a proper subject to employ your elegant Pen, it being a task not biberio attempted by a Roman Genius. When Seneca said this, had they not seen at Rome the Fables of Phædrus, which is an incomparable Work? In answer to this question, Lipsius says, Phædrus was nota Romanis, and that Seneca speaks only of Roman Wits, Romanis ingenii. I can hardly think so great a Man as Lipsius would take up with so sorry a reason as this. Did not the Comedies of Terence, who was born in Africa, pass for the production of a Roman Author? Why should not the Fables of Phædrus, born in Ithrace, and freed by an Emperor, have the same Fate? It is certain Seneca opposes the Latin Tongue to the Greek Tongue: therefore his meaning is, that there had been none but Greek Books upon the subject of the Apologies. Shall we say that Phædrus did not publish his Fables himself, and therefore they might yet be a private Manuscript in Seneca's time? This is neither probable, nor consistent with all the Author's preambles: It must be said then that Seneca forgot there was such a Book in the World as the Fables of Phædrus. Men as learned as himself in these latter Ages have been subject to such mistakes.

[N] He has been placed among Persons that are risen from the dead. Ptolemy, the Son of Hephestion, perhaps spoke fully of it: but we know no more of it now than those two Lines: ὧς αἰσώσῃ ἀναιρεῖσθαι ὑπὸ Δελφῶν ἀνελῶσε καὶ συνέμαχῃ τοῖς Ἑλλήσι περὶ Θερμοπύλης. As Æsop, killed by the Inhabitants of Delphi, rose again, and fought with the Greeks at the Pass of Thermopylae (55). If I am not mistaken, this was the Title of a Chapter in the Work, of which Photius has preserved some Extracts, and was not unlike a Chapter of the Chronicle of the ancient Worthies. Scaliger (56), having cited the Greek words above, justly cries out Nugæ Græculorum; but I do not understand what he had said before he quotes them, Nugatur Græculus Alexander apud Photium 252. He seems to tax here one Alexander who had made a Collection of wonderful things (57). But besides that Photius places him under the number 129, he does not tell us that this Author spoke of Æsop. If we may believe an Author of the XVIth Century, Plato the Comic had mentioned that Resurrection (58). Let us say rather, if Suidas is to be credited (59).

[O] The Life of Æsop composed by Meziriac. . . We shall give . . . some Extracts of it. It is a small Book printed at Bourg in Bresse, in the Year 1632. It contains only forty Pages in 16°. And is become extremely scarce. Mr Simon de Valbebert (60), Librarian-keeper to the Abbot Bignon, has been so kind as to send me his copy; from which I have taken what follows. It is more probable that Æsop was born at Cotiaum, a Town in Phrygia, than that he was born

(g) Phædrus, Fabul. X, lib. III.

(52) In Remarke [H].

(53) See Remarke [H], Citat. [32], and les Penées sur les Comètes, pag. 559.

(54) Seneca, de Consolat. ad Polibium, cap. 27.

(55) Photius, in Biblioth. n. 190, pag. 489.

(56) Scaliger, Animadv. in Eusebium, n. 1453, pag. 93.

(57) Θανυσάων αναγνώστη. Admirabilium Collectio. Photius, n. 189, p. 468.

(58) Porro ex Græcis sunt qui Æsopum hunc revivisse fabulantur, quod Comicum item Plato significavit. There are moreover some Grecians, who pretend that this Æsop was resurrected to Life, which Plato the Comician likewise mentions. Cæli Rhodigini, lib. xv, cap. xxvi, pag. m. 824.

(59) In Avast, Evast, See, before, a Note of Francis Portus, which contains a Passage of the Scholiast upon Aristophanes.

(60) See the Epistle Dedicatory of the Origines de la Langue Française de Mr Menage, Edit. 1694, at Fol.

(42) In the LIV Olympiad, according to Vossius, ibidem. See above, Rem. [C].

(43) Epist. cap. iv, ver. 6.

(44) The same Sentence is in the third chapter of the Proverbs of Solomon.

(45) See Father Vassaff, p. 19, 20; and the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Dec. 1684, Art. I, towards the end.

(46) Isaacus Nicolaus Neveletus, in Prefatione.

(47) Idem, ibid.

(48) De ludicra Dictione, p. 16.

(49) Lucian in Philomito, speaks of one. Aul. Gellius, lib. II, cap. xxix, speaks of another. Ælian, Var. Hist. lib. x, cap. v, speaks of another. But this last seems not to have been an Apologue.

(50) Vassaff, ubi supra, p. 20.

(51) Arrianus, in Epicteto, lib. II, cap. vii, p. m. 85. Mr du Rondel furnished me with this Passage.

(61) Meziriac ex
Aphthonio.

(62) Idem, ex
Schol. Aristoph.
in Aves, Hero-doto, & Plutar-cho.

(63) Idem, ex
Phædro.

(64) Meziriac had said before, that Æsop met them at the Court of Cræsus.

(65) Idem, ex
Plutarcho.

(a) Suidas in Alwazeg.

(1) Voß de Hist.
Græc. pag. 316.

(a) See his Notes upon the LIVth
Letter of the 2th book of Symma-chus, Edit. 1601.

(1) It is at the beginning of his Commentary upon Quintus Curtius.

at Sardis, or in the Isle of Samos, or at Mesambria in Tbrace. The first Master he served was one Zemarchus, or Demarchus, surnamed Caræus, a Native and Inhabitant of Athens (61). It is therefore probable that it was there he learned the purity of the Greek Tongue as in its Source, and became acquainted with Moral Philosophy which was then in Esteem . . . in process of time, he was sold to Xanthus, a native of the Isle of Samos, and afterwards to the Philosopher Idmon or Iadmon, who was also a Samian by Nation, and who made him free (62). After recovering his Liberty, he soon obtained a very great Reputation among the Greeks . . . so that the report of his extraordinary wisdom having reached the Ears of Cræsus, he sent for him, and taking an Affection for him, engaged him by his Benefits to devote himself to his service as long as he should live. . . . He travelled through Greece, either for his own pleasure, or for the particular Affairs of Cræsus, and passing by Athens (63), a little after Pisistratus had usurped the Sovereign Power, and abolished the popular Government; and seeing that the Athenians bore the Yoke with great impatience . . . he told them the Fable of the Frogs who asked a King of Jupiter. . . . He met again with the seven wise Men of Greece (64) in the City of Corinth at the Court of Periander the Tyrant (65). . . . Some relate (66) that to shew that human Life is full of Misery, and that one Pleasure is accompanied with a thousand Pains, Æsop used to say that Prometheus, having taken a piece of Clay to knead and form a Man out of it, diluted it not with Water, but with Tears. Here is an Authority which confirms the Opinion of Xenophanes, that the evil surpasses the good.

I pass by some other particulars mentioned by Meziriac, which may be found in the Remarks upon this Article. He concludes his little Book with these words: 'Certainly if it is agreed that this (67) is a genuine Work of Æsop, it must be confessed we have no writings more antient than these, except the Books of Moses, and some others of the Old Testament.' With all the respect due to the Memory of this learned Man, I must observe that he ends his Book with a very gross mistake; for who does not know that the Poems of Homer and Hesiod were before any thing that Æsop could be Author of? Does he not confess himself (68) that the honour of the invention of Fables is due to the Poet Hesiod? How comes it to pass then that a few Pages after he makes Æsop elder than Hesiod? Meer heedlessness.

Note, that Mr Menage (69) falsely ascribes to him the having confuted the chronological blunder of Planudes with respect to the Quotation of Euripides.

(66) Idem, ex
Themistio.

(67) That is to say, the Fables which appear under his name.

(68) Idem, ex
Quintiliano.

(69) See Remark
[B], Citat. (10).

ESOP, or Æsop, Author of a Panegyric upon Mitbridates, was Reader to that Prince. He also wrote a Piece upon Helen (a), in which he mentioned a thing that has all the Air of a Fable [A]. Moreri's Article of this Æsop is full of falsities [B].

[A] He mentioned a thing which has all the air of a Fable. He said, that in a Fish named Pan, there is found a Stone called Afterites, which the Rays of the Sun will set on Fire. He added that they make good Philtres of it. Suidas informs us of this. It is probable Æsop spoke of this Philtre, because, to excuse Helen, he feigned that Paris could not carry her away till he had by some extraordinary Methods caused her to love him.

[B] Moreri's Article . . . is full of falsities. I. We find in it, that Æsop the Greek Historian wrote the History of Alexander the Great in Letters. So Moreri has translated this Latin of Vossius, Vitam Alexandri Magni literis prodidit (1). No doubt he imagined that this Æsop was one of Alexander's Retinue, and that he wrote the News of the Army to his Friends, and that the Collection of those Letters was afterwards a History of that Conqueror. II. Moreri adds, that he is different (he speaks of the Epistolary Historian) from him mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius in the Life of Chilo. A Man, who must have known that Diogenes Laërtius spoke there of Æsop the Phrygian, would not have expressed himself as Moreri has done; for besides that Æsop ought to be characterized by the wonderful Talent he had for Fable, you must know that Moreri had just given a long Article of Æsop the Phrygian. Therefore he believed the Person named Æsop, whom he speaks of in the following Article, differs from Æsop the Phrygian; so that it is undeniable he was ignorant that the Æsop in Chilo's Life is the same that gained so much fame by his Fables. This then may be deemed his second falsity. The III^d consists in saying, that Æsop the Author of Mitbridates's Panegyric was Pompey's Friend. He cites Suidas and Vossius: not that he consulted the first of those two Authors: he saw him quoted by the latter, and that was enough for him. The cause of his mistake was this; he had read in Vossius these words (2): 'Pompeii familiari (3) ac Mithridatici belli scriptori subdatur Mithridatis anagnosis Æsopus, cui Mithridatis encomium nomen perit. — To this Favourite of Pompey, and Writer of the Mithridatic War, may be subjoined, Æsop Reader to Mitbridates, who gained a Name by his Panegyric upon Mitbridates.' He thought this signified that Æsop was Pompey's Friend. So exact was he in examining attentively what he copied.

(2) Idem, pag.
521, 529.

(3) He means Theophrastus the Historian, whom he had mentioned just before.

(4) Adversus
lib. ii. cap. 2.

ESOP, or Æsop, a Greek Author of a romantic History of Alexander the Great. It is not known in what time he lived. His Work has been translated into Latin by one Julius Valerius, who is not much better known than Æsop. The Manuscript of this Translation was in the Hands of Francis Juret (a), and Gaspar Bartbius (b). The latter attributes the whole Performance to a Monk. I shall relate [A] what he and Freinshemius have said of it.

[A] I shall relate what Bartbius and Freinshemius have said of it. The learned Freinshemius, in the Catalogue he has given us of all the Authors of the History of Alexander, has the following words (1). 'JULIUS VALERIUS. Latinam fecit historiam fabulosam de Alexandro, quæ ab aliis Æsopo, ab aliis Callistheni adscripta fuit. Unde fabulas suas certatim hauserunt Antoninus, Vincentius, Urspergensis, alii. Precium videbatur adscribere hoc loco judicium C. Barthii ex 2, 10. Adversariorum. Talia multa in non inrudito Monacho sunt, qui vitam Alexandri Magni prodigiis mendacis factam edidit ante aliquamulta secula: quæ fabula tantum olim fidei habuit, ut à prudentibus etiam scriptoribus sit testimonio citata, qualis sane ante plus quam quatuor secula fuit in Anglia Silvester Giraldu, qui non dubitavit ejus cellionis auctoritate uti. An ea egregia historia edita unquam sit nescio, nos in charta scriptam habemus, sed tanti vix æstimamus, ut in Bibliothecam recipiamus. Est idem auctor quem Æsopum vocat, & interpretatum à Julio Valerio Francisco

Juretus ad Symmachi lib. 1. Epist. 54. Editione quidam priore. Ego vero neque de auctore neque de interprete credo Romani Græcive hominis esse, maxima enim in eo Græci sermonis ignorantia, nec ulla Romani notitia est. Hactenus Barthius. Typis excusa est Germanice, anno 1486. Argentorati. Citatur & Salmasio ad Solinum pag. 1025. vetus scriptor qui res Alexandri fabulose composuit. — JULIUS VALERIUS. He wrote a romantic History in Latin concerning Alexander, which by some is ascribed to Æsop, by some to Callisthenes, whence Antoninus, Vincentius, Urspergensis, and others, have borrowed their Fictions. It may not be improper in this place to mention the Opinion of Bartbius from 2. 10. of the Adversaria. Many such instances are to be found in a learned Monk, who several Centuries ago published the Life of Alexander the Great, larded with monstrous Fictions, which Romance had formerly so much Credit, that it was quoted as authentic, by Writers of good Sense, such as Silvester Giraldu above four Centuries ago in England, who did not scruple seruple to use the authority of that Monk. Whether this notable piece has been ever published or no, I cannot tell. I have it in Manuscript, but scarce think it worth a place in my Library. It is the same Author whom Franciscus Juret calls Æsop, and says was translated by Julius Valerius, Symmach. lib. 1. Ep. 54. in a former Edition. I imagine that neither the Author nor the Translator were either Greek or Roman. It betrays the grossest Ignorance in Greek, and as little Knowledge of Latin. Thus far Barthius. It was printed in high Dutch at Strasburg 1486. He is quoted also by Salmastius upon Solinus, p. 1025, as an ancient Writer who composed a romantic History of the Actions of Alexander. It is very probable this Romance was forged during the barbarous ages; and as any thing was good enough for such Critics as Vincent de Beauvais, it is no wonder so ill a Book should be valued at such a rate.

ESOP, or Æsop (CLODIUS), a celebrated Comedian flourished in the VIIth Century of Rome. He and Roscus were the best Actors the ancient Romans ever had; he for Tragedy, and Roscus for Comedy. Cicero put himself under their Discipline to perfect himself in the Action of an Orator (a). Æsop spent prodigious Sums of Money. There has been much discourse concerning an Entertainment he made, at which he had an earthen Dish served up that cost ten thousand Livres [A]. This Dish was filled only with Birds that had learned to sing or talk. Each of which cost six hundred Livres. Æsop's Son was no less extravagant than his Father. He was not content with giving his Guests birds which cost the most, as those are that are taught to sing; but he also gave them dissolved Pearls to drink. Some speak of this as if it was his common Custom [B]; but others insinuate that he gave them dissolved Pearls to drink but once

(a) Plutarch. in Vita Ciceronis, pag. 63.

[A] There has been much talk of an Entertainment.] We have this account in Pliny, in the following words according to Father Hardouin's Edition. 'Maxime insignis est in hac memoria Clodii Æsopi tragici histrionis patina HS. centum taxata: in qua posuit aves cantu aliquo aut humano sermone vocales HS. sex singulas coemptas: nulla alia inductus suavitatis nisi ut in his imitationem hominis manderet, ne quæstus quidem suos reveritus illos opimos & voce meritos

(1) Plin. lib. x, cap. 11, pag. m. 443.

(2) See the Corrections of the 10th Book, num. 62, 63.

(3) De Pallio, p. m. 32. See upon this the Commentaries of Salmastius, where you will find the Corrections of Father Hardouin.

(4) Non sit tamen, ut verum fatetur, facile inter duos judicium torpiditudo: nisi quod minus est summas rerum nature opes quam hominum linguas consille. Plin. lib. X, cap. LI and scarcer, he would have filled his Dish with greater joy. Read what follows. 'O miserabiles quorum palatum nisi ad pretiosos cibos non excitatur. Pretiosos autem non eximius sapor aut aliqua faucium dulcedo, sed vanitas & difficultas parandi facit (5). — Wretches! whose Appetites can only relish pretious Meats. But it is not the exquisite Taste, or any peculiar Delicacy, but Vanity, and the difficulty of procuring them that gives them a value.' Petronius has very well touched upon this part of Luxury in his alea phasiacis petita Colchis, &c.

(5) Seneca, Conf. ad Helvium, cap. ix.

[B] He gave . . . his guests dissolved Pearls to drink: some speak of this as his common Custom.] Valerius Maximus mentions it upon this foot. 'Huic (6) nimirum magis Æsopus tragædus, says he (7), in adoptionem dare filium suum, quam bonorum suorum heredem relinquere debuit non solum perditæ, sed etiam furiosæ luxuriæ juvenem: quem constat cantu commendabiles aviculas immanibus emptas prætiis in cena pro fœculis ponere, acetoque liquatos magnæ summæ uniones potionibus aspergere solum, amplissimum patrimonium tanquam amarum aliquam sarcinam quam celerrime abicere cupientem. — To him ought Æsop the Player rather to have given his Son in Adoption, than have left him heir to his Wealth, a young Man, not only of a desperate, but a furious Luxury. For it is certain, that he bought up at most extravagant prices Birds that could sing or talk, to have them served up at Table instead of Fig-Peckers, and used to mix with his Liquors Pearls of high rate dissolved in Vinegar, as though he had laboured to squander away an immense Patrimony, as if it had been some troublesome incumbrance.' I believe I am not mistaken in affirming that two things are confounded in this Passage which ought to be distinguished. He ought not to have charged Æsop's Son with the expence of dissolved Pearls, and that of singing Birds: the latter ought to be put to the Father's account, and the other to the account of the Son: Pliny and Tertullian are my warrants: they distinguish the Luxury of the Father from the Luxury of the Son: they charge the Father with having spent vast Sums for the fashion of a certain Dish, and filling it with Birds that had learned to sing and speak; they say nothing of his dissolving Pearls to drink. They charge the Son with that piece of prodigality, but do not impute the other to him. See Pliny at the place I have cited (8); you will find he adds to the words already related, Dignus proflus filio à quo devoratas diximus margaritas. — In every respect worthy his Son whom we have mentioned to have drunk Pearls. We shall see in the following Remark the Passage to which he refers his Reader. But Tertullian's words are: 'Qua (gula) Æsopus histrio ex avibus ejusdem pretiositatis ut canoris & loquacibus, quibusque centum millium patinam conficavit. Filios ejus post tale pulpamentum potuit sumptuosius efurire: margaritas namque vel ipso nomine pretiosas dehausit, credo, ne mendicis patre cœnasset (9). — By which Luxury Æsop the Player feasted on Birds.

(6) That is, to Caius Sergius Crata, whose prodigious Gluttony he had been representing.

(7) Val. Maxim. lib. IX, cap. 13 num. 2.

(8) Lib. X, cap. LI, pag. 443.

(9) Tertullianus, de Pallio, pag. m. 56.

once [C]. Horace mentions only one Pearl of great value [D], which Æſop's Son drank dissolved in Vinegar. Æſop, notwithstanding his vast Expenses, died worth almost two Millions (b). It is said he acted the Passions so well upon the Stage, and with so much vehemency, that he would fall into violent Raptures or Transports. One day he killed a Man during these transports [E]. Moreri has committed here several gross Blunders [F].

(b) Æsopum in pari arte ducenties fextertium reliquisse filio constat. Macrob.
Saturn. lib. ii,

Birds of the same vast value, as being taught to sing sweetly and talk, for the serving up of which he expended an hundred thousand Sesterces in a Dish. His Son after such a ragout was still more prodigally luxurious, for he swallowed down valuable Pearls, lest, as I suppose, he should sup with less Grandeur than his Father.

[C.] Others say he gave them Pearls to drink but once. Weigh well the words here under, and I am confident you will find, that they shew that Æsop's Son fell into this excess but one day that he entertained his Friends. Consider chiefly the comparison that Pliny has made between the Son of that Comedian and Cleopatra, and you will find that he did not believe that Excess was repeated; for if it had, then he would have been very much to blame not to have said so; for the inferiority he designed to give Cleopatra would have been much more sensible by it. 'Non ferrent tamen hanc palmam, (Antoniuss & Cleopatra) spoliabunturque etiam luxuriae gloria. Prior id fecerat Romæ in unioibus magnæ taxationis Clodius Tragedi Æsopi filius, relictus ab eo in amplis opibus heres, ne Triumviratu suo nimis superbat Antonius, pene hiltironi comparatus, & quidem nulla sponsione ad hoc productus, quo magis regium fiat: sed ut experiretur in gloria palati, quid sapient margarite: atque ut mire placeretur, ne solus hoc fecit, singulos unioes convivis quoque absorbendis dedit (10). — Yet Antony and Cleopatra will not carry off this prize, but be robbed even of the glory of Luxury. Clodius, Son of Æsop the Player, and heir to his vast Fortune, had done the same before at Rome with Pearls of high value. Let not Antony pride himself in his Triumvirate, being a degree below a Player, who was not prompted by any engagement to shew his Grandeur, but to experience, in the glory of his Palace, the taste of a Pearl, and as he found it to be wonderfully pleasant, that he might not engraft the noble pleasure to himself, be distributed to each guest a Gem to be drank down in the same manner.'

[G.] Horace speaks only of one Pearl of great value.] Let us imagine two Men, one of whom swallows a Pearl in the presence of the Friends he is entertaining, and the other, not content with this, makes each of his guests also do the same, we shall find a very notable difference between these two Feasts: the latter will appear infinitely more sumptuous than the first, all other things being equal. Wherefore if Æsop's Son did what Pliny imputes to him, it is certain his Feast is much more remarkable, than if he alone had swallowed a Pearl. I go farther, and say that the chief singularity of that Feast, and the Circumstance for which it will be most remembered, was, that each of the guests there drank a dissolved Pearl. Whence comes it then that Horace says nothing of this particular and remarkable Circumstance? It is certain that if Pliny had forgot it, he would have shewed, that between two remarkable things he did not know how to choose the best, and would have neglected his Advantages, for being to prove that a common Citizen of Rome, a Player's Son, had out-done Cleopatra, he would have passed over in silence what chiefly heightened the Action of a Citizen above that of a great Queen. The same objection lies against Horace: his Argument would have been much stronger, if he had said of Æsop's Son all that Pliny has said. Why then did he forget it? Why should he choose between two notable Facts that which is least so? Why should he neglect the Advantages of his proof, and of his moral Reflexion? It will be said perhaps that he knew no more of the prodigality of that Player's Son than what he has said of it. But this raises a difficulty. How is it possible this Man's Feast should come to the Knowledge of Horace, by the least remarkable Circumstance of it; by a very singular Fact, I confess, if it is considered in itself, but little singular if compared with the other Fact. Be that as it will, let us see the words of this Poet:

Filius Æsopi detractam ex aure Metellæ

(Scilicet ut decies solidum exsorberet) aceto
Diluit insignem baccham: qui sanior, ac si Illud idem in rapidum flumen, jaceretve clocam (11)?

*A costly Jewel from Metella's Ear, Æsop's loose Son dissolv'd in Vinegar,
And drank it down, and then profusely laugh'd,
To think he drank a Province at a draught.
Was't not as mad as to have thrown the Gem
Into a Common-Shore or muddy Stream?*

CREECH.

An old Scholiast upon Horace says that this Metella was the Wife of Æsop's Son. Others (12) say she was not his Wife, but that he was honoured with her favours, and that she made him a present of that Pearl, which was worth twenty five thousand Crowns. They add that she might be the Sister of Q. Cæcilius Metellus, married to L. Lucullus. We shall examine this in another place (13).

[E] He one Day killed a Man during these Transports. The thing deserves to be told. Let us see what Plutarch says of it. Τὸν δὲ Αἰσωπὸν τῶτον ἰσορῶν ὑποκρινόμενον ἐν θεατρῷ τὸν περὶ τῆς τιμωρίας τῷ θυέτι βαλόμενον Ἀτρεΐδα, τὸν υπερβὴν τινὲς ἄνθρω παραδραμόντος ἔξω τὸν ἑαυτὸ λογιζομέν διὰ τὸ πάθος ὄντα τὸν σκίσσιντρον πατάξει καὶ ἀνελεῖν. Hanc Æsopum tradunt dum in theatro agit Atræa de puniendo deliberantem Thyestis ita fuisse motum, ut impos mentis mīdium quemdam qui repente prætercurreret feriret sceptro, & occideret (14). — It is reported that this Æsop, as he was acting the part of Atræus, meditating Revenge against Thyestes, was so transported, that he struck with his Sceptre a Servant who chanced to cross the Stage, and killed him.

[F] Mereri has committed here several gross blunders. I. It is false that Æsop the Comedian was a Tragic Poet. II. He was upon his Decline (15), when, in the Year of Rome 698, Pompey's Theatre was dedicated. A good Chronologer then would not have placed him towards the Year of Rome 700. III. The Authors quoted by Mereri do not say that Æsop was Cicero's Friend. If he would speak of this Friendship, he should have quoted other People, and for want of quoting them he deserves in some Respects the Title of a Deceiver. He should have cited Cicero himself: I have already quoted the place where he calls him noſter Æſopus (16), and where he mentions a very particular Adventure, that Æſop, being now quite worn out, yet would appear at the magnificent Games Pompey exhibited to the People at the Dedication of his Theatre: but he tired all the Spectators, and his Voice entirely failed him when he was reciting that part of the Oath, in which are expreſſed the Penalties the falſe Swearer was to undergo. In another Letter Cicero deſires his Brother Quintus to enquire after a Slave that had run away from Æſop's Houſe. Æſopi tradigat noſtri familiaris Licinius ſervus tibi notus auſugit (17). Macrobius alſo might be quoted in this Matter. * Hiſtrionem non inter turpes habitos * Cicero teſtimonio eſt, quem nullus ignorat Roſcius * & Æſopo hiſtrionibus tam familiariter uſum, ut reſ rationeſque eorum fua ſollertia tueretur, quod cum aliis multis tum ex epitollis quoque eſus declaratur. (18) — Cicero proves that Players were not looked on as contemptible Perſons, ſince every one knows, he was ſo intimate with Roſcius and Æſop the Actors, that he vigorously maintained their Affairs and Cauſes, as appears in his Epistles as well as in many other Places. IV. What Mereri ſays of Æſop's often accompanying Cicero when he went to hear Hortenſius's Orations, as Valerius Maximus obſerves, is a notorious Falſhood. Charles Stephens was in this an ill guide to Mereri: He affirms the ſame, and cites Valerius Maximus, who only ſays that Roſcius and Æſop went to hear Hortenſius (19). V. Mereri reports ill what Pliny had ſaid concerning Æſop's Luxury. He was

cap. x. Ducenties Sestertium, according to Galsendus, in Abaco Sestertiorum are 1861111 livres, some few pence.

(11) Horat. Sat.
III, lib. ii, ver.
239.

(12) Mr Darier
upon this Passage in Horace, Tome
VII, p 301.

(13) In the Article ME TEL
LA, Rem. [A]

is (14) Plutarch. in t- Cicer. Vita, et pag. 863.

(1c) Honoris caussa in lee-nam red'erant si
quos ego honoris
caussa de scena decesse arbitra-
bar. Delicæ vero tue nollet Æsopus ejusmodi
fuit ut ei desinere per omnes ho-mines liceret. Is jurare cum expisset, vox eum defecit in illo
loco, si sciens
falso Cicero,
Ediss. I, Libri VII. ad Famil.

(16) See the preceding Citation.

(17) Idem, Epist.
II, lib. I, ad
Quintum fratrem.

(18) Macrobi. Saturn. lib. ii, cap.

(10) Valet. Max.
Libr. VIII, Cap.
X, num. 2.

(20) See Remark [A].

(21) In hac (pans) ferorum jeciorum, phasianorum & pavonum cerebella, LINGUAS phoenicopterum, murænarum lactes a Parthia utque fretoque Hispanico per navarchos ac tritremes petitarum, commiscuit. In that dish be mixed the livers of Scare fowls, the brains of Pheasants and Peacocks, the tongues of Phœnicopteris, and the rows of Lampreys, for which the Fishermen and Masters of boats, ranched the Seas from Parthia to the Straits of Gibraltar. Suetonius, in Vitellio, cap. xiii.

ignorant that instead of Sexcentum Sestertium, it should be read Centum Sestertium (20). Must he not wonder at the prodigious Sum he makes the price of a Dish amount to? and if ten thousand Livres, which is the price of it according to Father Hardouin's Calculation, supposing it should be red Centum, is something incredible, how monstrous would it be to say, by retaining the reading, Sexcentum, that each Great Sestertice was worth twenty five Crowns? must not Moreri admit it as an unavoidable Consequence, that Æsop's earthen Dish cost Forty five thousand Livres? Farther, what he calls the Great Sestertice is equal to a thousand Sestertices. Now I find that, according to the most exact Authors, the value of a thousand Sestertices is much more than Twenty five Crowns. A thousand Sestertices according to Cassendus are worth Ninety three Livres, one Sol, one Denier; according to Father Hardouin they are worth a hundred Livres. So that Moreri is wrong in every respect. VI. It is not true that Æsop's Dish was full of Bird's Tongues; it was filled with the Birds themselves. One would think that Moreri would confound this with the Luxury of Vitellius (21), or had taken one for the other. VII. Pliny does not say, that those Tongues cost six Crowns a piece. He says in the good Editions, that each Bird cost six thousand Sestertices, that is six hundred Livres according to Father Hardouin's Calculations; and in the common Editions he says that each Bird cost six Sestertices, nummis sex. Nothing can be more diverting than Moreri's Translation of these Latin Words. He thought that the nummus of Pliny was a French Crown, and that it was only one Sestertice, that is about two Sols or two pence French Money. From whence it appears that this common reading imputes two Absurdities to Pliny; for in that Case he would have said that the best singing, or talking Birds, cost but about twelve pence a piece, and that Æsop by buying this sort of Birds was guilty of a notorious act of Luxury and Prodigality. VIII. No Body has said, no not Valerius Maximus himself, that Æsop's Son put powder of Pearl into all his Drink. This is to surpass honest Valerius Maximus, by a thousand Degrees, who was too well versed in Hyperbole, when he mentioned this as the common practice of that extravagant Son. IX. What is most wonderful is to pretend, as Moreri has done, that the Pearls he might take out of his Mistress's Ears would be powder enough for all the drinks he should use. X. And what is more strange is to see that he depends upon the Testimony of Horace, and even quotes the Verses of that Poet, wherein he says expressly, that Æsop's Son dissolved a Pearl in Vinegar and swallowed it. Therefore this was a thing done in a Moment, which according to Horace was not repeated. XI. Horace does not observe that Metella was a Mistress to Æsop's Son. XII. Lastly, he should not have quoted the thirtieth Book of Pliny, but the tenth.

ESPAGNE (JOHN D') a Native of Dauphiné, and Minister of the French Church in London, in the XVIIth Century, has published several small Tracts [A], and among others, one intituled, Erreurs populaires és points généraux qui concernent l'intelligence de la Religion.

It is acknowledged that he has very well explained the Doctrine of the Eucharist. He has criticised very freely a Book of Calvin, without any regard to the public and extraordinary Favour that Work had been honoured with [B].

(1) The Hogue Edition, 1674, contains but two Vols in 12mo.

(2) Bibliothèque de Dauphiné, p. 87.

[A] He published several little Tracts. They were collected together in the Geneva Edition 167... which is in three Volumes (1), in 12mo. This Author deserves to be read: his Book of popular Errors contains very good things. He dedicated it to Charles I King of England: he informs us in his Epistle Dedicatory, that the first of his Books was published by the command of King James. This shews that Mr Allard (2) is not exact as to the times, when he says that John Despagne was a Minister at London in 1662.

[B] He has criticised... a Work of Calvin, without any regard to the public Favour it had been honoured with. This Book of Calvin is a Catechism divided into Fifty five Sections. It serves for a Text to one of the Sunday's Sermons in the Churches of the Geneva Confession, and is one of their Liturgical Books. It was received with Applause as soon as it came out and has been translated into several Languages. * Eodem anno, that is in the Year 1540 (3), scriptum (Calvinus) Catechismus Gallicæ & Latine... * quem tanti fecerunt Calvinistæ, ut non modo vernaculis plurimis linguæ, utpote Germanicæ, Anglicæ, Scoticæ, Belgicæ, Hispanicæ, sed etiam Hebræicæ donatus sit ab Emanuelle Træmelio, & Græcæ ab Henrico Stephano (4). This is the Book John d'Espagne criticised.

(3) I shall examine this Date in Remark [B] of the Article SCHULTINGIUS.

(4) Natalis Alexander, Histor. Eccles. Tom. VIII, pag. 155, Folio.

ESPAGNET (JOHN D') President of the Parliament of Bordeaux, was a learned Man of the XVIIth Century. He relished the new Philosophy, and gave public Marks of the Progress he had made in it [A]. He published in 1616 an old Manuscript, [A] He gave public marks of the Progress he had made in the new Philosophy. They ascribe a Book to him intituled, La Philosophie naturelle des Anciens rétablie en sa pureté (1).

Let us enlarge this Remark a little, which was too short in the first Edition. (2) In the Year 1623, there was printed at Paris a Book intituled Enchyridion Physicæ repositæ, which is known to be the Work of John d'Espagnet, President of the Parliament of Bordeaux, both because some Persons of his Acquaintance have affirmed it, and also they conjecture the same, because at the beginning of the Book there is this device, Spes mea est in agno, and before the Treatise of Chemistry, Pene nos unda Tagi, which are two Anagrams of his Name. This Book may be said to be the first that appeared in France, wherein there is a complete System of Physics contrary to that of Aristotle. Nevertheless the Author pretends that he has only re-established the ancient Philosophy: Though he has added many things of his own Invention. He confutes the Opinion of first matter (Materia Prima), which was held to be extended every where without being any where perceived, and incessantly desiring the Union of Forms without having any, being the basis and support of Contraries, to wit of the Elements which are said to be produced out of it. He shews that this System of Nature is an imaginary one, that there is no contrariety in the Elements, and that that which is observed in them proceeds from the excess of their Qualities, and that when they are tempered there is no contrariety in them. Nevertheless he believes that there is a Materia prima from whence the Elements result and become the second Matter of things, which are Earth and Water, for he holds neither the Air nor the Fire for Elements. The Elements according to his opinion are not transformed into each other: Water only becomes Vapour and Vapour Water by Circulation. He places the true Fire of the World in the Sun (3), which he calls not only the Eye of the Universe, but the Eye of the Creator of the Universe, by which he beholds in a sensible manner his Creatures, and which is the first Agent of the World. In the rest of his Book there are abundance of curious Particulars concerning the Origin of things, their subsistence and sundry Alterations, relating to the design this new Philosopher had to treat of Chemical things. Therefore he subjoins another Treatise intituled, Arcanum Hermeticæ Philosophiæ opus, in which he speaks of the Matter of the Philosopher's Stone and it's Digestions, of the Degrees of Fire, of the Figure of the Vessels,

(3) Note he thinks the light of the Sun and all other light is spiritual, and that our material fire is in some sort spiritual. See de la Perfection de l'Homme, p. 250 script, intituled le Rozier des Guerres [B], and added to it a Treatise of his own upon the Institution of a young Prince. It is of him that Father Abram speaks in his Commentary upon Cicero's Orations [C].

I had forgot to observe, that in publishing the Rozier des Guerres, he did not imitate those who change the old Language of the Manuscripts they publish. He followed his Original with the utmost Exactness, and even kept punctually to the old Spelling. The Reason he gave for it will serve to confirm a Remark I have made upon the new Edition of Cardinal d'Offat's Letters (a) [D].

(a) See the Article OSSAT, in the Text towards the end.

and Furnace, of the Composition of the Elixir and it's Multiplication. . . . This Book was translated into French some Years ago under the Title of La Philosophie des Anciens restablée en sa pureté.

[E] He published . . . a Manuscript intituled le Rozier des Guerres. It was found at Nerac in the King's Closet. Mr d'Espagnet thought his Edition was the first, but he was mistaken. This Book had been printed in Folio in 1523; and that Edition is larger than that of 1616. In the Manuscript of Nerac there was wanting all the second Part, and the three last Chapters of the first (4). The Prologue alone is enough to convince us that Lewis XI is not the Author of that Work (5), as is assured in the Title: yet he speaks in it, to give Instructions to the Dauphin his Son. See the Bibliothèque Choise of Mr Colin (6), and the Remark [Z] of the Article LEWIS XI.

(4) See Naudé, Addition à l'Histoire de Louis XI, pag. 72; and in Syntagm. de Studio Militari, pag. m. 73.

(5) Naudé, ibid.

(6) Pag. 16.

(7) Abram in Cicero, Orat. 7^{em}, l. 1, p. 294, vol. 2.

[C] It is of him that Father Abram speaks in his Commentary upon Cicero's Orations. I make this Remark in favour of those who would be at a loss at the reading of these Words; Atque etiam nunc pueros à sagis rapi solere, Et demonibus devoveri testatur Spagnetus in sua præfatione ad Petrum Anchoranum (7). This signifies that the President d'Espagnet, in the Preface he had put to a Book of Peter de Lancre, Counsellor in the Parliament of Bordeaux, testifies that Witches steal Children and consecrate them to the Devil.

[D] He retains punctually the old Spelling. The reason he gives for it will serve to confirm a Remark I made upon the new Edition of Cardinal d'Offat's Letters. This little Tract, du Rozier, says he (8), seemed to me so good that I would not embellish or disguise it, but have left it in it's native Simplicity: and tho' the Language of it is not in use in this Age, yet it may be understood, being so full of good sense and meaning, that with all its Jargon it may silence the affected Language of the Court and Bar. I have also carefully preferred the Spelling, because in adding or diminishing a Letter, a Word often is changed, and of old made new. By this means, in my Judgment, they have corrupted the Language of Philip de Commines in his History: thinking to mend the Spelling, and polish the Diction, they have destroyed the marks of it's Antiquity, so that the Style of his Book is not the Style of his Age, as we may judge both by this little Manuscript, and by many others of the same Age, which are to be found in famous Libraries, especially by the History of Charles VI, written by John Juvenal des Ursins, and lately published by the Sieur de Godefroy. I imagine this Error proceeds from the insufficiency of the Correctors, who pretending to correct the Spelling have falsified it, and thereby render themselves Plagiaries.

(8) Essays, in his Advertisement to the Reader.

ESPINE (JOHN DE L') a Minister of the Reformed Church. See SPINA.

ESSARS (CHARLOTTE DES) Mistress of Henry the IV, King of France, and afterwards of the Cardinal de Guise (a), was married to the Marshal de l'HOSPITAL, as I have said elsewhere (b); but I must rectify here a Mistake which escaped me [A], and must add that this Lady meddled too much with great Intrigues [B].

(a) See Remark [B] of the Article GUISE (Lewis de Lorraine Cardinal de).

(b) In Remark [B] of the Article of that Marshal.

[A] I must rectify here a mistake which escaped me. Trusting to Father Anselme, I thought that the Marshal de l'Hospital had married to his second Wife Frances Mignot in the Year 1633, from whence I concluded that he had repudiated his first Wife Charlotte des Essars, and I made some Reflexions upon this Subject. I drew this Consequence from Father Anselme's having placed the Death of Charlotte des Essars in the Year 1651. Since the second Edition of this Dictionary, I have been informed that the Marshal's second Marriage was contracted in the Year 1653 (1). Therefore it cannot be pretended that the first was declared void. I had resolved to suppress my Reflexions; but some Persons, for whom I have much deference, have advised me to let them stand: they represented to me that they were only false in the particular Application of them to Charlotte des Essars, and that, provided I informed my Readers they were to be rectified in that respect, it would not be amiss to preserve a Passage which might justly be applied on many Occasions.

(1) See the Errata of Father Anselme.

[B] She meddled too much with great Intrigues. I shall give but one instance of it. She had a Son in the Service of the Duke of Lorraine; a Son I say who called himself the Chevalier de Remorantin, whom she had by the Cardinal de Guise. She thought that the way to advance him would be to do some Service to the Duke of Lorraine by reconciling him to France, and getting him settled in his Dominions again. To this end she engaged Monsieur du Hallier, her Husband, who commanded in Lorraine, to advise the Court of France to treat with the Duke, and at the same time she solicited the Princes de Cantecroix, whom the Duke had espoused, tho' he was already married, to use all her Power to persuade him to an Accommodation (2). A Negotiation was agreed on by both Parties, which terminated in the Treaty of

(2) Mémoires de Beauvau, pag. 70, 71.

St Germain in 1641; but the Duke not performing his Promises, and not finding himself in a Condition to maintain himself, retired with his Troops to his old Post between the Sambre and the Meuse. To colour at least his Retreat, he dispatched a Courier to Cardinal Ricblieu, to inform him that what had made him retire, was not that he intended to violate his Treaty, but that the fear Madam du Hallier had created in him, that there was a Design to seize him, was the only cause of it. To prove that this fear was not without Foundation, he sent him a Note written with that Lady's own Hand, to the Lady Superiour of the Congregation of Nanci, named Angelica, her great Confident, in which she desired her to let him know that the Court took such umbrage at his Conduct, that they were thinking of the means of seizing his Person. The Cardinal was so incensed, that Madam du Hallier should presume to give such Information, that her Husband who was then employed in recovering the small places of Lorraine, and set down before Cbaté, received an Order from the King, by an express Courier, to send his Wife to one of his Houses, to change the Major of the Garrison of Nanci, and to put one in his place named Belaupel, who was not his Friend, and after the Reduction of Cbaté to come to Court, and give an account of his own and his Wife's Actions (3). . . . (3) Ibid, p. 76. Monf. du Hallier exactly obeyed the King's Commands, and as he was always beloved by him, and esteemed of an incorruptible Fidelity, he was sent back some time after into Lorraine with an Order to retake all the places that had been surrendered to the Duke, and reduce them to his Majesty's Obedience. As for his Wife, whose Ambition they had reason to distrust, she was obliged to remain in the House she had been banished to (4).

(4) Ibid, p. 77.

ESSE

ESSÉ (ANDREW DE MONTALEMBERT LORD) one of the most noble and ancient Families of Poitou, commanded in Landrecy, when the Emperor Charles the Vth besieged the Place in 1543. He defended it so well, with a Garrison overwhelmed with misery and ruined Fortifications, that the Emperor was obliged to retire, the fifth of November, after a Siege of three Months and a half. In reward of this Service, d'Essé obtained the Post of Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber to Francis I. He was sent into Scotland by Henry II, to command the Army which that Prince sent thither to the Assistance of the Scots against the English. He behaved with great Bravery, and at his return was made Knight of the Order. ' It was he also that defended Teroüenne against the Army of Charles V; and at last was killed in the Breach, after he had withstood three furious Assaults which lasted ten Hours. By his Death he was deprived of the Dignity of a Marshal of France, which was designed for him according to du Bouche, Author of the Annals of Aquitain. Mezerai says, in the History of France, ' That he is the immortal Honour of Perigord, being mistaken with respect to the Name of his Country, since he was of Poitou. Brantome speaks largely of him under the Name of d'Essé (a).

(a) Taken from a Letter in the Mémoire Galant of Aug. 1705, pag. 317, & seq.

ESTAMPES (a), in Latin Stampe, a City of France in the Beauvais, with the Title of Duchy; it is situated upon the River Juine, between Paris and Orleans in a pretty fruitful Country. It has a Bailiwick, Provostship, Election, Marshalsea, and Granary of Salt, two Collegiate Churches of Royal Foundation, one under the Title of Nôtre Dame, with a Dignitary and ten or eleven Canons, and the other under the Title of Sainte Croix, with two Dignitaries and nineteen Canons, five Parishes and several Religious Houses. King Robert laid the first Foundations of the Castle of Estampes, which was destroyed at the Request of the Inhabitants in the beginning of the Reign of Henry IV. The Prince of Condé put part of the Troops that d'Andelot had brought out of Germany into Garrison here in 1562, who, for the six Weeks they continued there, cruelly oppressed the Inhabitants, and especially the Ecclesiastics. This City is of the ancient Domain of the Crown. King Charles IV, erected it into an Earldom, in favour of his Cousin Charles d'Evreux, before it was a Barony, as appears by the Letters creating it an Earldom, dated in the Month of September 1327. Upon its return to Charles VII he gave it in 1421 to Richard of Bretagne, and afterwards, upon its being re-united to the Crown, Lewis XI gave it to John de Foix. The Letters of Donation are of the Month of April 1498. Gaston de Foix, Son of John, having been killed at the battle of Ravenna, Anne of Bretagne, Wife of Lewis XII, became Countess of Estampes, by the Donation of it from the King her Husband, in the Month of June 1513. After the Death of that Princess, which happened the Year following, the Earldom of Estampes devolved to Madam Claude of France, her eldest Daughter, who was afterwards married to Francis I, then Duke of Valois. This good Princess being dead the King gave it to John de la Barre. After his Death, Francis I erected Estampes into a Duchy, in favour of John de la Brosse of Bretagne, and Anne de Puiffelleu his Wife, who was greatly in the King's Favour. Her Name is well known in History. Henry II. dispossessed them of this Duchy in 1553, to gratify with it Diana of Poitiers, his Favourite, Wife of Lewis de Brezé, Great Seneschal of Normandy. Charles IX coming to the Crown, he restored it to John de la Brosse in the Month of April 1562. He dying without Issue, Henry III gratified Duke John Casimir with it in 1576; but he renouncing it the following Year, the King gave it, by Engagement, to the Dukes of Montpensier, from whom he took it again to give it to Margaret de Valois, his Sister, Queen of Navarre, and that Princess bestowed it some years after upon Gabriel de Estrée, Dukes of Beaufort, who left it to César Duke of Vendosme, Natural Son to King Henry IV. The illustrious Posterity of this Prince are still in Possession of it. Some pretend that Artus Gouffier, Great Master of France, was Count d'Estampes. The Act of Donation is not to be found: if that were so, the Possession of Madam Claude of France was interrupted: However, that Lord did not enjoy it long, he dying in 1518. During the Troubles of 1652, the City of Estampes, to the great regret of the Inhabitants, always loyal to their King, was, by a perfidious Man, delivered to the Army of the Princes; but was immediately besieged by the King's Army, who, after they had been six Weeks before the City, and made several Attacks, in which great Numbers were killed on both sides, were at last forced to raise the Siege, to march against the Duke of Lorraine, who was coming to the Assistance of the Princes with an Army of nine or ten thousand Men.

(a) See the Advertisement on the second Edition.

COUNCILS of ESTAMPES.

The City of Estampes has been honoured with several Provincial, and one National Council. It is not known what was the Cause of the first: it was held in 1048, and convened by Gerduin, Archbishop of Sens; what follows is found in the Life of the Archbishops of Sens. Gerduinus Synodum Stampis habuit anno 1048, in qua Imbertus Parisiensis, risiensis, Ysambertus Aurelianensis, Maynardus Trecentis, Hugo Niuernensis, Gilbertus Antistodorenensis, & Galiborius Meldensis, adsuere Rege Henrico presente. The second was assembled by Richerius, Archbishop of Sens, in the Year 1092, on Account of the Ordination of Ives des Chartres, performed by Urban II. The Archbishop pretended, that Ives was guilty of High-Treason, for getting himself ordained out of the Kingdom without the King's Permission; and therefore that he ought to be deposed. The third was held in 1112. Diambert, Archbishop of Sens, presided in it. At first Complaint was made of the ill Conduct of the Bishop of Troies, upon which the Council wrote to him. Afterwards they proceeded to the Consecration of a Bishop of Nevers, and then made several Regulations for the Reformation of Manners. The National Council held at Estampes in 1130, was assembled by the Care of Lewis the Burley; it was to know what part he should take between Pope Innocent II and Peter de Leon, called Anacletus II. St Bernard, who was present at it, said openly, that Innocent had been canonically elected, and that they could not legally proceed to a new Election. The whole Council conformed to the Judgment of St Bernard, and Innocent was acknowledged for the true and lawful Successor of St Peter. The Pope came on purpose from Chartres to Estampes, to give the Inhabitants Marks of his Thankfulness; he staid there two Days, and lodged in the Abbey of Morigni of St Benet's Order, half a quarter of a League from Estampes. This is what we learn from the Chronicle of that Abbey, who never acknowledged any other Superior than the Archbishop of Sens. Lewis the Young, before his Journey into the East, assembled his Parliament at Estampes, and left the Regency of the Kingdom to Ralph, Count of Vermandois, and to Suger, Abbot of St Denis. In the Contest between Alexander III and Cardinal Osavian, who took the Name of Victor, the same Prince assembled the Gallican Church at Estampes in 1160, to know whom he ought to acknowledge, and, upon the Judgment of the Bishops, the King adhered to Alexander.

ESTAMPES (ANNE DE PISSELEU DUCHESS D') Mistress of Francis I. That Prince fell in Love with her soon after he was released from his Confinement. She was then Maid of Honour to the Queen Regent (a), and was called Mademoiselle de Heilli [A]. She followed that Princess, who went to meet the King her Son upon the Frontiers of Spain [B]. The King diverted himself with her as much as he pleased, and tho' no body doubted of it, yet he found out a Husband for her, whom he created Duke of Estampes [C]. This Marriage did not prevent her from keeping her former Post with the King. She rose to the highest Degree of Favour [D], which continued during the King's

(a) Louïse of Savoy, Mother of Francis I.

(1) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mémoires de Caillon, Tom. I, pag. 863.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Varillas, Hist. de François I, Liv. VI, p. m. 101, at the year 1525.

(4) Brantôme, Dames Galantes, Tom. II, p. 394.

[A] She . . . was called Mademoiselle de Heilli. She was the Daughter of WILLIAM DE PISSELEU, Lord of Heilli, and of Anne Sanguin, his second Wife (1). He was married three times, and had thirty Children. He was the Son of JOHN DE PISSELEU, Lord of Heilli, who had the Honour to be one of the Knights at the Coronation of Lewis XI, and who was considerable enough to marry Joanna de Dreux, a Princess of the Royal Blood, after the Death of Mary de Hargicourt, his first Wife, the Mother of William, Father of the Dukes of Estampes (2).

[B] She had followed the Queen-Regent . . . to the Frontiers of Spain. According to Mr Varillas (3), the Regent excited this new Passion in the King, without intending it, by carrying as far as the Mount Marfan the young Anne de Pisseleu, who was called Madam Heilli, to meet him, and who was just come into the Family of that Princess in quality of a Maid of Honour. All the Historians agree, that the Regent went as far as Bayonne, and Mr Varillas had affirmed the same ten Pages before. Why then does he shorten the Journey here? Does he mean, that she left her Maids of Honour at Mount Marfan, and pursued her Journey to Bayonne without this Part of her Train? But is not this giving out Paradoxes at Pleasure? The Author of the Galantries of the Kings of France having only copied Varillas, with respect to Francis I, ask me not if he stops at Mount Marfan. I cannot persuade myself but that Brantôme is mistaken when he pretends, that Madam, the Regent, presented Madam Heilli to King Francis upon his Return from Spain to Bourdeaux (4).

[C] The King found out a Husband for her. She married John de Brosse, the Son of René de Brosse, and Joanna, the Daughter of Philip de Comines. This René had followed the Duke of Bourbon, and was killed at the Battle of Pavia, the Twenty fourth of February, 1525. By an Arrêt of the Parliament of Paris, made the thirteenth Day of April, 1522, he had been condemned to lose his Head, and afterwards to be hanged, and his Estate to be confiscated. He was descended from John de Brosse and Nicole de Chatillon, surnamed of Bretagne, Countess of Pentheur, a very rich Heiress, which John de Brosse was the only Son of John de Brosse, Marshal of France, who descended from Father to Son from the ancient Viscounts of Limoges. John de Brosse, the Son of René, imploring in vain the Benefit of the Treaty of Madrid, to enter again upon the Possession of the Estate his Father had lost by his Rebellion, and finding no other Method of obtaining it, but that of becoming a Cuckold, he resolved to marry Madam de Heilli. The King, in Consideration of this Marriage, restored his Estate to him, and added the Duchy of Estampes to it (5), and also made him Knight of the Order, and Governor of Bretagne. The new Duke of Estampes was not the happier for all this; for besides that all his Wealth and Grandeur were derived to him from a poisoned Spring, in which he durst not behold himself for fear of seeing a Monster in his own Person, he enjoyed them with so little Pleasure, that, as he only served for a Cover to his Wife, he not only possessed them no otherwise than in Name, but also paid very dear for them (6). Having no Children, his Estate went to Sebastian of Luxembourg, Viscount de Martigues, his Sister Charlotte's Son, and Father of an only Daughter, who was the Wife of Emanuel of Lorraine, Duke of Mercœur (7).

[D] She rose to the highest Degree of Favour. Which she made use of to enrich her Family. By her Recommendation Anthony Sanguin, her Uncle, became Abbot of Fleury, Bishop of Orleans, Cardinal, and at last Archbishop of Toulouse. She gave to Charles, her second Brother, the Abbey of Bourgueil, and Bishopric of Condom. Francis, her third Brother, was Abbot of St Cornille of Compiègne, and Bishop of Amiens; and the fourth, named William, was provided with the Bishopric of Pamiers. Two of her Sisters were Abbesses, one of Maubuisson, and the other of St Paul in Beauvoisis: she married the others into the Families of Barbançon, Canni, and of Chabot Jarnac, and the last and best beloved had no Children by Francis de Bretagne, Count de Vertus and Guello, Baron of Aumont. From Adrian de Pisseleu, Lord of Heilli, her

(5) Take from Mr le Laboureur ubi supra.

(6) Ibid. p. 364.

(7) Ibidem.

King's life: Her furious Jealousy against the Dauphin's Mistress (b), put her upon a notorious Act of Treachery [E], in which the Cardinal of Lorraine screened her from the Punishment

(b) It was Diana de Poitiers, Widow of the Great Seneschal of Normandy.

(8) Ibidem.

eldest Brother, are descended the other Lords of Heillit, down to the present time (8). There are some Historians who pretend, that this Duches, the Constable of Mommorenci, and the Admiral Chabot, had the best share in the Management of Affairs (9); and that Charles V, fearing to be stopped at the Court of Francis I, found no better Expedient than to gain this Woman, who absolutely governed the King (10). He gained her by the Present of a rich Ring, which he let fall on purpose that the Duches might take it up, and that he might tell her, in a gallant manner, that he would not take what had fallen into so good Hands (11). Mezerai rejects this as a meer Story (12); but he confesses (13), that the King could refuse nothing to that Lady, and that she had Credit enough, to contribute very much to restore the Admiral Chabot to favour, who had been degraded, and declared unworthy of his Offices by a solemn Arrêt:

(9) Varillas, ubi supra, lib. ix, pag. m. 370.

(10) Idem, pag. 389.

(11) Idem, pag. 390, 391.

(12) Mezerai, Hist. de France, in folio, Tom. II, pag. 1007.

(13) Idem, pag. 1000, at the year 1540.

(14) Idem, pag. 1014, at the year 1543.

(15) Varillas, Hist. de France, in folio, Liv. IX, pag. 397.

(16) Idem, pag. 413.

2. To ruin the Chancellor Poyet. His Misfortune, as it is reported, says he (14), speaking of this Chancellor, came out of the Lady's Anti-Chamber. The Duches had obtained Letters Royal for la Renaudie, who was at Law with du Tillet, and who carried them to the Seal, with a Recommendation from that Lady. The Chancellor, who supported du Tillet, refused to seal, unless some Alterations were made in it of some things which were not to his Mind. The Lady, being informed of this, was provoked at the Contempt to the last Degree, and cruelly revenged it; for she persuaded the King to commit the Chancellor to Prison, and afterwards a thundering Arrêt of Parliament was issued out against him. Some Historians say (15), that she had a great Share in the Disgrace of the Constable; but they also say, that the Queen of Navarre joined with that Duches to ruin the Chancellor. La Renaudie's Letters Royal were shewed to the King, with the Alterations that Poyet had made in them, and they represented to that Prince, that this struck at his Authority (16). He was contented to tell la Renaudie to carry back his Letters to the Chancellor, and to command him positively, in his Majesty's Name, to dispatch them without any Alteration. La Renaudie returned to the Chancellor, and delivered his Message in an arrogant Style, in the Presence of the Queen of Navarre, who was then soliciting him for one of her Domestics, convicted of having carried off a very rich Heiress. The Chancellor . . . took la Renaudie's Letters, and shewing them to the Queen of Navarre, added, This is the good Ladies do at Court; they are not satisfied with exercising their Empire there, but proceed to violate the Laws, and dictate to the most consummate Magistrates in the Exercise of their Office. Though the Chancellor intended what he said only against the Duches, yet, unhappily for him, the Queen of Navarre took it also to herself, because the Terms were equivocal, and might extend as well to the Solicitation she had been making to the Chancellor for the Rape her Servant had committed, as to the Violence they did him, in forcing him to seal la Renaudie's Letters. . . . No sooner was she out of the Chancellor's House, than she went directly to the Duches, to inform her of that Magistrate's Resentment; nor did she leave her till they had concerted the means to discredit him with the King. It must be confessed, it is a great Unhappiness that the Fate of People, their Favour, their Disgrace, should depend upon the Fancy of a Coquet, who scandalizes a whole Kingdom by the criminal Conversation she openly maintains with the Prince: but if any body should pretend to be surprized and astonished at it, and should cry out, ô tempora, ô mores, he would justly pass for a Stranger to the World. For he would admire, as an extraordinary thing, what was always very common, and is so still (17), and, according to all appearances, will be so to the end of the World. What comforts the discontented Mind is, that these Coquet Powers are very much exposed to the Wheel of Fortune (18).

(17) Casus multis hic cognitus. Et è medio fortune ductus acervo. Juvenal. Sat. XIII, ver. 9.

(18) See Remark [1] of the Article ESOP, the first.

VOL. II.

she could not hope that her Husband would take her again, or because the Dauphin's Mistress would have the whole Power; the Duches, I say, in this Situation, held Intelligence with Charles V. She was not ignorant of the hatred there was between the two Brothers, the Dauphin and the Duke of Orleans: this furnished her with Overtures for her Negotiations: she inclined the Emperor to favour the Faction of the Duke of Orleans; and as soon as she knew his Imperial Majesty was disposed to give that young Prince the Investiture of the Milanese, or Low-Countries, she entered into so strict a Correspondence with the Emperor, that there was no Secret passed, either at Court, or in the Council, which he was not punctually informed of: and indeed the first Letter he received, by the Count's means (19), did him so signal a Service, that it saved his Person and his whole Army (20). He was then in Champagne with a very powerful Army; but he wanted Provisions, so that the Soldiers were upon the Point of deserting, when the Count writ him a Note, the Substance of which was, that the Dauphin had large Stores of all sorts of Provisions, for the Substantion of his Army, in Epernay: that the Town was weak of itself; but the French imagined the Emperor would not attempt to surprize it, the River Marne being between it and him: that there had been an Order given to break down the only Bridge by which they could pass; but that the Duches had so artfully eluded the Execution of it, that the Bridge was still in a Condition to be serviceable: from whence the Count concluded, that his Imperial Majesty had nothing to do but to make haste, in order to have wherewithal to refresh his own Army, and to throw the French Army into the same Straits from whence he had been delivered. The Emperor made use of this Information, and appeared before Epernay, when it was least expected, the terrified Inhabitants of which opened the Gates to him. He was still in the Transports of this Conquest, which restored his Affairs, when he received a second Note from the Count, telling him that there was in Chateau Thierry another Magazine of Meal and Corn, no less considerable than that of Epernay. That there were then no Troops appointed to guard it; and that if the Dauphin lost it, it would be impossible for him to follow his Imperial Majesty's Army so close as to prevent its principal Progress. The Emperor, allured by the prodigious Benefit he received from the first Advice, turned towards Chateau-Thierry, which he forced with very little Loss, the Inhabitants, who had received no supply of Troops, not being able to withstand the Assault. The abundance of all things which was found therein, even beyond the Hopes of the Imperialists, &c. (21). The Court of France, reduced to strange Extremities, did all that could be done in such a Conjunction: but the Secret, which should have been the Soul of this great Affair, was not kept, and France would infallibly have changed its Master, if something superior to humane Reason had not prevented the approaching Revolution it was threatened with. The Dauphin acted entirely in concert with the King, his Father, and the King took no Measures which the Duches did not immediately give the Emperor notice of by the Count de Bussy (22). The Conformation was so great in Paris, that the richest Citizens fled with their most valuable Effects, some towards Orleans, and others to the side of Rean (23). One Woman was the cause of all this Disorder (24). Dux famina fassi. A Woman would at that time have overthrown the Monarchy, if Charles the Fifth's Head had not turned giddy, or if secret Jealousies had not arose between him and Henry VIII, King of England (25), with whom he had before-hand divided the whole Kingdom. Francis I came off at an easy rate, and found himself at Peace in the Month of September the same Year (26).

As Mr Varillas always took a Pleasure in telling things that are uncommon and wonderful, I should not much depend upon his Account, if I did not find the Substance of the same in Mezerai. The French Army, says he (27), had Plenty of Provisions, while

(19) It was the Count de Bussy, who managed the Duches's affairs, and negotiated for her with Charles V. He was of the House of Longueval.

(20) Varillas, Hist. de France, in folio, Liv. XI, pag. 101, at the year 1544.

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) Ibid. pag. 103.

(23) Ibid. pag. 104.

(24) The Description Mezerai has made, Tom. II, in folio, pag. 1031, of the consternation of the Parisians, is dismal. The run aways were plundered upon the road, and the women ravished.

(25) He was at the same time upon the coast of Picardy, taking towns.

(26) The Treaty of Crepi was concluded the 18th of Sept. 1544.

(27) Vol. II, in the folio, pag. 1031.

(c) See Remarks
[C], [F], and [A].

Punishment it deserved [F], and which would have brought France under the Power of Foreigners, if Charles V had known how to improve the Opportunity. As she had used her Husband very ill (c), she had no resource after the Death of Francis I, and saw herself reduced to spend the rest of her Life in a Country-Seat [G]. It is said she lived there in the Reformed Religion [H]. The Duke of Estampes had caused Informa-

tations

(28) Mezerai speaks more positively in the Life of Henry II. Nicholas Bossu-Longueval, says he, pag. 1058, Vol. II, who was of the Lady Estampes's Caval, accused not without Reason of having advised the Imperialists to take Epinal and Chateau-Thierry, redeemed his life by his fine house at Marchez near Laon, which he gave to the Abp of Rheims by a pretended sale. See the following Remark.

(29) Varillas, Hist. de Hen. II, Livr. I, pag. 67, at the year 1547.

(30) He proposed this by Nicolas de Peloué his Sister's son, one of the Cardinal's Domestic.

(31) Varillas, ubi supra, Livr. I, pag. 68.

(32) Mezerai, Tom. II, in folio, pag. 1058.

(33) That is, Diana of Poitiers, Mistress to Henry II.

the Imperialists were in such want of every thing, that, in a few Days, they must have perished, if the Treason of a Woman had not restored them to Strength and Vigour. There were at that time two Parties at Court, that of the Lady d'Estampes, the King's Mistress, and that of Diana de Poitiers, the Dauphin's Mistress. The former of these Ladies, stimulated with a furious Jealousy against the other, adhered to the Interests of the Duke of Orleans, that she might have a Support in that Prince, if the King should die and informed the Emperor of all that passed in the Council, trusting to the fine Promises he made her, that in case a Peace could be concluded, he would make the Duke of Orleans one of the most powerful Princes in Europe. And it is said (28), that when he was in such pressing Necessities, that he could no otherwise have saved his Life and Army, than by surrendering it into the Hands of his Enemies, she gave him Advice that there was a great Quantity of Provisions at Epernay, one of the Magazines of our Camp, and that the Dauphin having commanded a Captain of Foot to break down the Bridge, and throw into the River all the Provisions they could not carry off in three Days, she retarded the Execution of this Order by the Contrivance of Longueval, who was her Confidant, and intimate Friend. So that the Enemy, finding store of Provisions and Plunder in this Town, and still a greater in Chateau-Thierry, which they surprized by Advice from the same Lady, refreshed themselves to the full, &c.

[F] In which the Cardinal of Lorraine screened her from the Punishment she deserved.] I shall make use of Varillas's Words to explain this whole Mystery of Iniquity. Here is what he says in relating the State of Affairs, the first Year of the Reign of Henry II. 'The Count de Bossu was the principal Cause of the Progresses the Emperor made in Champaign before the Treaty of Crespi, and it was imagined that the sole Protection of the Duchefs of Estampes was capable of exempting him from Punishment. After the Favour of that Lady expired with the King, they thought of bringing Bossu to Justice; and it was believed, that his Prosecution would serve to maintain the Reputation of France, by letting Foreigners know, that if the Emperor had advanced so near the Capital City, it was only by means of an infamous Treason, the Punishment of which had been deferred, but not omitted. Bossu was not wanting to himself in such a dangerous Juncture, and knowing himself guilty, fought for Protection from the Cardinal of Lorraine alone (29). He let him know, that he would give him his Castle of Marchez, provided his Person and other Effects in France were secured to him (30). This Proposal was accepted: the Cardinal solicited Bossu's Pardon. 'The Expedient, which was of most service to him, was to shew the King, that the Count de Bossu's Crime was common to him with the Duchefs of Estampes; and that consequently he could not be legally prosecuted, without involving the Duchefs in the same, and blemishing the beginning of his Reign with a remarkable and unnecessary Affront to the Memory of his Father, by leaving to the Vengeance of public Justice the Object he had so tenderly loved for near Twenty two Years. The King yielded to this Reason, though it was not an unanswerable one, and Bossu got happily off (31).

[G] She found herself reduced to spend the rest of her Days in a Country-seat.] Here is what Mezerai says of it, speaking of the Alterations at Court after the Death of Francis I. 'As for the Lady d'Estampes, she retired to one of her Houses, despised by all, and by her Husband himself, who was Jobn de Brosse, where she lived yet some Years in the secret Exercise of the Reformed Religion, corrupting abundance of other Persons by her Example (32). Mr Varillas reasons at large upon the Motives which induced the Seneschal's Lady (33) not to carry her Revenge to the utmost Extremity, and he concludes with these Words (34): 'Be that as it will, she was contented to shew an Indifference for every thing that concerned the Duchefs, and left her peaceably to enjoy what she had got in the preceding Reign, although there was enough in her Conduct to have exposed her to the Rigour of the Laws. It was easy to see, that the Duchefs of Estampes was happier in this Point than any body, or even herself could have thought, since every Courtier concluded she would be ruined. She retired to one of the Country Houses she had purchased; where she bore the Absence and Hatred of the Duke of Estampes, her Husband, with the less Trouble, as she never had much Value for him. Private Memoirs do not discover the Cause of this; but if it is allowed to conjecture from the Verbal Process of that Duke against her, which is found among the Manuscripts of Lomenie, one would think that either he had but little Sense, or was very insensible (35), since he contributed to his own Infamy, by defaming his Wife with as much Care, as Persons of his Quality, if they are prudent, take to establish or increase their Reputation.'

[H] It is said she lived there in the Reformed Religion.] We have already seen what Mezerai says upon this Particular: he is not so copious as Varillas, who seeks for the Motives of it, and relates several Circumstances. 'The Judgments of God, says he (36), are terrible against habitual Sins, and particularly against those which are contrary to Purity. The Duchefs of Estampes had lived One and twenty Years in a public Disorder, and Calvinism appeared to her the properest of all the Sects to stifle the Remorse of her Conscience, because on the one hand it took away the Necessity of Confession; and on the other hand it declared, that all Men were equally Enemies to God, and were only distinguished one from another by an imputative Justice. Nothing was more commodious to encourage the Duchefs of Estampes in her Crimes than these two Maxims; and she became so thoroughly convinced of the Truth of them, that she not only turned Calvinist, but she protected also, as much as she could, without too much discovering herself, those that had been seized for the new Heresy, and would have been irretrievably condemned to the Stake. For this she had need of all her Charms, and all her Art; for though the Love Francis I had for her the first time he saw her at Mount Marfan, where she accompanied the Duchefs of Angoulême, his Mother, in Quality of Maid of Honour, was not diminished: nevertheless, in all Probability, if he had known that she had been a Calvinist, he would have spared her as little as he did his Valet de Chambre Mitron, whom he reprov'd in such a manner for the same Fault, that he ran mad, and, upon going out of the Louvre, threw himself headlong in the first Well he could light upon. But after the Death of Francis I, the Duchefs of Estampes did not think herself obliged to observe such a profound Dissimulation as she had done before. She lived like a Calvinist at her House in the Country; and the only Precaution she took was not to keep a Minister. She went no more to Mass but upon solemn Days, and was not content with perverting those of her Domestic, who had the weakness to change their Religion to please her, and with turning away the rest; but farther, she spent only so much of the great Estate she had got while she was in favour, as was absolutely necessary for the Subsistence of her Family, putting the remainder in a place which was then called la Boite à Perrete, that is to say, into the Hands of those who distributed it among poor Calvinists, or who employed it in corrupting poor Mechanics, or country People, who made no scruple to renounce the ancient Religion; because, when they gave them Money, they assured them they should want nothing for the future, provided they embraced the new Religion, and persevered in it.'

(34) Varillas, ubi supra, p. 34, at the year 1547.

(35) These words shall be examined in the Remark [K].

(36) Hist. de Henri II, livr. 4, p. 34.

I shall

mations to be made against her [I], in which a wonderful thing happened, viz. Henry II underwent the Interrogatories in Favour of that unhappy Husband. Mr Varillas was ignorant REFLEXIONS upon this Account of Varillas concerning the Calvinism of the Dukes of Estampes.

(37) Hist. du Calvinisme, liv. i, pag. m. 22.

(38) It is very probable the Count du Bussy lay with her. Weigh well Mazarin's Expressions above, Citat. (27). See also Remark [I], and consult Branche's Vie de Henri II, pag. 6.

(39) Hebr. xi, 31.

(40) Tom. I, liv. i, p. 8, 9.

(41) Varillas, Hist. de Hen. II, liv. i, pag. 56.

I shall make two Reflexions upon this Account. The first is my wonder at the Silence of Theodore Beza. If it is true, that the Dukes of Estampes was so extremely charitable towards those of the Reformed Religion, and contributed so largely to increase the number of the Protestants, certainly he must have known it. How comes it to pass then, that his History of the Churches, wherein there are abundance of things of less Importance, should have nothing concerning that Lady? I grant, that for political Reasons he may have affected not to join her with the Queen of Navarre, as Maimbourg has done (37), in persuading Francis I to hear the Protestant Preachers. I grant, he might think it would reflect Dishonour upon the Reformation, if it was confessed, that That Lady, actually immersed in a public Adultery, favoured the new Religion; but I ask, why should he observe the same Conduct with respect to the good Offices she did the Cause during her Retirement? Was it a Scandal to the Reformation, that such a Woman should make Profession of it? A Woman I say, who had criminally lost her Virginity; who afterwards had been false to her Husband, to her Galant (38), to her King, to her Country; who had abused his Favour to commit a thousand Acts of Injustice; to whom, in short, all France might impute the Misfortune of so many Families ruined, and so many Women ravished, the Shame of an injurious Treaty of Peace, and the loss of a very favourable Opportunity to destroy the Army of Charles V, and gloriously to revenge all the Affronts they had received of that mortal Enemy of the French Name? But, besides that Theodore Beza might be ignorant of the detestable Intrigues of that Duchess with Charles V, and the black and vile Ingratitude she was guilty of to a King, who loved her so tenderly, would we have this Minister more nice than the Scriptures? Did the Evangelists make any difficulty of publishing, that Mary Magdalen followed JESUS CHRIST? Did not the Apostles place Rabab, the Harlot (39), among the Cloud of the most Illustrious Witnesses that the Old Testament can furnish us with, for the support of our Faith? What harm could it do the Reformed Churches, that their Historian should confess, that a Mistress of the Great King Francis I, convinced of the Vanities of the Court, should renounce the Papal Superstitions, and give Glory to Truth, in order to expiate her past Guilt? I conclude then, that Theodore Beza, and such as he, having made no mention of a Fact they could not be ignorant of, and which they had no good Reason to suppress, we ought to suspend our Belief of it, till good Proof is brought for it. I know, that the modern Author of the History of the Edict of Nantz assures us (40), that this Duchess openly favoured the Lutherans, and that after the King's Death she lived very much retired, in all the Exercises of the Protestant Religion, protesting with all her Power those that made Profession of it; but as I am persuaded he says this only upon Mezerai's Word, I do not alter my Opinion.

My second Reflexion is concerning the Controversies, with which Mr Varillas has intermeddled in such a manner, as to provoke some choleric Divines to give him a thousand hard Names. I do not believe, that any Sect of Christians have Doctrines which can fit a Woman sunk into a habit of Adultery in the sight of the World; but of all the Western Communions none should have been less to the Taste of Francis the First's Mistress, than what they call Calvinism; for that proclaims open War, not only with Adultery and Gallantry, but also with the Vanities of the Court, Gaming, Dancing, and loose Discourse. Judge if such a Gospel as this could be a great Temptation to our Dukes of Estampes. The Historian's two Reasons are very bad ones; for Confession is not the only means to awaken the Conscience, nor is it a very forcible means to awaken it. Diana of Poitiers was no better than the Dukes of Estampes, though Varillas informs us (41), that she had a prodigious Aversion for the Anti-Catholics. Nay more: That Author confesses, that, during the Life of Francis I, that Duchess durst not declare her Sentiments. She was forced then to submit to the Austerities of the Roman Discipline, Fasts, Confession, &c. What would she have got by following internally the System of Calvin? If she found any thing commodious in it, she was not allowed to take the Benefit of it: so that the whole Charm of it was taken away, and the Allurement lost its Force. Add to this, that she could not inwardly adhere to Calvinism, without believing, that, by assisting at Mass, she committed the greatest of all Crimes, and consequently nothing was more likely to torment her Conscience, than to follow the Faith of the Reformers in a Court where she was obliged to profess regularly the Catholic Religion. For as to the Doctrine of Imputative Justice, Mr Varillas judges of it, as a blind Man does of Colours, since all the Protestants acknowledge, that That Justice is of no Service without Repentance: therefore it is not true, that it is the only thing which distinguishes the good Men from the bad.

Since the first Edition of this Dictionary, I have discovered that Florimond de Remond has said something of the pretended Lutheranism of the Dukes of Estampes. He places her in the number of those Ladies that the Lutherans had inveigled, and who gave them Access to the Queen of Navarre, Sister to Francis I. He puts into the same Catalogue the Lady Cani, and the Lady Pisseleu, Sister to this Duchess, and he affirms, that these gained some others. The Conquest of these simple Souls, adds he, and of this weak Sex, was very easy; for the Rigour of the Laws, and Rules of the Church, and particularly the Trouble of Confession, was insupportable to many among them (42). But besides that he quotes no Author, he inserts so little upon this Fact, gives so few Particulars, is so destitute of Circumstances, that I cannot change my Opinion. I fancy his Authorities were reduced to a loose Hear-say, which he had a mind to make the most of, in order to decant upon a common Topic, viz. the Stratagem of the old Serpent to deceive the first Woman. Upon which the Historian has collected I know not how many moral Reflexions and Authorities. But this is a pitiful Common-place which has this defect, that it may be retorted by every Sect. See the General Criticism of the History of Calvinism (43).

[I] The Duke of Estampes ordered Informations to be taken against her.] We shall find Mr Varillas to be mistaken again: 'She lived, says he (44), in such a Misunderstanding with the Duke, her Husband, that he caused a juridical Enquiry to be made after her Conduct since her Marriage: This could be imputed to nothing but Jealousy, which forced him to take such shameful Measures, in order to be revenged of his Wife, when she should lose the Protection of the King.' If Varillas had well read the Manuscripts which he boasts were communicated to him, he would not have reasoned as he has done upon the Motives of the Duke of Estampes. He would have known, that the Enquiries into the Duchess's Conduct were made long after the Death of Francis I, and that the Husband's Design was not to make it known, that his Spouse had not kept her conjugal Vows. He must have been the weakest of all Men, if he had thought there wanted Informations to prove him a Cuckold. All France was persuaded of it, would have sworn to it, and would have laughed at any body that should have questioned it. The Enquiry therefore was not a Matter of Jealousy, nor did it tend to a Design of Revenge after the Decease of Francis I. I have already said, that it was made after the Death of that Prince. And I add, that it tended not to discover the Damage the Duke of Estampes had suffered in his Honour, by his Wife's Conduct, but what he had suffered in his Estate, in order to collect Proofs for a Law-Suit. Mr le Laboureur will inform us of this. 'The Duke, says he (45), not only had but a bare Title to the Estate that Francis I gave him, but also paid the Interest of it out of his own. Here is a Proof of it from the very Mouth, and attested upon Oath, in Court, by King Henry II, whom he intreated to depose in his Favour in the Law-Suit he had with Odet de Bretagne, Count de Vertus, his Cousin, as Heir of Francis de Bretagne, his elder Brother, Count de Vertus; which Francis having married Charlotte de Pisseleu, Sister to the Dukes of Estampes, she obliged the Duke, her Husband, to do her what

(42) Florimond de Remond, Hist. de la naissance & progrès de l'Herésie, liv. vii, cap. iii, pag. m.

(43) At the 73th Paragraph of the XXth Letter, 3d Edit. See also the Remark [D] of the Article GREGORY I.

(44) Varillas, Hist. de Francis I, liv. xi, pag. 96.

(45) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mémoires de Castelnau, Tom. I, pag. 864.

(d) In the Article POITIERES (DIANA).

ignorant both of the Time and Motives of this Adventure [K]. I shall examine, in another Place (d), the other Chronological Faults that he and his Transcriber (e) have committed.

(e) The Author of the Galanteries des Rois de France.

Justice she thought fit upon her Pretensions, on Account of Magdalen de Brosse de Bretagne, her Grandmother. And besides the leave of inquiring further into the matter, which the King granted him the third of June, 1556, at Paris, he also did him the Favour to undergo the Interrogatory the twelfth of the said Month, at the House commonly called the Maison Maigret, in the Street St Avoise, which he gave afterwards to the Constable Montmorenci, in Presence of whom he declared, That the Duke of Eftampes had often told him, that he very much feared the Marriage of the Count de Vertus, with the Sister of the Lady d'Eftampes, was done at his Expence. . . . That there was a common Report, that Longueval managed all the Affairs of that Duke's (46), and that the Duke often complained that he made him do many things to his Disadvantage. That the Honours which the said Longueval had had are sufficiently known, and came by the Favour of the said Duke's. That the Duke often complained, that the said Lady received the Income of his Government of Bretagne, that he enjoyed nothing himself. That he was most aggrieved by the Contracts that were made for the Lady d'Avignon. That the Duke several times complained to him. . . . that he was forced to do many things, and make Contracts to the Injury of himself and Family according to the Pleasure of the said Lady, the said Longueval, and others, their Agents & wherefore, &c.

(46) See Remark [E] Citat. (19).

(47) Varillas, Hist. de François I, Liv. XI, pag. 98, at the year 1544.

[K] Varillas was ignorant of the Time and Motives of this Adventure.] This evidently appears by our preceding Remark; but here are new Proofs of it. 'In Read, says he (47), speaking of the Duke's of Eftampes, of humouring, whilst he was in Favour, the Duke, her Husband, whose Temper, little inclined to, and almost insensible of, the Pleasures of Love, would have been amused by any trifling Marks of the King's Liberality, or any empty Employments, provided he had them when he wanted them, he slighted him to that degree, till he was transported beyond all Decency, and by the strangest Caprice that ever jealousy inspired a Man with, published himself his own Dishonour by the Juridical Enquiry into his Wife's Conduct, mentioned before. This Proceeding, which rendered them irreconcilable, deprived the Duke's of all Hope of ever returning to her Husband, and reduced her to such a Degree of Misery, that the Seneschal's Lady, after the Death of the King, might have employed the same Husband as an Instrument to torment her, till her Revenge should be fully satiated.' Here we find Mr Varillas fully persuaded that [the Juridical Enquiry of the Duke of Eftampes was already made in the Year 1544, in the Life-time of Francis I; and yet it was not made till 1556. So that all his fine Reasonings, built thereon, are no more than meer Chimeras. It is a dangerous Rock for Historians, who look too much into the Motives of the Conduct of Courts, without sufficiently consulting Chronology. Farther, we see this Historian perfectly satisfied that a strange jealous Humour prompted the Duke to inform, in a Juridical Way, against his Wife; and yet those Informations proceeded only from a Desire to get the better in a considerable Law-Suit. For the rest, Mr Varillas is not the only one that pretends this Husband had the weakness to expose his own Dishonour to the Eyes of the World. The Abbot de St Real was of the same Opinion. His Words are (48): 'What

(48) Cesario, Entretien I, pag. 21, Hague Edit. 1635.

(49) Mr Le Laboureur seems to me much more credible: he says, Addit. à Costellau, Tom. I, pag. 364, that the Duke pleaded not against his Wife, but against the Count de *Ver*us his Cousin.

you said of Cæsar, who would not accuse his Wife's Galant, puts me in mind of another Husband. I have heard talked of some time ago, who was not so nice. I mean the Husband of the charming Duke's of Eftampes, first Mistress to Francis I. After the Death of that Prince, the good Man would receive a Process against her (49), which he could not pursue till then, because of the Consideration the King had, during his whole Life, for that Lady; and being to prove that Impossibility in Court, he caused an Information to be taken, in which Henry II, and the principal Persons of the Court, testified, at his Request, in the most decent Terms they could find, the great Power of that Lady over the late King, and the strict Friendship there was between her and that Prince.' Mr le Laboureur is not far from this way of judging: 'The poor Duke, says he (50), must have suffered much to have been obliged to leave to Posterity that injurious Monument of his Misfortune and Disgrace.' Mr Varillas then has some Associates, though they do not express themselves so forcibly as he has done, when he assures us (51), 'That the Duke of Eftampes must have had very little Understanding, or a very great Insensibility, since he contributed to his own Infamy, by exclaiming against his Wife with as much Care as Persons of his Quality, if they are prudent, take to establish or increase their Reputation.'

With Submission to these Gentlemen, I think they are a little in the wrong in the Sentence they pronounce against this Duke. His was not the case of those Husband who dishonour themselves by publishing their being Cuckolds. When a Man is a Cuckold by a superiour Power, and demonstrates to the World by public Steps, that he is no voluntary Cuckold, but is enraged that he cannot revenge the Insult done him, he openly preserves both his Honour and his Reputation. If the Quality of Sovereign does not blot out the Infamy with respect to a Mistress, at least it does so with respect to a Husband who boldly expresses his Indignation; and a Husband is so far from dishonouring himself by giving public Proofs of the Contempt he has conceived for his Wife, that on the contrary he would dishonour himself if he served her for a Cover, and prevented her Leudness being known, by fathering the Children she should have by the Prince. I know Courtiers call the ill humour of That Husband a Polly, who has not the Address to arrive at Pensions, Polls, and Governments of Provinces, by a ready consent that his Wife should indulge her Sovereign with the last Favours; but I know also that, on the other side, they despise the voluntary Cuckold who has this Address, and cruelly rally him upon his Horn of Plenty, and it is so true that, even according to the corrupt Judgment of the Age, a Husband does himself an Honour in not conniving at his Wife who is become Mistress to a Prince, that it would be thought an Encomium upon him to observe this Conduct of his in an Epitaph, Funeral Oration, or such like Pieces; and they would not dare to commend the contrary Behaviour of those who should have dissembled such an Affront in order to make their Fortunes. Mankind is greatly depraved, but not to such a Degree, that the Traffic, a Husband should make by his Wife, should be looked upon as an honourable Action. It is indeed a means too commonly made use of to acquire Riches; it was known to old Rome (52), and has been in Practice ever since; and yet it is not altogether void of the contempt, and shame it deserves.

Besides, it must be considered there is a difference between our Duke of Eftampes and Cæsar, or any other private Person who goes to Law in order to be declared a Cuckold. The Amours of Cæsar's Wife were not public: the Accused did not confess the Fact; the same may be said of the Causes of Adultery, which sometimes come into our Courts. But as for the Duke's of Eftampes, she did not deny being Francis the First's Mistress: the King denied it still less (53); so that their Commerce passed all over Europe for a certain and incontestable Fact. Therefore the Duke made no Additions to his Infamy by his Enquiry; and he ought not to be taken for a Man of Insensibility, or little Understanding on account of the Information: he ought not to be compared to those Husbands who publish domestic Adventures, which it is in their Power to hide behind the Curtain. A Juridical Enquiry is not a Monument so much to be feared as an History. Now the Duke of Eftampes might be firmly persuaded that a hundred good Historians would eternize his Wife's Adultery; and since the Enquiry might be of great service to him in a Law-Suit of Consequence, he is to be commended for having taken it: for in not taking it he did not hinder his disgrace, if any disgrace there was, from being as public as before.

(50) Item, pag. 805.

(51) Hist. de Henri II, Liv. I, pag. m. 34.

JUSTIFICATION of the Duke of Eftampes concerning the Inquiry against his Wife.

(52) Scintille & c. cavete regis ultro Penelope facili potiori trade. Horat. Sat. V, Lib. II, vers. 75.

(53) See the following Remarks.

I have

mitted. I can hardly believe that Francis I should ever say seriously that he did not lie with that Lady [L], and I very much question whether she desired that it should be credited.

If what a learned Man has related be true, Francis the First's Love for her did not begin at the Time above-mentioned (f), that is to say, upon that Prince's return into France (f) In the Remark [B]. from his Confinement at Madrid; for that learned Man supposes she was the King's Mistress before the Constable of Bourbon entered into the Party of Charles V; now he did this in 1523, and Francis I was not set at Liberty till 1526.

I have one thing more to say, which alone would be sufficient for his Justification. Which is, that he did not make Enquiries to prove his being a Cuckold, but to prove that his Wife had spent great part of his Estate. Could one blame a Man who, in a Law-Suit for the recovery of that Estate, makes it appear by judicial Proceedings that his Wife had unjustly taken it from him. It is observed, unless it be narrowly looked into, that no Women are more complaisant towards their Husbands, than those that sit them with a pair of Horns. See thereupon one of the Tales of Mr de la Fontaine (54). Therefore the Duke of Estampes Adversaries might have pretended that his Wife had made over to him several Gifts and Benefits, that he might patiently bear the ill Name she had given him. So that he was obliged to prove judicially that she had caused him very great losses.

Wherefore he is not to be blamed for adding to the Title of Cuckold in Chronicle, that of Cuckold upon Record; for the latter was eminently contained in the former, and not being able to aggravate his dishonour, it might save him a great damage. Blame as much as you please those, who having no reason to fear their disgrace should be inserted in the Annals of the State, carry it to be registered in the Parliament Rolls; but do not blame those who do this, when they are sure not to escape the Pen of the most sincere Historians. The Count de Buffi Rabutin received a Letter in 1668, wherein there is a Man mentioned who was in the former of these Cases. These are his Words, As to the Letter of Madam de . . . to Monsieur de . . . it has not been banded about. The Husband shewed it to the King and carried it to the Parliament, so that, not being a Cuckold in Chronicle, he shall be one upon Record (54).

[L] I can hardly believe that Francis I should ever seriously say that he did not lie with that Lady. The Author I contradict here is not of weight enough to give me any scruple upon the Liberty I take with him. These are his Words: 'King Francis then being set at Liberty, and returning out of Spain, the Regent his Mother came to meet him at Bordeaux, accompanied with several Ladies, among whom was Ann de Pisseleu who was afterwards Countess of Pontievre, and then Duchess of Estampes on her Husband's Account. A Lady who was afterwards always in the King's Favour, for he did for her what he had denied to others, and tho' dishonest Suspitions were raised of that Intimacy, yet the King cleared himself, protesting that he only loved that Lady for her gracefulness and good humour. However it is thought he lay with her, since he was inclined to the love of Women, which was the only

Vice that Prince was affected with (56). It is not probable that Prince should ever think of protesting in earnest that nothing dishonest had ever passed between him, and the Duchess of Estampes. He had too much Sense, and too great Knowledge of the World, not to know that no Body would credit such Protections, when his Inclination to the fair Sex was so public; and besides, as Matters then stood, he would have feared to make himself contemptible to his whole Court if he had passed for a young Prince, who had had a fine young Lady so long without asking or receiving any Favours from her. The Protection they impute to him, would be more probable, if he had begun to favour the Duchess when they had both been of mature Age; but he appeared to be in Love with her as soon as he was released out of Prison, when he was but Thirty two Years old, and Mademoiselle de Heilly was a young Maid full of Charms. What likelihood is there, that he did not press her to come to a Conclusion, and did not soon obtain his Point? If the fair one had been of an invincible Virtue, no doubt he would have directed his Sighs to another Object before the end of the Year. But I know no Author, who is so simple as to commend our Ann de Pisseleu for her Chastity. The Credulity of the Author I confuse stopped in the middle of it's Course; for if he was persuaded that Francis I protested his Innocence, he did not suppose that Protection was to be believed. If it deserved Credit, and if besides the Duchess had been of the Protestant Party, they would have had in their Communion the greatest instance of Chastity that had ever appeared upon the Earth. In that case this Duchess would have excelled, with respect to this Virtue, not only the Virgins in the Martyrology, but also the Heroines of Romance. Let not this Parallel be wondered at; for I am not the first who has said (57) that the Examples of Virtue, which were feigned in our great Romances formerly (58), went beyond the Practice of the most Holy Women. For the Heroines in the Romance preserve themselves pure and free from all Spot in a Court-Life, beset by a most accomplished Lover they are in love with, stole away from time to time, and always surrounded with the most dangerous Temptations. The Chastity of Nuns, and martyred Virgins, has not the same Difficulties to overcome, and therefore is less wonderful than that of the Ladies in Clelia would have been. But as these at the end of two or three Years, more or less, found the end of all their Troubles in a happy Marriage, their incorruptible Virtue is not equal to that, which must be ascribed to the Duchess of Estampes, if the King never enjoyed her.

(56) Du Verdier Vau Privas, Profopogr. Tom. III, pag. 2347.

(57) See the Abbat de Villiers, in his Reflexions sur les Defauts d'Aurui.

(58) Callandra, Cleopatra, Cyrus, Clelia, &c.

EUCLID, a Native of Megara, and Disciple of Socrates [A], did not follow the Taste of his Master; for instead of addicting himself chiefly to the Doctrine of Morality, he set himself to refine the Subtilties of Logic. He founded a Sect, which passes for

(1) Cicero, Acad. Quest. lib. iv, cap. xlii.

(2) Strabo, lib. ix, circa init. pag. m. 271.

(3) Diog. Laërt. lib. ii, in Socrate, m. 47.

[A] He was a Disciple of Socrates. Cicero (1), Strabo (2), and Diogenes Laërtius (3) testify this; but none of them relate one curious Circumstance which we find in Aulus Gellius; viz. that Euclid not daring to go to Athens, because the Athenians had made it Death for the Megarians to come thither, went by Night disguised like a Woman, and, after having received Socrates's Instructions, returned the next morning to Megara under the same disguise. Note, he had been that Philosopher's Disciple before that severe Decree of the Athenians was made. 'Decreto suo Athenienses caverant, ut qui Megaris civis esset, si intulisset Athenas pedem prehenus esset, ut ea res ei homini capitalis esset. . . . Tum Euclides, qui indidem Megaris erat, quique ante id decretum & esse Athenis & audire Socratem consueverat, postquam id decretum sanxerat VOL. II.

runt, sub noctem, quum advesperasceret, tunica longa muliebri indutus & pallio varicolori amictus, & caput rica velatus è domo sua Megaris Athenas ad Socratem commeabat; ut vel noctis aliquo tempore consiliorum sermonumque ejus fieret particeps: rursumque sub lucem millia passuum paulo amplius viginti, eadem veste illa testus redibat (4). Aulus Gellius relates in this place, what he had heard from a celebrated Platonic Philosopher named Taurus, who was making a Comparison between what was practised towards Socrates, and what the Philosophers did then: we see now-a-days, said he, Philosophers going to teach in rich Houses, and waiting till Noon when their Pupils have dissipated the fumes of Wine. At nunc, inquit, videre est Philosophos ultro currere, ut doceant, ad fores juvenum divitum; eosque ibi sedere

(4) Aul. Gellius, lib. vi, cap. x.

for a branch, or rather a continuation, of the School of Xenophanes, Parmenides, and Zeno Eleates (a). Those, who followed his Method of philosophizing, were named Megarians, Megarici, and afterwards Disputers, and at last Dialecticians (b). His Opinions are little known, and it is pretty difficult to comprehend any thing in his Doctrine of the Nature of Good [B]. He made use of nothing but Conclusions in his Disputes [C], by which we may judge of the ardor and impetuosity he mixed with them. We may also judge of it by the Character of the Temper he inspired his Disciples with. Which was a rage or fury of disputing (c). Eubulides, who succeeded him, was the Inventor of divers Sophisms exceedingly captious and perplexing [D]. Alexinus, who succeeded Eubulides

(a) Cicero, Acad. Quest. lib. iv, cap. xlii.

(b) Diog. Laërt. lib. ii, n. 106.

(c) See the Remark [D].

(5) Idem. ibid.

(6) The third of the first Act.

(7) Diog. Laërt. lib. ii, n. 106.

(8) Id. ibid.

(9) Cicero, Acad. Quest. lib. iv, cap. xlii.

(10) Diog. Laërt. lib. ii, n. 107.

(11) Cicero, in Quæst. Acad. lib. iv, cap. viii.

(12) Id. de Divinat. lib. ii, cap. liii.

(13) Gassend. de Logic. cap. iiii, pag. 40, Tom. I, Opera.

federe atque opperiri prope ad meridiem, donec discipuli nocturnum omne vinum edormiant (5). This will put some Readers in mind of the Comedy of le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, in which one of the most agreeable Scenes (6) is composed of a Master in Philosophy, a Music Master, a Dancing Master, a Fencing Master, &c. I know not whether Aristophanes and Lucian ever rallied the Philosophers more cruelly than Moliere has done in that place. He represents them as going from House to House like Dancing Masters, and Fencing Masters; and then he supposes they quarrel with other Masters, and are soundly beaten by them. Note, the Civil-Law has been as much debased as Philosophy. Most of the young Men had a Prompter come to them for the Institutes, and did not take the trouble of going to the public Lectures. Mr le Tellier, who died Chancellor of France, made Regulations against this abuse.

[B] It is very difficult to comprehend any thing in his Doctrine of the Nature of Good. He made it one under different Names: they call it, added he, sometimes Prudence, sometimes God, sometimes Understanding, and so of the rest (7). He rejected all things contrary to good, and even taught that they had no Existence (8). Thus his Doctrine is represented by Diogenes Laërtius; but Cicero says of it, 'Euclides Socratis discipulus Megareus, à quo iidem illi Megarici dicti, qui id bonum solum esse dicebant quod esset unum & simile, & idem & semper (9). — Euclides the Disciple of Socrates was of Megara: from him those were called Megarians, who maintained that to be the only good, which was one, similar, eternal, and unchangeable.' Either Cicero or Diogenes Laërtius have ill described this Doctrine of Euclid; for if there is but one good, and if the good is always like itself, and always one, as Cicero supposes, how could it be said that Prudence, God, and Understanding, were the good? do not the Prudence and Understanding of Men differ from God? are they like God? do they make one simple and individual Essence with God? I verily believe neither of these Authors did well comprehend the Doctrine of the Megarians; and that they themselves did not understand it, or not explain it aright. We may discern in it some Rays of what our Divines teach of the Nature of sovereign Good. Our Euclid also seems to have had some small Idea of what they teach concerning the Nature of Evil. They say that Evil is nothing, and that it consists in pure Privation. Whom could the Megarians hope to persuade that Diseases, Troubles, Vices, and every thing contrary to good, are chimeras, which have no Existence? their System in this respect was a Chaos.

[C] He used only Conclusions in his Disputes. These are the words of Diogenes Laërtius (10): Ταῖς τε ἀποδείξεσιν ἐνίστατο, ἢ κατὰ λήμματα, ἀλλὰ κατ' ἐπιπόρον. Ὑεβatur probationibus non his quæ per assumptiones, sed quæ per conclusiones sunt. This Latin Translation is better than that of Aldobrandinus which I shall copy: Argumentorum conclusiones non sumptionibus, sed conclusionibus resellendis oppugnabat. To speak more freely: Aldobrandinus's Version is good for nothing; in vain he cites Cicero, who has observed, that the word ἀπόδειξις signifies argumenti conclusio (11), and that the word λήμματα signifies sumptio (12): he shall never persuade me there is Sense in these words, to combat the Conclusions of Arguments, not by refuting the Propositions, but by refuting the Conclusions. Gassendus in my Opinion has very well explained the Thought of Diogenes Laërtius. 'Duo fere solum, says he (13), novimus ex Laërtio, Unum quod soleret Euclides cæterorum demonstrationes non sumptionibus impugnare, sed conclusionibus dumtaxat, nimirum quasi confectiones forent satis perspicuæ, illationes congrebat, Ergo, Ergo, Ergo; quæ arguendi ratio, quasi respirare non sinens, est omnium urgentissima, quare & cum hoc modo foret instans, premens, ac vehemens, notatus fuit à Timone quasi quandam litigii, seu contentionis rabiem λίσσαν εἰσενεῖν, Megaricis inspiravisset. Alterum quod, &c. — There are two things, says he, our Knowledge of which is almost entirely owing to Laërtius; the one, that Euclid used to oppose the Propositions of others, not by Assumptions, but by Conclusions only, and, as if the Consequences were sufficiently evident, he crowded Inference upon Inference. Therefore, Therefore, Therefore; which Method of argumentation, not suffering as it were a Man to take Breath, is of all others the most irresistible. He was reprimanded by Timon for his warmth, vehemence, and overbearing, as having thereby inspired the Megarians with a litigious madness. The other, &c. Without doubt nothing is more capable of embarrassing and confounding those who maintain a Thesis, than the vehemence with which a Disputant heaps Conclusions upon one another, Ergo, Ergo, Ergo. This was Euclid's Custom.

[D] Eubulides was the inventor of divers Sophisms exceedingly captious and perplexing. These are the Names of them: the Liar, the Deceiver, the Eleuthera, the Veiled, the Sorites, the Horned, the Bald (14). You will find in Gassendus (15) a good Explanation of all these Sophisms supported by instances. You will find the same in Mr Ménage (16). I shall content myself with shewing what the Liar was. He supposed a Man who said I lie, and then he argued in such a manner that from what he said true, he concluded that he lied, and from what he lied in he concluded he spoke Truth. 'Si dicis te mentiri, verum; que dicis, mentiris: dicis autem te mentiri, verum; que dicis, mentiris igitur (17).' To puzzle the more, they made one consider, that in such Reasonings as this, as to the form, the Conclusion was true; how then dare you reject the Conclusion of this, said they, while you admit that of others? Cicero observes that Chrysippus, who formed himself these Difficulties, could not resolve them. 'Qui potes hanc non probare, quum probaveris ejusdem generis superiorem? Hæc Chrysippea sunt ne ab ipso quidem dissoluta (18). They built the same Sophism upon that which Epimenides, who was of the Isle of Crete, had said, that all the Cretans were Liars. He lied then in saying so, concluded they; therefore the Cretans are not Liars, then they deserve to be believed; then the affirmation of Epimenides is to be believed; and then the Cretans are Liars. Aristotle (19) has acknowledged that these Sophistries are almost inexplicable. Africanus, the Cicerilian, having put a Case, in which the knot was insoluble, compares it to the Sophism here in question. Dixi τῶν ἀπόρων hanc questionem esse: qui tractatus apud Dialecticos τῷ ψευδομένῳ dicitur, etenim quidquid constituerimus verum esse, falsum reperietur (20). — I said this Argument was one of the Insoluble, called, by Logicians, the Liar: for whatever is laid down for true, will be found to be false.' It is good to see how Seneca laughs at those who lost their time in such vain subtilities: 'Quid me detines in eo, quem tu ipse Pseudomonon appellas, de quo tantum librorum compositum est? Ecce tota mihi vita mentitur: hanc coargue, hanc ad verum, si acutus es, redige (21). — Why do you teize me with your Pseudomonon (Liar) on which so many Fables have been composed? Come, Sir, my whole Life is a Lie; let me have a specimen of your Art in disproving this, and shewing it to be true.' Some by too intense an application to these kind of things contracted a consumptive illness that killed them, and this has been put in their Epitaph (22): Κενδυνεύεις ὃν ποτε οἶσθ' ἡσυχίαν διὰ ταύτας τὰς φροντιστάς, ἀσπερ ὁ Κείος Φιλητας ζήτων τὸν καλέματον ψευδολόγον τῶν λόγων,

(14) Diog. Laërt. lib. ii, n. 108.

(15) Gassend. de Logic. ubi supra.

(16) Ménage in Laërt. lib. ii, n. 108.

(17) Cicero, Acad. Quest. lib. iv, cap. 15, & 29.

(18) Id. ibid.

(19) Id. ibid.

(20) Id. ibid.

(21) Seneca, Epist. xli, p. 241.

(22) Athen. lib. ix, pag. 401. See also Hevelius Illustratus, in Philo.

(23) Athen. lib. ix, pag. 401. See also Hevelius Illustratus, in Philo.

(24) Athen. lib. ix, pag. 401. See also Hevelius Illustratus, in Philo.

(25) Athen. lib. ix, pag. 401. See also Hevelius Illustratus, in Philo.

(26) Athen. lib. ix, pag. 401. See also Hevelius Illustratus, in Philo.

(27) Athen. lib. ix, pag. 401. See also Hevelius Illustratus, in Philo.

(28) Athen. lib. ix, pag. 401. See also Hevelius Illustratus, in Philo.

(29) Athen. lib. ix, pag. 401. See also Hevelius Illustratus, in Philo.

(21) Ἄνθρωπος φιλο-μαχίας τῶν διδασκάλων καὶ μαθητῶν. Vir acer & contentiosus viribus ac
hervis clausus :
unde & Elenxinus cognominatus
est. Diog. Laërt.
lib. ii, num. 109.

Eubulides, was a great lover of Dispute, and engaged in it with so much vehemence, that he acquired a surname by it (d). Diodorus, another Disciple of Eubulides, was so intoxicated and insatuated with this sort of Contest, that he died with Grief, because he could not resolve upon the Spot the Dialectical Questions that Stilpo had put to him (e). If this Sect had contributed any thing to the illustration of Truth, it ought to be looked upon as a Prodigy; for nothing is more proper to confound and darken things, and to fill the Minds of Readers and Auditors with Doubts, than an Application to the Quintessence and Subtilties of Controversy [E], which degenerate almost always into wrangling,

(e) Id. ibid.

λόγων, ὁμοίως ἐκείνῳ διαλυθῆναι. ἰσχυρὸς γὰρ πάνυ τὸ σῶμα διὰ τὰς ζητήσεις γενόμενος, ἀπέθανεν ὥς τὸ πρὸ τῆς μνημείας αὐτῆς ἐπιγραμμὰ θηλοῖ.

Ἐξίνε Φιλητᾶς εἰμὶ λόγων ὁ ψευδόμενος με ὦλασε, καὶ νυκτῶν φροντίδες ἐσπείροισι.

Est itaque periculum, ne ob has curas aliquando, ut Philetas Cous, pervestigans ex rationibus, falsas, & mendaces, exolutus pereas. Nam corpore ob id studium valde attenuato is obiit: quod insculptum ejus monumento declarat hoc Epigramma:

Hosper, Philetas sum, mendax & captiosa ratio Me perdidit, vespertinaeque ac nocturnae studiorum curae.

There is danger, least, like Philetas of Co, you be brought by these laborious studies into a Consumption, and lose your Life like him, who in such researches wasted away, as his Epitaph declares:

Philetas I; destroy'd by painful Toils
In search of Subtilties and captious Wiles.

It might be said then, without Hyperbole or Figure, that the Inventions of Eubulides were murdering Sophisms. The subtilties of Stilpo his Fellow-Disciple were no less killing (23). This brings near to Truth what Timon the Phliarian objected to our Euclid: His expression rage of disputing becomes thereby less hyperbolic.

(23) See the Text of this Article, at Citat.
(c).

Ἄλλ' ἔ μοι τέττον φλεδόνων μέλει, ἔδ' ἐ γὰρ
ἀλλ' αὖ
Οὐδ' ἐνός, ἔ φαίδωνος, ὅτις γέ μιν, ἔ δ' ἐλ-δάντω
Εὐκλείδης, Μεγαρεῦσιν ὅς ἐμβαλε λύσαν ἐισμῶ.

Non ego horum nugatorum curam gero, nec alterius Cujusquam; non Phædonis, quisquis ille sit, nec litigiosi Euclidis, qui Megarensibus contentionis rabiem invexit (24).

(24) Timon,
apud Diog. Laërt.
lib. ii, n. 107,
pag. m. 142.

These Triflers, and their captious Clan, I hate,
Phædo and Euclid forward to debate;
From him his Country catch'd th' infectious Rage.

Note, the Schoolmen have tried their skill upon this Matter; you need only see what they say of the Propositions which they call seipias falsificantes (25).

(25) See Arriaga, Disput. II, in Summulas, Sect.
iv, Subject. iv,
pag. m. 21, 22.

As I have already spoke at large of the Sorites in another place (26), it is not necessary to repeat it here. I shall only say that the Sophism, called the bald, seems to me a sort of Sorites, and which consisted in asking the precise number of Hairs you must take away from a Man to make him bald. Are one or two sufficient? It must be answered, no: they continued to ask, going from three to four, and from four to five, &c; and if at last you answered such a number was enough, you will find yourself obliged to confess that the difference between bald, and not bald, consisted in one single hair. See Gassendus at Page forty one of the first Volume of his Works.

(26) See the Remark [O] of the Article CHRY-SIPPUS.

[E] Nothing is more proper to obscure Matters, and raise doubts than an application to the Quintessence of Controversy.] Among all the philosophical Exercises, there are none in which a moderation is more necessary than in that of Disputation; for no sooner are you passed certain bounds, but you fall into useless trifles, and even irregularities, which give the mind an ill turn, and hinder it from finding Truth. To this may be justly applied the following Words of Aulus Gellius (27): 'Hos alioque tales argutae delecta-' bilisque desidiae aculeos quum audiremus, vel leclita-

' remus: neque in his scrupulis aut emolumentum ali-
' quod solidum ad rationem vitae pertinens, aut finem
' ullum quaerendi videremus: Enniam Neoptole-
' mum probabamus, qui profecto ita ait:

(27) Aul. Gell.
lib. 5, cap. 15.
He says in the next Chapter.
Ejusdem illius
Enniani Neoptolemi . . . confilio utendum est,
qui deustandum
ex Philofohia cenlet non in eam ingurgitan-dum. . . . We should follow the Advice of the same Neoptolemus in Ennius, to ste of Philofophy but not intimate ourselves with it.

Philosophandum est paucis: nam omnino haud placet.

'When I heard or read these or such like subtilties, the ' produce of an easy and undisturbed Retirement, but ' found herein no Solidity, nothing that tended to the ' Improvement of Life, nor any end of such enquiries,
' I could not but approve the sentiments of Neoptolemus
' in Ennius, who says:

Philosophy has bounds which it should never pass.

A Disputation well regulated, and confined to proper limits (28), and where an Explanation of things is only intended, is the most useful thing in the World in the search after Truth; Disputation has not been ill resembled to the striking two Flints together, which fetches out the invisible sparks of Fire (29). But it is very difficult to keep a just Medium in this office:
and to this chiefly may be applied the Observation of Tacitus. 'Retinuit quod est difficillimum ex sapientia, ' or in sapientia modum (30), — And what is most ' difficult, he retained a mean in Philosophy.' If this Passion for disputing be never so little indulged, one gets a taste of false glory, which engages always to find subjects of Contradiction, and from thence forward good sense is no more hearkened to, and one is abandoned to the desire of passing for a great Master of subtilties. A Professor may be excused the pains he takes to awaken by this way the mind of a young Scholar;
but Euclid, and his successors, can never be justified for having made this the principal business of their whole Lives, and for attempting to distinguish themselves by inventions which tended only to confound the Mind. They were of no service for the correcting of Vice, or curing any important defect, and besides they did not in any manner advance the knowledge of speculative Truths; but were much more proper to retard it. These are two enormous Faults. Seneca has very well described the first. 'Invenissent forsitan
' necessaria, nisi & superflua quaesissent. Multum illis
' temporis verborum cavillatio eripuit, & captiosae dis-
' putationes, quae acumen irritum exercent. Nectimus
' nodos, & ambiguum significationem verbis alligamus,
' deinde dissolvimus. Tantum nobis vacat? jam vive-
' re, jam mori scimus? Tota illo mente pergendum
' est, ubi provideri debet, ne res nos, non verba deci-
' piant. Quid mihi vocum similitudines distinguis,
' quibus nemo unquam nisi dum disputat, captus est?
' res fallunt: illas discerne. Pro bonis mala amplecti-
' mur. . . . Adulatio quam similis est amicitiae? . . .
' Doce quemadmodum hanc similitudinem dignoscere
' possim. Venit ad me pro amico blandus inimicus:
' vitia nobis sub virtutum nomine obrepunt: temeritas
' sub titulo fortitudinis latet: moderatio vocatur igna-
' via: pro cauto timidus accipitur. In his magno pe-
' riculo erratur: his certas notas imprime. Ceterum
' qui interrogatur, an cornua habeat, non est tam stul-
' tus, ut frontem suam tentet: nec rursus tam ineptus
' aut hebes, ut non habere se nesciat, quod tu illi subti-
' lissima collectione persuaseris. Sic ista sine noxa de-
' cipiunt, quomodo praestigatorum acetabula & calculi,
' in quibus fallacia ipsa delectat. Effice, ut quomodo
' fiat intelligam: perdidit usum. Idem de istis captio-
' nibus dico: quo enim nomine potius sophismata ap-
' pellem? nec ignoranti nocent, nec scientem juvant.
' Si vis utique verborum ambiguitates deducere; hoc

(28) See the *Art
de Penfer*, Part.
III, cap. 10,
" 7, pag. 354,
where the good and ill Effects of Disputation are very well described.

(29) Quærit pars
femina flammæ Abstrusa in venis silicis.
Some strike from flashing Flints their fiery Seeds.

(30) Tacit. in Vita Agricola,
cap. iv.

nos

ling, obstinacy, fraud, and vain Sophistry. We know nothing of the physical System of these Philosophers, and there is little probability that their Passion for refining dialectical

(31) Seneca, Epist. xlv, pag. m. 240.

* nos doce, beatum non eum esse, quem vulgus appellat (31). — They would perhaps have discovered things necessary, had they not bunted after things superfluous. They squandered away much time in cavilling about Words, in captious debates, which exercise the Wit to no purpose, in starting difficulties, distinguishing them in ambiguous Terms, and solving them afterwards. Have we then so much useless time on our Hands? Do we know how to live, or how to die? Our principal endeavour should be to distinguish Things, not Words. To what end all this nicety shown about Words, with which no Man, unless while he is disputing, can be taken up? Facts deceive, distinguish them. We embrace the bad instead of the good. . . . How nearly does Flattery resemble Friendship? Teach me to judge of these Resemblances. A sowing Fox would appear a Friend. Vice creeps upon us under the Name of Virtue. Temerity conceals itself under the Name of Courage. Indolence is termed Moderation, and Cowardice passes for Caution. Error in these cases is of dangerous Consequence. Fix your Criteria here. But the Man, who is asked whether he has Horns, cannot be Fool enough to feel his brows, nor so stupidly credulous as to imagine he has what you by a Chain of subtilties would persuade him. Error in this case is harmless, like the Juggler's box and balls, where the fallacy is entertaining. Make me to know how it is to be done, I have lost the use of it. I say the same of those Querks; for by what other Name should those Sophisms be called, which neither make him that understands them the better, nor him that does not the worse? But if you will deal in Ambiguities, teach us this, That the Man is not happy, whom the Vulgar call so. Nothing can be finer, or more judicious, than these words of Seneca. Let us pass to the second Fault.

(32) In the Remarks [E], [F], [Q], of his Article.

A Spirit of Disputation easily degenerates into a false subtilty. Those who cultivate it fall into their own snare; and after having confounded their Adversary, they find themselves incapable to resist the Sophisms they have invented, and which may be turned against their own Doctrines. See what I have said of Chrysippus (32): who is a great instance of what I have observed. He professed himself a dogmatical Philosopher, and yet laboured almost as much for the interest of Scepticism as Carneades who professed to affirm nothing. Both sacrificed chiefly to the subtilties of their own Wit, they were in no great Pain about Truth, provided they had the Pleasure to make their Objections sparkle and triumph. He who said that, by too much disputing, we lose sight of Truth (33), was no Fool. How many are there who enjoy a profound Tranquillity in a firm Belief of the Doctrine of Truth, who would be full of doubts if they were to hear the reasons on both sides of the question? And how many are there, who, instead of clearing up their doubts, would involve themselves more deeply therein, if they were to hearken to the answers and replies of two subtle Disputants? The former, I mean those who have no doubts, would complain of the ill offices which disputing had done them, and would curse it in much the same terms as the Orator used to express the Power of Eloquence.

(33) Niniom altercando veritas amittitur.

* Malam, inquit, crucem importunæ isti eloquentiæ, quæ me securum animi, compositumque in alteram partem, jam suspensum, & utroque trahentem malè perdidit, quasi in foro disceptaretis apud Judicem, adeo me contorto pugnacique isto genere dicendi exanimastis (34). — A mischief seize that unreasonable Eloquence, which has deluded me from a determined Tranquillity of Mind into a state of suspense and uncertainty, and was brought down upon me, as though you had been actually engaged at the Bar before a Judge. The latter, I mean those who have some doubts, would complain that they are much more fluctuating than before, and would say to the two Antagonists what Terence puts into the Mouth of one of his Actors, Fecisti probe: Incertior sum multo quam dudum (35). — Thank you, Gentlemen. I am more uncertain than ever. It was St Augustin's Opinion that subtle logical Disputes were so much to be feared, that the Grace of God should be begged by public Processions that we might not be exposed to them. Facere non possum, quin hic referam, quæ de Beato Augustino, viro Διαλεκτικώτατῳ, quique de Logica

(34) Famian. Strada, Proluf. II, lib. ii, pag. m. 242.

(35) Terentius, in Phormione, Act. II, Scen. III, ver. 18, & 19.

* plures libros reliquit, tradit Beatus Ambrosius Serm. 92. illius scilicet pertinaciam & disputationis acrimoniam supplicationibus publicis compescendam, & quasi averruncandam exilimasse (36). — I cannot in this place forbear mentioning what St Ambrose says of St Augustin (a very subtle Logician), that public Prayers ought to be put up to restrain or rather extirpate his furious fondness for Disputation. It is an Instrument which may be of good use against Lies; but it will not stop there; for after having destroyed Error it attacks Truth: it is like those corrosive Powders, which, after having eaten the proud Flesh of a Wound, would prey upon the quick Flesh, and eat into the very Bones if they were let alone. But not to go so far off, let us be content to consider the ill effect of disputing for the reasons that Montagne gives us. Our disputes, says he (37), ought to be as much prohibited and punished, as other verbal Crimes. What Vices do they not awaken and promote, being always commanded and governed by Passion? we quarrel first with the Arguments, and then with the Men. We learn only to dispute, that we may contradict, and each contradicting and contradicting, the Fruit of disputing is the loss and ruin of Truth. Therefore Plato, in his Commonwealth, forbids the exercise of it to unskillful and dissipated Minds. . . . What will be the Consequence? One runs to the East, another as far as the West: they lose the Principal, and put it aside in the crowd of Incidents. At the end of an Hour's storming, they know not what they look for: one is high, another low, another wide. One catches at a word or simile. Another is insensible of what is said in Opposition to him, so eager is he in his Course, and thinks of following himself, not you. One, finding himself weak, fears every thing, refuses every thing, and in the beginning confounds and puzzles his subject: or, in the heat of the debate, stops short, and grows silent through a peevish Ignorance, affecting an insolent Contempt, or a foolish Modesty, shunning Contention. One, provided he strikes, cares not how much he lays himself open. Another counts his Words and reckons them for Arguments. Another makes advantage of his Voice and Lungs. Here is one that concludes against himself: and another stuns you with Prefaces and useless Digressions. Another falls into downright railing, and picks a quarrel with his Adversary to free himself from the Society and Argument of a Wit that bears hard upon him. And this last Man sees nothing in Reason, but incloses you with his dialectical Clauses, and the Formalities of his Art.

(36) Menag. in Diogen. Laert. lib. vii, n. 83, pag. 296.

(37) Montagne, Essai, liv. iii, cap. viii, pag. m. 252, 253. See what the Author of the Art de Penfer, Part III, cap. xix, n. 7, pag. 306, has said of these Thoughts of Montagne.

It may very justly be said that the Spirit and Character of our Euclid, and his Successors, have prevailed in the Christian Schools ever since the famous Dialectician Abelard. But what has been produced by it in favour of Truth? What philosophical Doctrines have the Nominalists and Realists, the Thomists and Scotists cleared? What have they done but multiply Opinions, and found out the Art of maintaining, pro and con, by the help of sundry barbarous Terms? What one maintains, the other denies; and they have all of them Distinctions and Subtleties ready at Hand to prevent their being put to silence. They have by turns made the most contrary Opinions triumph: now this is the natural Consequence of this Method of philosophizing. Mr Robault has admirably well described it. There is, says he (38), an invincible stubbornness observed in most of those who have gone thro' their Course of Philosophy, and who probably are fallen into such a pernicious disposition of Mind, only because they have not been used to convincing Truths, and see that those, who maintain any Doctrine whatsoever in public, always triumph over those who endeavour to prove the contrary; so that with them all things pass for probabilities. They do not look upon Study as a means to arrive at the Discovery of any new Truths; but as a witty sport in which People exercise themselves, the end of which is so to confound true with false, by means of certain subtilties, that they may equally defend one or the other, without ever appearing forced to give up, by any Arguments, any extravagant Opinion they may maintain. And indeed this cal Ideas, should leave them either a desire, or leisure to explain the Effects of Nature. I have read in Aristotle (f), that they taught, that there was no Power separate from it's Act; that is to say, that a Cause, which does not actually produce an Effect, has not the Power to produce it. This is one of the impious Paradoxes of the Spinofists, which Aristotle has well confuted (g). I refer to the Supplement EUCLID the Geometrician, and shall observe the Errors of Father Rapin [F].

(38) Robault, Preface to his Physics.

(f) Aristot. Metaphyt. Lib. IX, cap. iii.

(g) Id. ibid.

is the common success of all public Actions, where often, in the same Pulpit, opinions perfectly contrary are alternately proposed and equally triumph without the Matter in hand being explained, or any Truth being better established. I say nothing of an evil infinitely more considerable, which this disputing and dialectician spirit has produced. It has passed from the Chairs of the Philosophers into the Schools of Divinity, and has turned the most important Points of the Christian Morality into Problems (39); for what Doctrine of Morality have not the loose Casuists shaken, and so obscured, that the only way to arrive at certainty, is to hearken solely to the simplicity of the Scriptures without any manner of regard to the subtle and captious reasonings of those Doctors?

(39) See the Article L O Y O L A Remark [S].

We shall see in the following Remark some thoughts of Father Rapin, which represent no less the defect of our Philosophers of Megara, than that of the Schoolmen.

[F] I shall observe some Errors of Father Rapin. But first I shall shew his fair side (40): 'The most lively and subtle Wits are not always the properest for Philosophy. The imagination had better be a little heavy, than suffer itself to evaporate into too refined Speculations. The plain good sense of Socrates triumphed over all the Arts, and all the subtilty of the Sophists. Philosophy did not become abstract till it ceased to be solid: they stuck to formalities when they had no longer any thing real to say, nor did they ever think of having recourse to subtilties, till they had no hopes of making pure Reason prevail. That Protagoras, who first fought for captious Arguments, assumed this subtle air only because he had a wrong turn of Mind. . . . They spoiled all, says Seneca †, by refining every thing. For in order to make a vain Ostentation of Wit, they forsook the most essential parts of the Sciences: they began to weaken the Truth of things by the Artifice of Words, making use of Sophistry, when they were at a loss for good reasons. By this new Art Nauphibanes and Parmenides overthrew every thing. . . . So that the simplicity of Reason was corrupted by the Artifice of Discourse, and they ridiculed Truth instead of treating it with respect. This was the Error of the Spaniards of the last Century: they did by Philosophy as they did by Politics: both which by their speculative Genius they carried up to inconceivable subtilties, every Scholar refining upon his Master. From whence happened such a disorder as Seneca complains of ‡: Disputation became all the Fruit of Philosophy, and they made use of it, not so much to cure the Soul, as to exercise the Wit.' All this is good and true: and our Euclid and Eubulides might have seen themselves in it. But let us see what Father Rapin says particularly of them.

(40) Rapin, Reflexions sur la Philosophie, n. 28, pag. m. 358, 359.

† Habet hoc ingenium humanum ut cum ad solida non succurrat, in subtilibus atteratur. Verul. de Augm. Scien.

‡ Vide quantum mali fecerit nimia subtilitas & quam infesta sit veritati. Seneca, Epist. XCVIII.

‡ Philosophia non in remedium animi, sed in exercitationem ingenii inventa. Seneca, Lib. VII, cap. i, de Benef.

puting *, by that captious and sophistical Logic which he taught them, which Socrates did not approve of: because there was no sincerity in it's manner. It was Euclid and his Disciple Eubulides, who invented these Sophisms, which were afterwards so famous in the Schools, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius †; and which after all have nothing real but their subtilty; as the Dilemma, the horned Argument, the Elestra, the Sorites, the celebrated Megaric Interrogations (41), which Plutarch speaks of; and all those Cavils of their making, which rendered Dialectics so contemptible at Athens, that Socrates was obliged to turn it into ridicule, in his Discourses against the Sophists, to undeceive the Minds of the People. It was of this Euclid that Demosthenes learned the Art of the Dilemma, and that earnestness which made him so vehement in the Character of Eloquence he assumed (42). There are six Faults in this Passage. I. Socrates was dead when the Logic of Euclid appeared; so that he was in no Condition to condemn it. II. The Dilemma was not placed by Diogenes Laërtius among the Sophisms invented by Euclid and Eubulides. I do not believe that other Authors include it in that List; and indeed it is false that the Dilemma is a Sophism. It is as good a way of reasoning as the Syllogism; and if there are false Dilemmas, there are also Syllogisms of that ill quality: but under pretence that there may be sophisticated Syllogisms, they would be very much mistaken that should say a Syllogism is a Sophism. Apply all this to the Dilemma, and you will find that our Father Rapin is mistaken, both as to his Quotation, and as to the Matter itself. III. If Socrates could not disapprove of Euclid's Dialectic, much less could he ridicule that of Eubulides, the Disciple and Successor of Euclid. IV. Demosthenes learned of Eubulides, and not of Euclid, the Art of Reasoning. This is what Apuleius (43), and Diogenes Laërtius (44), both testify. V. After having put the Dilemma among the Sophisms which rendered Dialectic so contemptible at Athens, that Socrates was forced to turn it into ridicule, he ought not to have assigned it for one cause of that Character of Eloquence which made Demosthenes admired (45). VI. It was not by the Dilemma, but by the Enthymem that That Orator distinguished himself; whether you take the Enthymem according to the Idea of Rhetoricians, or according to the Idea of Logicians. I pass over Father Rapin's Quotation of Peter Ramus. He should have cited Laërtius.

* Abocav ipse 125. Rom. lib. i. Dialect. cap. vii.

† Diog. lib. ii.

(41) See Remark [G] of the Article CHRYSIPPUS.

(42) Rapin, Reflexions sur la Logique, num. 3, pag. 372.

(43) Apuleius, in Apologia, pag. m. 283.

(44) Diog. Laërt. in Euclid, lib. ii, num. 108.

(45) Nothing was more admirable in this Orator than his vehemence.

Let us justify the first of these six Censures. It is certain that the Disciples of Socrates founded no School during their Master's Life, and that Euclid did not leave Athens till after Socrates's Death (46). At which time he retired to Megara, and founded a School of Philosophy, and consequently the Dialectic he taught, and to which he gave a new air of subtilty, was after the Death of Socrates. Note, by the way, that he received at his House in Megara Plato and the other Athenian Philosophers (47), when the same Tyranny which had destroyed Socrates forced them to retire to some place of safety.

(46) See Plato in Phaedon, where he says that Euclid was present at Socrates's last Discourses.

(47) Diog. Laërt. lib. ii, num. 106. Helychius Illustrius, in Euclidea.

EUDO, Duke of Aquitain, cotemporary with Charles Martel, was concerned in the greatest Transactions of his Time. We are not well acquainted with the particulars of his Pedigree; but it is probable he was the Son of Bertrand, Duke of Aquitain, and younger Brother to St Hubert (a). He took Advantage of the Troubles of the Court of France, and the Calamities Spain was involved in by the Invasion of the Saracens; for whilst the latter thought of nothing but the securing of their new Acquisitions, and France attempted, in vain, to subdue Austrasia, where the Mayors of the Palace had made themselves independant; he seized not only the first and second Aquitain, between the Loire and the Garonne, but also all the Country of Tboulouse and Ufex. In the mean time, the Gascans spread themselves all over the Country, between the Garonne, the Ocean, and the Pyrenean Mountains. It is not to be wondered at, if Eudo, having such Forces, saw himself courted by Chilperic II, King of France. Rinfroi, Mayor of the Palace, had endeavoured, with the Assistance of the Frisons, to bring the Kingdom

(a) See Audigier, Orig. des François, Tom II, pag. 226.

VOL. II.

10 F

of

of Austrasia under the Obedience of the Crown of France; but Charles Martel attacked him so seasonably in the Ardennes in 716, that he put him to flight. Cbilperic and Rinfroi, his Mayor, were forced to fly, and being defeated again the next Year, they were under terrible Apprehensions from Charles Martel. In this distress they had recourse to the Duke of Aquitain, and far from quarrelling with him for his Usurpations, and Power, they declared him a Sovereign Prince [A], inviting him into a Confederacy with them against the boundless and rebellious Ambition of their Enemy. Eudo assembled all his Forces, and marched to join Cbilperic's Army near Paris; and after they were beaten, he led the unfortunate King into Aquitain, who wanted such a Retreat to secure himself from the wicked Attempts of the Conqueror. For that Conqueror was opening a way to that Usurpation, which afterwards took place in the solemnest Manner (b). Cbilperic's retreat into Aquitain, and his defeat near Soissons, happened in the Year 719. Charles pursued him as far as Touraine. Some time after he sent Ambassadors to Eudo, to demand Cbilperic. Eudo would not surrender him, but upon express Condition that he should be treated according to his Dignity. He made him magnificent Presents; and it was, perhaps, by his means that That Prince did not die in a Monastery. Two Years after he did the Nation a signal Service by the Victory he obtained near Tboulouse, over the Saracens. Those Infidels, aspiring to the Conquest of the Gauls, had no sooner made themselves Masters of Narbonne; but they advanced to Tboulouse, and laid Siege to it. If they had not lost Zaman their General, and a great part of their Army before this Place, it is easy to guess what they would have done. This defeat did not hinder them from returning soon after, and seizing Carcaffonne, Nismes, and all Septimania, as far as the Rhône: So that Eudo, who did not think it reasonable to let Charles Martel take such large Steps towards usurping the Crown [B], found himself in great perplexity: he was afraid of the Saracens; and he would not submit to a Man who had no more Right to the Sovereign Authority than himself. The precautions which he took were, on the one hand, secretly to favour the Cabals which were forming in Neustria (c), and on the other, to enter into an Alliance with Munuza, a brave Moorish General, to whom the Saracens had trusted Cerdagne. Munuza being desperately in Love with the Daughter of Eudo [C], who was a very beautiful Lady, to obtain her engaged to revolt: Therefore Eudo, believing that the Saracens could take no Advantage of his Absence, being sufficiently taken up at home with the work Munuza would cut out for them, made an Irruption into Neustria. This Enterprize did not succeed; he was vanquished (d) by Charles Martel, and his Country plundered by the victorious Army. His Son-in-law was still more unfortunate, as we shall shew in it's place (e): He perished

(b) When Pepin his Son caused the lawful King to be deposed, and himself chosen in his place in the year 752.

(c) Thus the western part of the French Monarchy was called.

(d) In 381.

(e) See the Article MUNUZA.

[A] Cbilperic and his Mayor . . . declared him a Sovereign Prince. I might have said they declared him King; for thus Fredegarius speaks of it: 'Cbilpericus itaque & Raganfredus legationem ad Eudonem ducem dirigunt, auxilium postulantes, rogant: REGNUM & munera tradunt. — Cbilperic iberefore and Rinfroi send Ambassadors to Eudo, with Presents, and the Investiture of the Crown, to desire his Assistance.' It must not be imagined that regnum signifies there a meer Ornament for the Head, named a Crown, sent to the Duke of Aquitain; it must be understood the Dignity and Authority which the Crown is a Symbol of: thus Valesius understands it. 'Ut suo, says he (1), summoque jure ac regia potestate in Aquitania dominaretur provincia regie ditioni exempta. — That he might reign in the Province of Aquitain, by his own supreme Authority, and regal Power, it being rendered independent of the King's Authority.' I make this Remark after a modern Author (2), who seems to charge the learned Father le Cointe with thinking that they only sent Eudo a Crown without conferring the Royal Authority upon him. In the Passage cited by that Father (3), I agree that regnum signifies a Crown, but not a Crown without Relation to the Sovereign Power. Reginon confirms my opinion, when he says, under the Year 735, that Charles Martel deprived Eudo both of his Kingdom and his Life, Eudonem regno simul & vita privavit. The modern Author cites for a third witness an Inscription of St Maximin, which denotes that, in 710, under Eudo, the most pious King of the French, and in the time of the descent of the Saracens, they removed the Body of St Mary Magdalene: 'Anno nativitat's Domini 710, sexta die mensis Decembris . . . regnante Odoino piissimo rege Francorum, tempore infestationis gentis peridæ Saracenorum. But this Authority has two great Defects: one, that the Year 710 is not a time when an Inundation of Saracens was feared in Gaul; the other, that Eudo at most was but King of Aquitain, and here is an Inscription which treats him as King of the French. I wonder Mr Audigier should not perceive a fault in the Figures 710. It is not in his Book an Error of the Press; but however, it is a Fault. Catell, in quoting this Inscription, has pointed it in such a manner that it falls upon the Year 716 (4). Anno nativitat's Domini septuagesimo decimo sexto, die mensis Decembris, &c. I have read in Bellesforest (5), that in the Year 741 the Saracens destroyed the City of Aix in Provence, at which time Girarde Rouffillon, Earl of Burgundy and Provence, removed from Aix to Vezelai, the Body of the blessed Mary Magdalene. [B] He did not think it reasonable to let Charles Martel take such large steps towards usurping the Crown. I do not know well whether to resent or despise the bare partiality of so many Writers, who treat all such as opposed the Ambition of Charles Martel, and Pepin, as turbulent and rebellious Persons. Those same Authors would have turned the Tables, if Fortune had declared for these pretended Rebels, and the Titles of Factions, Disturbers of the public Peace, Perfidious, and Traitors, would have been reserved for the Martels and the Pepins: So true it is that there are People every where among Historians as well as among the Populace.

Sed quid Turba Remi? Sequitur fortunam ut semper, & odit Damnos. Idem populus si Nortia Tusco Favisset; si oppressa foret seculus senectus Principis, hæc ipsa Sejanum diceret hora Augulum, (6)

But the same very Mob, that rascal Crowd, Had cry'd Sejanus, with a shout as loud; Had his Designs, by Fortune's Favour blest, Succeeded, and the Prince's Age oppress'd. DRYDEN.

[C] Munuza became desperately in love with the Daughter of Eudo. The mistakes of some Authors concerning this matter shall be examined in the Remarks of the Article MUNUZA.

[D] They

(4) Mémoires de l'Hist. de Langue doc. pag. 574. He borrows it from his Brother Bernard Guiso in his Chronicle of the Pope, and in the Life of Nicholas III.

(5) Chronique de France, fol. 521.

(6) Juvénal. Sat. X. ver. 73.

(1) Adrianus Valesius, Hist. Francor.

(2) Audigier, Origine des Français, Tom. II, pag. 235.

(3) Romanus Pontifex in signum imperii utitur regno, & in signum Pontificii utitur mitra. The Pope wears a CROWN, as an Ensign of his Temporal Power, and a Mitre to shew his Ecclesiastical. Innocent III, apud Audigier, ubi supra.

perished in the Commotions he had raised, and then Abderama, who had defeated him, finding nothing to oppose him, penetrated into Aquitain with a numerous Army. Eudo dispatched Ambassadors to Charles to beg his Assistance, but, without waiting for the Arrival of the Succours, he rashly ventured a battle with the Saracens as soon as they had passed the Dordogne (f). Policy had, perhaps, a greater share than Courage in this Action: He imagined that if he beat Abderama before Charles's Arrival, he might obtain another Victory over the latter, in Case of need; to say nothing of the Glory he had reason to expect, if he could expel the Infidels without any body to help him. He fought bravely; but at last, after a long resistance, was routed. Though it is said that his loss was very great [D], yet, re-assembling the broken remains of his Army, he advanced towards the Place where Charles was to pass the Loire, and joining him, they fought the famous Battle in which Abderama was killed [E], the seventh of October 732. But he could not be content to leave Neustria in Peace; he took Arms again in 735. This was the last time; for he died of Grief the same Year [F], upon Charles's entering Aquitain, and putting all before him to Fire and Sword. Hunaud, his Son, no less ambitious than himself, would not acknowledge Charles. This kindled the War afresh, which, after various Successes, at last ended to the disadvantage of Hunaud. He was forced to submit, and had his Duchy granted him (g).

(f) Isidore de Badojos, cited by Catel, Memoires de l'Hist du Languedoc, p. 27, says that the battle was fought between the Garonne and the Dordogne. See it also pag. 329.

(g) St. Corde-mol's History of France.

(7) Hist. Arab. cap. XIV.

(8) Remark [D].

(6) De Serres, du Haillan, &c.

(10) See Rem. [K] of the Article ABDERAMA.

(11) The Saracens entered France, they say, with their Wives and Children.

[D] They say his loss was very great. Roderic of Toledo (7) gives a frightful Idea of it, as if God alone knew the numbers of those that perished upon this occasion. I have already observed this in the Article of ABDERAMA (8); but these are the Historian's Words: 'Abderamen . . . cum amnes Garumne & Dordonie pertransisset Eudonem de quo diximus inveniit ad prælium præparatum, sed infelicitate præterita comitatus in fugam dilabatur fugitivus, & tot ibi de ejus exercitu ceciderunt quod ejus numerus omni humane scientiæ occultatur. — Abderama having passed the Dordogne and Garonne found Eudo, of whom we have already spoke, prepared for Battle, but, being pursued by his former ill Fortune, he was totally routed, and the number of his Troops that there fell exceeds all human Conception. He adds, what is very false, viz. that Abderama plundered and burnt the City of Tours.

[E] He fought together with Charles Martel in the famous Battle, in which Abderama was killed. Several Historians (9) give him the greatest share in that glorious Victory (10); for they say it was he that broke into the Saracen Camp, where, putting all to the Sword without distinction of Age or Sex (11), he charged the Enemy in the Rear; upon which imagining they were surrounded on all sides, their courage failed, and they fled away. But if these Historians had no better Authority for this matter, than for what they boldly advance, that Eudo brought Abderama into France, they deserve no Credit. I know Fredegarius has affirmed the latter. See Catel, at the third Book of his Memoires of the History of Languedoc, where, examining this question, he inclines to the Negative, tho' he confesses that Ado of Vienna, the Annals published by Pythæus, Sigebert, Marianus Scotus, Herman Contract, and several other Historians, have written that Eudo, to oppose Charles Martel, had called in the Saracens to his Aid. I have confuted this in the Article ABDERAMA (12).

[F] He died of Grief the same Year. The Annals of Fuld is mistaken in placing his Death under the Year 728. Rheginon is also mistaken in the Words above-mentioned, where he says that Charles Martel deprived Eudo of his Crown and Life. Fredegarius gives a more exact account: He says that Charles, hearing of the Death of Eudo, called a Council, re-passed the Loire, marched as far as the Garonne, took Blaise, &c.

(12) Remark [F].

EVE, the Wife of Adam, was so named by her Husband, because she was to be the Mother of all living (a). She was formed out of one of Adam's Ribs, and brought to him to be his Wife (b). God blessed them, and commanded them to encrease and multiply, and replenish the earth (c), and yet Adam did not think upon his conjugal Duty, till after he and his Wife had violated the Prohibition God had laid upon them. It was Eve who first disobeyed the Command of God: She suffered herself to be deceived by the Lies and fair Promises of the Serpent [A], and then solicited her Husband to the same Disobedience.

(a) Genesis iii, 20.

(b) Ibid. chap. ii, ver. 22.

(c) Ibid. chap. i, 28.

[A] She suffered herself to be deceived . . . by the fair promises of the Serpent. I should never have done if I was to relate all the Fictions that are to be found in Books concerning this Serpent. I. Some have said (1) it was a true Serpent that tempted Eve, and they suppose that at that time the Serpent conversed familiarly with Man, and that he lost the use of his Speech as a punishment for his Malice, in abusing the Simplicity of the Woman; but this opinion is so absurd, that it is surprizing such an Author as Josephus should not be ashamed to advance it. I wonder less at this than to see, that so great a Visionary, as Paracelsus, should say (2), that not only the first Serpent, by the special Permission of God, had Power to raise Adam and Eve to a sublime Degree of natural Knowledge, but that even to this Day all sorts of Serpents retain the Knowledge of the highest natural Mysteries by the particular Will of God. II. Some Rabbins agree with Josephus (3), that the Tempter of Eve was a true Serpent; but instead of saying, as that Historian does, that the Serpent tempted the good Woman, pushed on by a Spirit of Envy, by considering the happiness promised to Man in case of Obedience to God, they say, he was urged to it by a Spirit of Lust. He saw Adam and Eve enjoying one another, as the Laws of Marriage allowed them to do: he saw them both naked in this Exercise; such an Object excited very irregular Passions in him; he wished to be in Adam's Place, and hoped he should enjoy that Happiness, if he should become a Widow: now he believed this his Ambush would be fatal only to the Husband, because the Husband would be the first to eat the Apple; therefore he resolved to lay this Snare for them. Is it possible to vent more inconsistent Impertinence than this? Would a Tempter who had such Motives as these have made the Woman eat the Apple in the absence of her Husband? III. If we believe Abraham (4), the Serpent became a Tempter only by the ill Consequences that were drawn from his own Conduct. He had no design to do harm; he did not say a Word to Eve; he only had the Faculty, which other Beasts had not, of climbing up the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, and eating the Fruit. Eve, seeing he was not the worse for it, concluded from thence, there was nothing to apprehend from that Tree, and eat of it without fear of Death. Is not this to despise Holy Scripture more than Eve contemned the Command, to explain in this manner an account, in which so particular a mention is made of a Dialogue between the Woman and the Serpent? IV. Some ancient Heretics have dreamed, that the tempting Serpent was a Virtue (5), produced by Jaldabaoth under the form of a Serpent. This Jaldabaoth was vexed that a Deity greater than himself had made Man walk upright, who before was but a Worm, and had also given him the Knowledge of the superior Deities; for Jaldabaoth would willingly have

(4) Apud Rivinum, ibid. pag. 95, & seq.

(5) Tertull. de Præscript. Adv. Hæret. cap. xlviii. Epiphanius. Hæreses xxxviii.

obedience. The Inconveniencies of Child-bearing, the Pains of Travail, and Subjection to her Husband, were the Punishments inflicted upon her by God. Adam had no knowledge passed for the only true God. Therefore out of spite he produced the Serpent of Paradise, to whose Word Eve gave Credit as if it had been the Word of the Son of God. These Heretics had a great Veneration for the Serpent; for it is he, say they, who having taken of the Fruit of the Tree communicated the Knowledge of Good and Evil to Mankind. They were called Opbites. V. If we believe St. Augustin they carried their furious Reveries a great deal farther (6); for they pretended the tempting Serpent was JESUS CHRIST; and for that reason they fed a Serpent, which at a word from their Priests would creep upon the Altars, and twist about the Oblations and lick them, and then return into his hole again: and then they believed that JESUS CHRIST was come to sanctify their Symbols, and they celebrated their Communion. The most true Opinion, viz. that Eve was seduced by the Devil concealed under the Body of a Serpent, has had a thousand Suppositions added to it by the Liberties human Invention has taken. VI. For there are Rabbins (7) who say that Sammael, the Prince of the Devils, got upon the back of a Serpent of the bigness of a Camel, and with this Equipage he came to Eve to tempt her. VII. Some say (8), the Tempter took an advantage from Eve's not declaring the Prohibition in the same Terms that God had made it in to them. God had forbidden them to eat of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil; but Eve told the Serpent God had forbidden them to eat of that Tree or to touch it. Now as she passed near the Tree, the Serpent took hold of her, and pushed her against it, and made her observe she did not die for it, and inferred from thence that neither would she die if she eat of it. Several Fathers and some modern Divines (9) condemn Eve for not exactly reporting what she had heard from God, and it may be said this was an ill Omen of the memory of Mankind. This probably was the first time that what had been heard said was told again to another: great Alterations were made in it, tho' they were yet in the happy State of Innocence. Is it then to be wondered at, that, every Day, fallen Man gives unfaithful Accounts of things, and that a matter of Fact cannot pass from hand to hand for a few hours without being disguised? This by the way, as also what I am going to add, which is that some Authors pretend, that Eve did not know the Prohibition, but from what Adam told her, and that Adam made her believe out of his own Head, that they were not allowed so much as to touch the Tree, that he made her, I say, believe this, that she might be the more circumspect. Useless Precaution!

(6) August. de Hæres. cap. xvii.

(7) See Rivinus, pag. 5, 43, 44.

(8) Ibid. pag. 73.

(9) Ambrosius, de Paradiso, cap. xii. Rupertus de Trinit. lib. iii. Cajetanus Pererius, Calvinus, Oecolampadius, Lutherus, Gerhardus, apud Rivinum, p. 73, 74.

(10) Apud Rivinum, pag. 103.

(11) Ibidem, pag. 104.

(12) Ibidem, pag. 122.

† The Hebr. is, dying thou shalt die.

(13) See Rivinus, pag. ult.

(14) Horat. de Arte Poët. var. 4.

Definit in piscem mulier formosa superne (14).

A Virgin's Face joined to a Fish's Tail.

The Sirens were also a monstrous Composition, with their upper Part resembling a Virgin. Their treacherous and deluding Voice may well be compared to that of the Serpent; but would to God Eve had done as Ulysses did. She listened too much to the Discourse of this Seducer: not that we are to believe all the fine Compliments that Alcimus Avitus reports to have passed on both sides (15). For, according to the Narrative of Moses, this great Affair was ended in a very few Words. Never was an Enterprize of such Importance: It concerned the Fate of Mankind for all future Ages: The eternal Felicity, or eternal Damnation, of all Men depended upon it, without reckoning all the Follies and Vanities of the present Life; and nevertheless, never was any Affair so speedily dispatched, never perhaps had the Devil so cheap a Bargain of Man as this was. In all probability the criminal Thoughts of particular Persons, which are of no consequence, cost him more than this, which was decisive for the whole World; and it must be confessed, that the two Heads, with whom God did deposit the Salvation of the Human Race, kept it so ill, that nothing could be worse: they delivered up the Place to the Enemy, almost without a Blow; and instead of fighting for so precious a Trust, at least as much as sinful Man will fight for his Religion or his Country, pro aris & fœtis, they made less Resistance than a Child will make for his Toy, that is taken from him. They acted as if a Pin had only been at stake: sic erat in fatis. Nevertheless, we must be far from thinking, either that Moses has too much abridged that Narrative, or that, according to the Oriental Taste, he conceals that fatal Event under the Veil of Fable. This would be too much exposing the Interests of our fundamental Truths: and after all the great Innocence of Eve, and her want of experience in all things, ought to lessen our wonder at her short and feeble Resistance. There is nothing like being excessive wicked and deceitful to prevent being imposed upon. Men of Probity are those that give the easiest into the Snare. Incapable of Fraud, they hardly escape the artful Designs of others. An open Heart cannot suspect in another the Malice and Collusion which he is not conscious of in his own Breast. Therefore it was a Conquest infinitely more profitable than glorious, which the Devil made over the first of all Women, and one might almost, in this manner, expostulate both with him and the Serpent, who was his second:

Egregiam vero laudem & spolia ampla refertis,
Tuque puerque tuus, magnum & memorabile nomen,
Una: dolo divum si fœmina victa duorum est (16).
High Praises, endless Honours, you have won,
And mighty Trophies with your worthy Son,
Two Gods one silly Woman have out-done.

DRYDEN.

For what a modern Author urges, that the good Angels would not have suffered so unequal a Match between a Devil, thoroughly experienced, and a Woman who was but just formed, and who had never seen the Sun rise or set, deserves no other Answer than this, that such an Argument, by proving too much, proves nothing. Quod si hoc totum, says Be (17), ab infœcia & imbecillitate mulieris provenisse dixeris, æquum utique fuisset ignaræ & imbecillæ fœminæ succurrisse ex altera parte bonos Angelos. Equi spectatores rerum humanarum haud tulissent tam imparem congressum. Quid enim, si dolo mali Demonis multiscii & in rebus versatissimi victa fuerit imbellis fœmina, quæ Solem nondum orientem vel occidentem viderat recens in lucem edita, & rerum omnium inexperta? Meruit certe tam charum caput quod annexam sibi tenuit humani generis salutem, meruit, inquam, custodiam angelicam, --- Should you alledge, says he, that all this proceeded from the Woman's want of Power and Experience, it might reasonably have been expected, that some good Angels should have assisted in their turn a weak and inexperienced Creature. Impartial Eyes could not have seen so unequal a Rencounter. What wonder if a weak Woman, just ushered into the World, that had

(15) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, July 1686, pag. 764, where some Faults of Gassendi are observed.

What small Resistance Eve made.

(16) Virgil. Æn. lib. iv. vers. 57.

(17) Bernart, Archæol. p. 147. Ed. Amst. 1694.

knowledge of her till after they were expelled the Garden of Eden [B]. This is not a necessary Proof that it was incompatible with a State of Innocence [C]. They had many Children: Cain was the first-born, and Abel the second; as for Seth, he was not born till after Abel had been killed by Cain. All this is unquestionable, since the word of God says it; but as it goes no farther, we may judge as we think fit of the other things which are

* neither seen the Sun risen or set, should be over-powered
* by the Cunning of a well practised Fiend? Surely so * valuable a Being, on which the Happiness of Man* kind depended, deserved the Protection of some Guar* dian Angel.

[B] Adam did not know her 'till after they were driven out of the Garden of Eden.] None but those who are more guided by their own Imaginations than the Authority of Scripture, will deny that Adam and Eve came out of the Garden without any carnal Knowledge; and Cornelius à Lapide (18) wrongfully charges the Protestants with denying it. I. Therefore I refer those to the fabulous Regions, who say that Cain was conceived in the terrestrial Paradise, and that Eve was no sooner created than she lost her Virginity; Adam enjoying her immediately as soon as he saw her. The Author of the Sibylline Verses maintains, that as an Exemption from all Shame was one of the Privileges of Innocence, Man in that State performed his conjugal Duty in the Sight of the Sun, and as freely as the Brutes (19); but he is an apocryphal Author, and deserves no Credit. The Rabbins who have had the Impudence to say (20), that the Serpent fell in love with Eve, by seeing her in the A& with her Husband, and that upon that Sight he formed the black Design of seducing them, are much less to be born than the pretended Sibyl, and those other Rabbins who have said that Adam was asleep during the Serpent's Conversation with Eve (21), and that he was fallen asleep to refresh himself after his conjugal Exploits. These latter Rabbins are however very extravagant. We shall see others in the following Remark, who, though not free from Fictions, yet do establish the Fact which we maintain with a Father of the Church (22); that Adam did not think of celebrating his Nuptials till he was out of Paradise. Nuptiæ terram replent, virginitas paradysum (23). — The World is a State of Matrimony, but Paradise of Virginity. II. Let us shun also the contrary extremum. Some pretend, that Adam deferred the Consummation of his Marriage fifteen Years, or even thirty Years. Others carry the matter farther, and affirm, that Adam and Eve, by Consent, and to bewail their Sin, did not break through their Continence till the end of a hundred Years. The Reasons which confute this are very good, whether they are taken from the want the World was then in of being peopled, and the Commission they received from God on this Account, or whether they are taken from the Dispositions, their Age, the Constitution of their Bodies, and the first Fires of Concupiscence, must raise in them. 'Probabiliter censet Tornielius in Annal. Cain genitum esse mox post expulsiōem Adæ & Evæ ex Paradiso, scilicet primo anno Mundi & Adæ, tum quia Adam & Eva creati sunt in statura perfecta & habili ad generandum, tum quia post peccatum mox acres libidinis & copulæ stimulus fenserunt, tum quia ipsi erant soli in Mundo, & per eos Deus volebat statim propagari & multiplicari toto orbe genus humanum (24). — The Conjecture of Tornielius, in his Annals, is not improbable, that Cain was born soon after the Expulsion of Adam and Eve from Paradise, that is the first Year of the World and Adam, both because Adam and Eve were created in full Stature, proper for Generation; and that after the Fall they were immediately seized with the Stings of Lust, and an Impatience for Enjoyment; because they were the only Couple in the World, and GOD by them designed immediately to people and replenish the World. III. Those who say that Adam had no share in that Continence of several Years, are wretched Dreamers, that do not deserve any regard. They (25) suppose, that he continued excommunicated One hundred and fifty Years for eating the forbidden Fruit, during which time he lived with a Woman, who like himself had been formed out of the Earth, whom they call Lillia. They add, that he begot Devils by his Commerce with this Woman, and that at length, when his Excommunication was taken off, he married Eve, who came out of his Head, and begot Men. This Account is more confused than what we find in other Books (26), viz. that Adam, desiring to do Penance, kept himself at a Distance from Eve for One hundred and thirty Years, and devoted himself to another Woman named Likitha, upon whom he begot nothing but Devils. This was a worthy Fruit of such an irregular Penance. But on the other side Epiphanius mentions a Sect of Heretics (27), who said, that the Devil had to do with Eve, as a Husband with his Wife, and that he begot Cain and Abel upon her. See Remark [G]. Strange Equivalents these! Adam leaves Eve to beget Devils upon another Woman, and the Devil associates with Eve to beget Men upon her. IV. But what is chiefly to be condemned is the prophane and impious Error of those who say, that the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil was nothing else but the Pleasure of Love: From whence they conclude, that the Fall of our first Parents was only, on the Woman's Part, a Desire to part with her Virginity, and on the Man's Part the Accomplishment of that Desire. Cornelius Agrippa is not the first that has vented this Folly. The Cathari, the Manicheans, the Priscillianists, and the Basilidians, had broached it long before (28); and it appears by the Book of the Count de Gabalii, that it is one of the Doctrines of the Cabala, and that the Initiated and the Adepts explain in this manner the History of the Temptation. 'The wise Man easily explains those chaste Figures, says that Author, when he sees that the Taste and Mouth of Eve are not punished, and that she brings forth with Pain: he knows that it is not the Taste which is criminal, and discovering what was the first Sin, by the Care the first Sinners took to conceal certain Parts of their Bodies with Leaves, he concludes, that it was not the Will of God that Mankind should multiply by that base way.' Robert Flud adopts the same absurd Opinion (29). 'Graviter erravit Cornelius Agrippa in declamat. de Orig. peccati & Robertus Flud, sub nomine anagrammatizato Rudolphi Otreb. in tract. Theologico-Philosophico, de vita, morte, & resurrectione, lib. 2. cap. 2. §. 3. dum tradunt, primum & originale peccatum aliud nihil fuisse, quam copulam carnalem viri mulierisque, & nullum alium Daemonem Evam tentasse arbitrantur, quam illum de quo ait Job, cujus virtus est in lumbis & in umbilico potestas. A qua etiam opinione non plane alienus videtur Philo Judæus de opific. mundi. fol. 26. & seqq. (30). — Cornelius Agrippa in his Declaration on the Origin of Sin, and Robert Flud under the anagrammatized Name of Rudolphus Otreb. in a Philolophical-Theological Treatise on Life, Death, and the Resurrection, have been guilty of a notorious Error in laying down the first original Sin to be nothing but the carnal Commerce of Man and Woman, and fancying that no other Devil tempted Eve, but that whereof Job speaks, whose Virtue is in his Loins, and whose Power is in his Navel. From which Opinion Philo Judæus seems not to differ much.' Though it should be granted that there is something figurative in Moses's account, yet it would be no less certain that it is to be literally understood as to the order of time. Now it is undeniable that the first Embraces of Adam and Eve are related in Scripture, as after the Sentence that God pronounced against their Crime. Ryffinius has solidly confuted the Fable of these Libertines (31). Here are four falsities upon this one point.

[C] This is not a proof that it was incompatible with a State of Innocence. Several of the ancient Fathers, too much prejudiced in favour of Virginity, have pretended (32) that if Man had persevered in Innocence, he would not have entered into the carnal Commerce of Matrimony, and that the Propagation of Mankind would have been effected quite another way; but St Augustin has maintained the contrary by strong reasons (33); for, in short, the divine Blessing, the Command to multiply, and the difference between the Sexes, were things preceding the Fall; and it would be absurd to say that Sin was absolutely necessary, that God

(26) See Heidegg. Hist. Patriarch. r. Tom. 1, p. 168.

(27) Epiph. Heres. XL.

(28) See Hadrian. Beverlandi, de Peccato Origin. pag. 44. 45.

(29) Jacobus Mollerus, in Tractatu de Heremaphrodito, cap. vi, pag. 176.

(30) See in the Remark [I] what will be quoted of Leo the Hebrew.

(31) In justa Declaratione scelerati libelli Adr. Beverlandi. See also Polygam. Triumphat. pag. 233, & seq. Saldani, Orta Theolog. pag. 558, & seq.

(32) Vide Salianum, Tom. 1, pag. 174.

(33) Augustinus, de Civitate Dei, lib. xiv, cap. xxi, & seq.

(d) See the Chronicle of Genebrard.

(e) Sallianus, Annal. Tom. I., pag. 231.

(f) St Romuald, Abregé du Thre. Chronol., at the Year of the World 99.

(g) Apud Salden. Otia Theol. pag. 607.

(h) Ibid.

(i) See Rem. [B].

are told us of Eve. For instance, that she lay-in every Year (d), and every time had a Son and a Daughter [D]; or even a greater number of Children of both Sexes, and that she lived 940 Years (e) [E]. There is nothing improbable in all this: but what I am going to say relishes altogether of the Romance and the Monkish Conceits, viz. That she instituted a Religious Order of certain young Women who were always to remain Virgins and to preserve unextinguished the Fire that fell from Heaven upon Abel's Sacrifice, and which was called Vesta, or the Flame of God (f). This is the Origin of the Vestal Virgins, according to this fine Story. We shall see in another place that the same is referred to Noah's Wife. It is another very gross Fable, to say as they do (g), that Eve cut off a Branch of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, of which she made a great Stick, and forced her Husband with it to eat of the Fruit of that Tree. Farther, it is perfectly prophane to say, as some have done (h), that Eve herself was the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil, whose Fruit was prohibited (i). As to those might be furnished by human Generations with the number of his Elect (34). It is true St Augustin grants that in the State of Innocence, Generation would have been performed without any mixture of Passion, and without the loss of Virginity, and that the natural parts would have been intirely subjected to Reason; so that according to him the Rebellion of those parts was the nearest and most immediate Consequence of the disobedience of our first Parents, as appears by the shame they were seized with upon the spot, and which forced them to make use of Girdles. 'Voluntati membra illa' (in Paradiso) ut cætera cuncta fervirent. Ita genitalis arum vas in hoc opus creatum seminaret, ut nunc terram manus (35). Seminaret igitur prolem vir, susciperet femina genitalibus membris quando id opus esset, & quantum opus esset voluntate motis, non libidine concitatis (36). Ita tunc potuisse utero conjugis salva integritate femine genitalis virile semen imitti, sicut nunc potest eadem integritate salva ex utero virginis fluxus menstrui cruoris emitti (37). It seems certain Rabbins attributed this to the natural quality of the forbidden Fruit: the mechanic Principles of the new Philosophy would easily furnish them with Arguments to defend this Opinion. Those Doctors add (38) that the Knowledge the Tempter promised our first Parents from this Fruit, was that they should have a desire to couple, the only thing they were Strangers to (39). In this manner the Tree was to open their Eyes: Adam was to perceive the Beauty of his Wife which he had not taken notice of before, being too much taken up with intellectual things, and both were to observe the parts designed for the functions of Marriage. In Consequence of which they were to produce other Men, and become like to God in the Power of making new Beings. Can there be a bolder Impiety than what is to be met with in Abraham (40); that God, out of jealousy to Man, and that he might be the only Producer, forbid him to eat of the Tree which gave him the Power to beget? To this the Rabbins apply the Proverb Figulus figulo invidet, faber fabri; and some maintain (41) that Adam did very well to eat of the forbidden Fruit, because without it Man would have been like a Beast, not discerning good and evil, and would have had no pre-eminence above the Brutes but the faculty of speaking. The learned Maimonides has confuted this extravagance. It seems those People believed the Constitution of Adam and Eve was such that they wanted the spirituous parts of the forbidden Fruit, to remove some obstructions which rendered them insensible and impotent, as those mentioned under the Title de frigidis & maleficiatis.

[D] They pretended that she was delivered every time of a Boy and a Girl. Some thought that Cain and Abel were twins; but the contrary may easily be proved by Moses's Narrative. Nor is it the most commonly received Opinion. They rather choose to imagine that a Son and a Daughter were born at each Birth, and then they suppose that she who was born with Cain was married to Abel, and the Daughter that was born with Abel was married to Cain, and in like manner the rest (42). By this means they endeavour to extenuate the Incest as much as possible. But neither this, nor any other reason, required that the Twins should be of different Sexes; for if Eve had been delivered the first time of two Boys, and the next time of two Girls, they might have married as well, and with as little Incest as upon the other supposition. However the most common Opinion is, that a Son and Daughter were born together: and they go so far as to tell us the very Names of the Daughters. Cain's Twin Sister was called Calmana (43), or Caimana (44), or Debra (45), or Azrum (46): that of Abel was named Delbora (47), or Awina (48). St Epiphanius, in his Thirty ninth Heresy, makes mention of Azura and Sava as two Daughters of Adam (49), and he says that Sava was Cain's Wife. Cedrenus and some others make Asha to be Adam's eldest Daughter, and the Wife of Cain. According to Tostatus, it was very true that the Rabbins gave Cain's Twin Sister for a Wife, but her Name was Calmana. See the Remark [F] of the Article ABEL. Those who have boldly affirmed these sorts of particulars, deserved, for the Punishment of their rashness and credulity, to be perplexed with a greater variety of Fables than those we have observed in them. A Confusion of Languages ought to be the fate of too daring Enterprizes; now what boldness is it to penetrate beyond the Deluge, and even to the first Origin of things, without the assistance of the only Historian we have left? The Tower of Babel might sooner be built, than we at such a distance should be able to find out the Names of Adam's Daughters. We ought to adhere in this and several other things only to the Text of Moses, seeking for nothing more than what the inspired Writers inform us of. They alone knew the Truth of things; the rest being all fiction. We should say to them as the ancient Poets said to the Muses, It is your part who know these things to teach us:

Et meministis enim divæ, & memorare potestis,
Ad nos vix tenuis famæ perlabitur aura (50).

For ye well know, and can record alone
What Fame to future Times conveys but darkly down.

DRYDEN.

We have already confuted those, in the Article of CAIN, who say that Eve had had but two Children when Abel was murdered.

[E] And that she lived 940 Years. If you want Vouchers, they produce three, Marianus Victor, Genebrard, and Feuarent (51): but a hundred thousand such as these are not able to lessen the uncertainty of such a fact. Besides, I see some Authors (52) who think it strange that Eve should live ten Years longer than Adam, notwithstanding so many Child-bearings, notwithstanding the continual Dominion of her Husband, the Death of Abel, the Schism of the Cainites, and her continual Grief for her Sin. They are to blame to crowd into this Catalogue Adam's Authority over his Wife; for unless they take Adam for a bad Husband, it cannot be supposed such an Authority should shorten the Life of Eve. However, they must ascribe to that first Woman the best Constitution in the World; for they pretend, since her Husband could live 930 Years, and communicate to his Sons for many generations the Principles of so long a Life (which agrees no less to Eve than to him) he must necessarily have been of a very vigorous Constitution. His long penance, they say, and his sorrow for having lost so much happiness for himself, and his posterity, perhaps weakened his Constitution; but it is not known that he was ever sick. Turn the thing which way you will, it will always be an Argument from the greater to the less, to demonstrate, that the Body of Eve was better constituted than that of her Husband. 'Quantum porro fuerit Adami robur, quæ firmitas laterum, quis nervorum vigor, quis contextus musculorum docet

(43) Corn. 2. Lapide, in Gene. sim, pag. 95.

(44) Cornellor. apud Sallian. pag. 178.

(45) Methodius, apud Raderum. Not. in Chron. Alexandr. citante Sallian. pag. 175.

(46) Saidus Patricius, apud Heidegg. Tom. I, pag. 169.

(47) A Lapide in Gene. sim, pag. 95.

(48) Saidus, ubi supra.

(49) See Heidegg. ibid. & Sallian. pag. 183.

(50) Virgil. Æn. lib. vii, ver. 645, in imitation of Homer's Iliad. lib. ii, ver. 285. Ἡμεῖς γὰρ θεοὶ ἐὰν παραίσι τε ἰδῶμεν πάντα, ἡμεῖς δὲ κλισίῃσιν ἀνθρώπων εἴδῃ τε ἴδμεν. Vos enim deo estis, ædificæ scilicet omnia, Nos autem hominum solum ædificum nosque quicquam scimus. For Eve's wide Region, Heav's immensur'd Height, And Hill's Abyss hide nothing from your Sight. We were created Mortals, lost in doubts below, But guess by Reason, and but doubt we know. Pope.

(51) Sallian. Tom. I, p. 231.

(52) Ibid.

those who believe that, if she had not tasted that Fruit, there never would have been any Love between the two Sexes [F], but only Friendship, their Opinion can neither be refuted by solid Reasons, nor supported by good Proofs.

I shall relate two or three other extravagant Fables of the Rabbins. Some of them say, that Eve was formed out of her Husband's Tail. They pretend (k) that at first God had given Adam a Tail; but perceiving afterwards that it lessened his Beauty, he resolved to cut it off: However he made use of it to produce the Woman, which he presented to the first Man (l). This Woman, they say, was so beautiful, that the Prince of all the Angels fell desperately in love with her (m) [G]; which was the Cause of his falling from a State of Innocence. She alone could satisfy Adam's amorous Passion, who had tried all other Methods in vain [H]; and this made him cry out, This is now bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh (n). In this wild manner they not only vent their abominable Conceptions; but also found them on Scripture by the most absurd method of interpretation that can be. The Imaginations of a Jewish Author, who lived in the XVIth Century, and who was commonly called Leo the Hebrew (o), are no less

(k) See the Bibliotheca Rabbinnica of Bartolocci, Tom. I, pag. 69.

(l) Ibid. Tom. III, pag. 336.

(m) Ibid. Tom. I, pag. 322.

(n) Gen. ii, 23.

(o) He was Son to Rabbi Abraham. See Remark [I] of the Article ABRAHAM.

docet nongentorum & triginta annorum ætas, nullo quod sciat languore debilitata, eademque in multorum sæculorum posteros propagata, est fortassis illam totius corporis firmitatem nonnihil tam diuturna penitentia, tam multiplex tristitia, de tot tantisque bonis sibi suisque amissis, afflixerit (53). — How prodigious the Strength of Adam was, how robust his Constitution, how vigorous his Nerves, how compact his Muscles, appears from an Age of 930 Years, never interrupted by any known infirmity, and from his propagating the same to his posterity for many Generations, though it is probable so long a penitence, and such variety of sorrow, for the loss of so many and so important Benefits to himself and his descendants, might somewhat impair the strength of his Constitution.

[F] Some think that, if she had not tasted the forbidden Fruit, there never would have been any Love between the two Sexes. I have quoted (54) St Augustin's words, which clearly testify that in his Opinion Fathers would have produced their Children with the same ease that Husbandmen sow their Grounds. It might be objected to him that the Brutes remain in their original state of Creation, and yet they are inclined to propagate their Species with incredible Ardor.

Inde feræ pecudes persultant pabula læta,
Et rapidos trantant amnes (55).

Each Beast forgets his Rage, and entertains
A softer Fury thro' the flow'ry Plains.

What they call libido, and all that can be conceived most leud, eager, and passionate, under that word, may be plainly seen among Beasts when they are stimulated by the Fire of Love: and yet they have done nothing to be deprived of their natural State. Therefore it looks as if those impetuous Motions, which are accompanied with Pleasure, and nevertheless subject to Reason, have nothing in them inconsistent with the State of Innocence. St Augustin would certainly have secured himself in the essential difference there is between a reasonable Creature, made after the Image of God, and brute Beasts; and it would have been hard to have beat him out of this intrenchment. Let us leave him there undisturbed, and content our selves to observe, that since Man after his Fall was unable to obey the exact dictates of Reason, there was nothing more necessary than to introduce Love into the World; for it cannot be conceived how Mankind could have subsisted without it. The Passions, with respect to the natural benefits of Society, are the same thing as Repentance in celestial concerns, a Plank after Shipwreck; and since Reason was to become so feeble, we could not have had recourse to a better shift than that of the Passions, of which Love is without dispute the principal one, and in some manner the Soul of the World. Hear what Lucretius says of it in the sequel of these Verses above.

Ita capta lepore

Te sequitur cupidè, quò quamque inducere pergis.
Denique per maria, ac montes, fluviosque rapaces,
Frondiferasque domos avium, camposque virentes,
Omnibus incutiens blandum per pectora amorem

Efficit, ut cupidè generatim sæcla propagent.

Quæ quoniam rerum naturam sola gubernas,
Nec sine te quidquam dias in luminis oras
Exoritur, neque fit lætum, neque amabile quidquam;
Te sociam studeo scribundis versibus esse,
Quos ego de rerum natura pangere conor (56).

(56) Ib. ver. 15, and following.

To thy soft Charms the whole Creation bends,
And Love's vast Empire o'er the World extends.
On Hills, in Streams, and in the wai'ry Main,
On leafy Forests, and the verdant Plain,
Thy genial Pow'r the various Nations moves,
The Realms to people, and indulge their Loves.
Since then all Nature owns thy high Decree,
Since all that's lovely owes it's Birth to thee,
Nature's my Theme, do thou instruct my Song,
Soft as thy Charms to flow, and as thy Impulse strong.

See what has been said upon the usefulness of the Passions and Prejudices by Maimbourg's Critic, in the second Volume of his Nouvelles Lettres, from page 499 to page 572. See also the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres for the Month of September 1686, Article I, page 989.

[G] The Rabbins say . . . that the Prince of all the Angels fell desperately in Love with her. They give him the Name of Samaël, and make him the Father of Cain, who, according to their fictions, was no more than Abel's Brother by the Mother's side, and there they acknowledge what the Physicians call Superfæculation. Read this Latin: 'Ingreditur ad Evam (nempe Samaël) equitans super serpentem, & gravidavit eam Caino; & deinde ascendit Adam, & fecundavit eam Abele (57). — Samaël riding on a Serpent went in to Eve, and got her with Child of Cain; Adam afterwards knew his Wife, and she conceived Abel. Father Bartolocci adds that they suppose all the People of the Earth, except the Jews, are derived from the like Adulteries of Adam's Wife. 'Non Samaël solum cognovit Evam, sed & serpens ipse antiquus cum Eva coivit, ex cuius semine omnes mundi nationes (Judæis exceptis) provenire dicunt (58). — Not only Samaël knew Eve, but the old Serpent had also carnal Knowledge of her, from whose seed, they say, all Nations of the Earth (except the Jews) proceeded.' They also make her the Mother of several Dæmons. 'Adamum intra spatium centum triginta annorum Dæmones procreasse ex Lilith. . . . Evam autem Dæmonum concubitus per idem tempus appetiisse, ex qua Dæmones nati sunt, volunt (59). — They pretend that Adam for one hundred and thirty Years generated Dæmons with Lilith, and that Eve during the same space courted the embraces of Dæmons, which she likewise brought forth.' What is most strange is, that they found all these Chimeras upon the words of Scripture, which they miserably pervert and sophistate.

(57) Bartolocci, Bibl. Rabb. Tom. I, pag. 297, translating a Passage out of Jalkut Sect. Bereith, pag. 26.

(58) Id. Ibid.

(59) Id. Ibid. pag. 222.

[H] She alone could satisfy Adam's amorous Passion: who had tried all other ways in vain. Let us use the words of an Italian Monk (60): Quid mirum si hæc dicant. — What wonder, if they will say such things as these, viz. 1. That Adam carnally knew Eve the very day he was created: 2. That she conceived four Children, Cain, Abel, and two Daughters: 3. That they made

(60) Id. Ibid. pag. 75, 76.

(p) Leo, the Hebrew, Philosophy of Love, Dialogue III, pag. m. 612, 613.

(q) See the Re- [F] of the Article ADAM.

less extravagant. He pretends (p), that the Man, God made the sixth day of the Creation, was both male and female; which Man, after having reviewed all the Birds and terrestrial Animals, without finding any whose Society, and Aid, could be agreeable and convenient for him, was cast into a profound Sleep, that, being divided into two, he might be delivered from the Solitude which God did not see good for him. After this division, the Woman, who before had no particular Name, was called Eve. The Author reconciles his Hypothesis, as well as he can, with the Androgynes of Plato (q), and imagines that Man would never have sinned, if the two Sexes, which at first were united in Adam's person, had not been separated [I]. He pretends also, that in each Sex there

(61) Non coivitt aliqua creatura ante primum hominem. Bartolucci, Bibl. Rabbin. Tom. I, pag. 75.

(62) In Postilla Genes. ad hunc locum.

(63) Leo, the Hebrew, Philosophy of Love, Dial. III, pag. m. 616.

(64) Ibid. pag. 618.

(65) Ibid. pag. 619.

(66) Ibid. pag. 620.

(67) Ibid. pag. 621.

(68) Ibid. pag. 622.

haste to consummate their Marriage, because their Conduct in this respect was to be a rule and example to all the brute Creatures, to endeavour the Multiplication of their Species: 4. That no Creature had performed that function before Man (61): 'Quæ minora æstimantur, cum de protoparente Adamo ita finistre sentiant, ut etiam ipsum nefarie incontinentiæ, quod referre pudet, insimulent? In Jalkut tom. I. n. 24. ante Evæ formationem, omnia jumenta, ferasque campi carnaliter cognovisse aiunt his verbis. . . . dixit R. Eleazar, quid sibi vult, hac vice? (Vulg. hoc nunc) Gen. 2. 23. ad docendum, quod ingressus fuerat Adam super omne jumentum & feram, neque refrigerata est illius concupiscentia, quousque copulata est ei Eva.' Father Bartolucci observes that some modern Rabbins say, that this is to be understood in a metaphorical sense; but he affirms the contrary, since the last words, quousque copulata est ei Eva, are to be taken in the literal sense, and the Rabbi's Thought is so clear, that it is a wonder any Christian Authors should strain it to an allegorical meaning. Salomon Jarchi (62), continues he, understood it literally.

[I] Leo the Hebrew . . . imagines that Man had never sinned, if the two Sexes . . . had not been separated.] Leo supposes, that the Serpent could not deceive the Woman while she was joined with the Man, nor deceive the Man and Woman jointly (63). So that the power of sinning was a Consequence of the Division of the two Sexes; a Division which God had made for wise ends, viz. that each of the Sexes might be an help to the other in the Work of Generation. Let us say something of the Allegories added by the same Author to this. He pretends (64) that each Man and Woman is compounded of a masculine and a feminine Part. The Understanding is the masculine Part, the Matter, or Body, the feminine Part. In the beginning there was a very good understanding between these two parts: The sensual feminine Corporeity was obedient and subject to the Intellectual and masculine Reason: so that there was no manner of Opposition in Man, and his Life was altogether an intellectual one (65). The prohibition to eat of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, signified that Adam should not turn aside his Intellect towards Acts of Sensuality (66), nor towards the acquisition of useful things; for corporeal, sensual, and corruptible Objects cause the Intellect, which is too much addicted to them, to become material and corruptible, that is to say, liable to Condemnation and Punishment (67). Nevertheless, adds the Jewish Doctor, the Deity did not permit the Obedience of the corporeal feminine Part to the intellectual masculine Part to be constant. God foresaw that the Union of these two parts would render the Essence of Man more and more immortal and perfect; but on the other side that it would be very prejudicial to the corporeal and feminine part, both with respect to the individual Person, and with respect to the propagation of the human Species; for 1. When the Intellect is inflamed with the Knowledge and Love of eternal and divine Things, it neglects the care of the Body, and lets it die before it's time. 2. Those, who are ardently engaged in intellectual Contemplations, despise corporeal Love, and shun the lascivious Act of Generation: so that this intellectual perfection would cause the loss of the human Race. Wherefore God determined to put some moderate division between the feminine sensual Part, and the intellectual masculine Part, that (68) sensuality might prompt the Intellect to certain desires, and corporeal Acts, necessary for the corporeal individual sustentation, and the succession of the Species. And this is what is signified by the Text, when it says, It is not good that the Man should be alone, let us make him a help before, or over against him; that is to say, that the sensual feminine Part should not be so subject to the intellectual as never to make any resistance, but should sometimes draw it to corporeal Things, for the benefit of the individual Being, and the Species. As to the sleep Adam fell into, when God took a Rib from him, and formed Eve out of it, our Author pretends that it signifies (69) that the primary intellectual watching, and intense Contemplation of Adam was interrupted, and that the Intellect began to incline towards the corporeal part, as a Husband to his Wife, and to have a moderate care for the sustentation of it, as of part of itself, and of the Succession of it's kind, for the preservation of the Species: so that the division between the masculine and feminine half, was made for good and necessary ends: and afterwards followed the resistance of the feminine Matter, and the inclination of the masculine Intellect towards it, together with an immoderate pursuit of the corporeal Necessity: And was no longer governed by Reason, as it ought to have been, and as the Creator intended it should be: So that the Intellect yielding and submitting to Matter, and thereby plunging itself into sensuality, Sin followed thereupon. And this is what the History denotes, when it says that the Serpent deceived the Woman, bidding her eat of the forbidden Tree, that she might know Good and Evil: because as soon as they should eat of it, their Eyes would be opened, and they should be as Gods, knowing Good and Evil. Which the Woman seeing, and that the Tree was good to eat, and fine and delectable to the Eye, and a Tree to be desired to make her wife; she eat of the Fruit, and made her Husband eat with her; at which time their Eyes were opened, and they knew they were naked, and they sewed Fig-Leaves together, and made themselves Aprons. The Serpent is the carnal Appetite, which first stimulates and deceives the corporeal feminine Part, when it finds it in any manner separated from the Intellect it's Husband, and resisting his strict Laws, that it may sink into carnal Delights, and blind itself by the Acquisition of superfluous Riches, (which is the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, for the two Reasons mentioned above) shewing her, that thereby their Eyes will be opened, that is to say, that they shall know many such things as the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil discovers to them, and which they did not know before: To wit, several Tricks and Contrivances belonging to lasciviousness and avarice, which before they did not trouble themselves about: telling her also, that they should be like the Gods in this; that is in fertile Generation: for as God is an intelligent Being, and the Heavens are productive causes of Creatures inferior to them, in like manner, Man by continual carnal Meditations would at length beget a numerous progeny. In which case the corporeal feminine Part not only refused to be governed as it ought to be by it's intellectual Husband, but drew him into the sink of corporeal Things, eating the forbidden Fruit with him: and immediately their Eyes were opened: not the intellectual Eyes, for these were rather closed by it, but those of the corporeal fancy towards carnal and lascivious Acts: and then they knew they were naked: that is, they know the disobedience of the carnal Acts to the Intellect: for which cause they covered their genital Parts, as shameful and rebellious to Reason and Wisdom.

Two things may be censured in this Doctrine of Leo the Hebrew. The first is that he says plainly enough, Eve's first Sin was an Act of Incontinence; from whence it follows, that the Fruit of the Tree she made her Husband eat, was nothing else but her enticing him to enjoy her. In the second place, this

(69) Ibid. pag. 623.

Author

there was a masculine Part as well as a feminine. This Writer's Explications are very improper to account for the Divine Providence, in relation to the Fall of Adam, not being far from their Opinion, who think that the first Sin was an Act of lascivious Love. See the Remark [I]. In thus condemning these unbelieving Doctors, we must not spare a Wit of the Church of Rome, a Frenchman by Nation: he made a Sonnet which has been printed, and which, to say no worse of it, is extremely prophane [K]; it would be a vain and frivolous Excuse to plead the Privileges of Poetry. The just liberty of Poets does not extend so far; and in how many Cafes would their Maxims against Morality and Religion be lawfully condemned according to the juridical Forms of the Inquisition? See the Remark [I] of the Article Garaffe. Another Wit, an Italian, a noble Venetian; in a word, the celebrated Loredano: This Wit, I say, deserves to be censured for not consulting the Honour of Eve in point of Decency; for he supposes that after she had been driven out of Paradise with her Husband, she exhorted him to perform his conjugal Duty to her, in obedience to the command of God, to increase and multiply (r). The Decorum required, that Adam should be supposed to demand this. (r) See Remark [I]. There are some other things to be blamed in Loredano [L]. A German Author has been infinitely Author attributes to God a Conduct utterly unworthy of the Sovereign Perfection. He supposes that the Union of the two Sexes, in the first Man, was a State of Immortality and intellectual Life which excluded the unhappy power of sinning, and that nevertheless God soon abolished this State, to remedy two Inconveniences, viz. that Man should too much neglect his Body, and should abstain from the carnal Acts from whence Generations result. God foreseeing these Disorders separated what he had joined before. Had it not been better, may one say to this false Doctor, to have formed the two Sexes apart, than first to unite, and presently after to divide them? Should he finish a Work, and immediately be obliged by the defects of it to undo all again? and if God foresaw the two Consequences of the Conjunction, did he not also foresee the Consequences of the disunion? did he not foresee that the two Sexes, by becoming subject to Sensuality, would be hurried into Intemperance thro' the influence of Pleasure? and were not these inconveniences worse than the two others, and required at least as much to be remedied? methinks this Conduct is something like that of those Judges, who being unwilling formally to set a Prisoner at liberty, nor yet willing to keep him in Prison, indulge him with the benefit of a laxior custodia, or privately order the Jaylor to furnish him with an opportunity to make his escape. The feminine Part during it's Conjunction with the masculine was under good a Guard that it could not deviate from it's Duty; but it was separated from it, and thereby put into a Condition to use and abuse it's Liberty. What should we think of a Physician who should employ Incisions and Burnings (the Ure, Sera) to cure those who are not much addicted to sensual Pleasures, and neglect those who are so addicted; who should expel a contempt of Wine, and leave drunkenness alone (70)? We must therefore reject the Hypothesis of this Jewish Author as abominable.

[K] A Wit made a prophane Sonnet. It is easy to see I mean Sarrafin's famous Sonnet, Quand Adam vit cette jeune beauté. When Adam saw that young Beauty. The Conclusion of it is not only too satirical against the fair Sex, but is loose and prophane even to impiety.

*Cber CHARLEVAL, alors en vérité,
Je croy qu'il fut une femme fidelle;
Mais comme qu'on ne l'aurait-elle est,
Elle n'avait qu'un seul homme avec elle.
Or en cela nous nous trompons tous deux,
Car, bien qu'Adam fût jeune & vigoureux,
Bien fait de corps & d'esprit agréable,
Elle aimait mieux, pour s'en faire conter,
Presser l'oreille aux fleurettes du Diable,
Que d'être femme & ne pas coqueter* (71).

(71) Sarrafin,
Poésies, pag. 61,
Edit. Paris,
1658, in 12mo.

'That is, Dear Charleval, then indeed I believe there was one faithful Wife; for how could she help it, when there was but one Man with her: and yet we are here mistaken; for tho' Adam was young, jolly, vigorous, and agreeable, rather than be a Woman and no Coquet, she would listen to the amorous Tales of the Devil.' One would think that

VOL. II.

Sarrafin wrote this in a furious fit of Jealousy, when he had just had an account that his Mistress had been civil to some Sparks that admired her; for this is one of the Caprices of Love. A Man is never more disposed to rail against the fair Sex in general, than when he knows, the Person who loves him and whom he loves hearkens willingly to the Courtship of others, that she consents to familiar Conversation, and is very merry when he is absent, &c. He would have the Woman, that has an amorous Intrigue with him, look down with contempt upon every Body else, and scornfully reject all their Civilities, and become to them ill humoured, rude, cruel, and uncoquable; and when he sees the clean contrary, as it often happens, he grows peevish, and enraged, with so little reason, that all the fair Sex must suffer for it. He inveighs against all Women, charges them with being essentially Coquets, and if at that time he should be writing a Treatise of Logic, when he comes to the Chapter of Universals, he would assign Coquetry for the proprium quarto modo of the female Sex, for that propriety quæ convenit omni, soli, & semper sub-jecto, & cum eo recipitur. If he were not in Love he would be far from this Injustice, and would see nothing to be condemned in the pleasure they take in being flattered and wheedled, and in their civil and obliging way of answering a Compliment. Nay he is not thus unreasonable when he is deeply in Love, and his Mistress is a Coquet to no Body but himself. Therefore it is Jealousy that makes him exclaim and rave, not only against his unfaithful or pretended unfaithful Mistress, but against all Women in general, as if Coquetry was inseparable from them. Can any thing be more fantastical and blind, than the Caprice of these jealous Lovers? they cannot endure that their Mistresses should express the least Tenderness even for their own Husbands. Thus one of them complains.

*Je penserois n'être pas malheureux,
Si la beauté dont je suis amoureux
Pouvoit enfin se tenir satisfaite,
De mille amans avec un favori:
Mais j'enrage que la coquette
Aime encor jusqu'à son mari* (72).

(72) Bossi Robustino, Histoire amoureuse des Gaules.

'That is, I should not be unhappy if the Beauty I admire would be content with a thousand Lovers and one Favourite, but I am mad to think she is Coquet enough to love even her very Husband.'

[L] There are some other things to be blamed in Loredano. I consider here only his work of the Life of Adam: it is a Book that has been translated out of Italian into French: this Translation, made from the eighth Edition printed at Venice by Falscasse (73), was published at Paris in 1695, and reprinted soon after at the French Amsterdam. In the Mercur Galant for the Month of December of the same Year, there is a very good Criticism upon this Treatise (74). Mr Bajnage de Beauval has also made a fine Criticism upon it in the Month of March 1696 (75). One cannot give too bad a Character of such a Book, nor forgive the Author the liberty he has taken to mix so many romantic inventions with such a Subject, Inventions so void of Gravity, and much fitter for a comic History. Let us consider only some of his Thoughts concerning

(73) Preface to the Remark [A] of the Article LERIUS.

(74) See the Remark [A] of the Article LERIUS.

(75) Art. iv. following.

10 H

infinitely more favourable to this first of all Women; he thinks Adam's Sin was greater than that of Eve, and that God did not drive her out of Paradise; but that Adam only underwent that Punishment. We shall see what Grounds he goes upon [M].

(76) Loredano, Vic d' Adam, pag. 37, 38. Edit. Amst. 1696.

(77) That is when Eve was made.

(78) Loredano, ubi supra, pag. 41.

(79) Ibid. pag. 42.

(80) Ibid. pag. 44.

(81) Ibid. pag. 45.

(82) Ibid. pag. 47.

(83) Ibid. pag.

(84) Ibid. pag. 50.

(85) Ibid. pag. 51.

(86) Ibid. pag. 53.

(87) Ibid. pag. 71.

(88) Ibid. pag. 77.

(89) Ibid. pag. 109.

(90) Ibid. pag. 110.

concerning Eve. The Author affirms (76) that 'It was the effect of God's goodness towards Adam, to let him sleep at that time (77), well knowing that in a little while he would lose his rest in his Wife's Company . . . Adam being endowed with a prophetic Spirit, continues he, could foresee the Evils which the Birth of Eve would cause to all Mankind, so that perhaps God excited his sleep, lest he should oppose the Creation of his Wife . . . does it not look as if God by creating only one Woman for Adam, intimated to Men that they ought to be content with one Marriage? but perhaps he did it for another reason, that he might not multiply his Sufferings by giving him many Wives, there being commonly nothing more capable of exercising a Man's Patience, and disturbing his Rest, than the cares of Matrimony (78). He supposes (79) that Eve was so beautiful that Adam was upon the point of adoring her as a Deity (80). No Romance has a more passionate Declaration of Love than that which Adam makes here (81). The Author finds no better incident to prevent the Consequences of that Eagerneſs, with which the first Man expressed the tenderneſs of his Heart, than to feign that God himself appeared and interrupted their Conversation (82). Adam warned his Wife not to touch the fatal Fruit which would bring Death into the World (83). 'This Prohibition awakened the Curiosity of Eve; for it is enough to forbid a Woman any thing to excite her Curiosity. The Prohibition stimulates and inflames her Desires which are commonly eager for lawful things, but insatiable for what is forbidden. Thus, urged on by that Impatience, which digged the Grave of their Happiness, she leaves Adam to enjoy, without Witness, or Reproach, a sight of the Fruit which she esteemed the most exquisite of all, because forbidden (84). He accompanies this with a piece of Morality, to teach Women always to keep under the eye of their Husbands. 'The farther a Woman goes from her Husband, the nearer she approaches to ruin: Such danger is she in of being lost, when she is divided from him, because she gives every body both opportunity and boldness to attempt her. A Woman being alone is exposed to Temptation even from a Serpent. The Moon is eclipsed when she is too near the Sun, but a Woman on the contrary suffers fatal Eclipses in her Chastity when she is at a distance from her Husband (85). I pass over the Compliments which the Author supposes the Serpent in the shape of a young Virgin made to Eve; but we may observe, he pretends she framed a Lye in her answer (86); and that she had recourse to Sighs, Tears, Careſſes, and passionate Kisses (87), to prevail with Adam to eat the Apple she offered him. Could you guess at the employment Loredano assigns to Almighty God? 'In the mean time, says he (88), God took a walk in the Garden, to enjoy the western Breezes, when towards evening they blow somewhat fresher. This Action of the Divine Majesty did sufficiently denote the uneasiness which the Sin of Man gave him; since to moderate the heat of his just anger, he seemed to beg the assistance of those Winds which are always temperate.' A Pagan Poet would not be excusable to have said such a thing as this of Jupiter: but let us leave this, since we have promised to mention only what concerns Adam's Wife.

The Author supposes (89) that she endeavoured to alleviate the miseries of her Husband, who from time to time sought for some Consolation in the Arms of his Wife, and that she reminded him of God's command to multiply, and advised him to take great care not to transgress that Commandment. 'Let us endeavour, said she to him (90), to recover, by a numerous Posterity, what we have lost. A weak and slight Consolation this for such great Calamities, but yet necessary, since God has so ordered it. Let us take care of disobeying a second time; our disobedience would be without Excuse; it would discourage the divine Mercy, and we should be forever the Objects of his too just Indignation. Let us follow the Heavenly Will, in procuring the Propagation of Mankind. This is the way to vanquish Death, which is one day to triumph over our Bodies, since we shall live, in spite of him, in our Children, Grand-Children, and in the Memory of our Posterity. I do not say that therefore we should dry up entirely our Tears: no, my Sorrow for having offended my God shall have no end but with my Life, and my Heart, which is to quit it the last, shall live no longer than my Grief: but we ought to take care that we do not by a new Offence provoke that God, who has treated us so favourably, which would be equally impious, and dangerous to us. Adam answered her, smiling, I shall not for the future fear that your Company should be fatal to me since you persuade me to nothing but what is good. . . . It is just to give some Relaxation to our Woes, to relieve a little our Senses depressed with the weight of our Afflictions, and to people the World in obedience to our God; where upon, following his Words with Careſſes, he abandoned his Soul to Pleasure, and for some time lost, in the Arms of his Wife, the remembrance of the fatal Cause of his Grief.' If after Abel's Death, his Father and Mother tied themselves down to Continence, it was Adam who with an Oath first bound himself, and without consulting his Wife (91). This is imitating the Romances, wherein the Heroines made the first Steps (92); but he had better have conformed to the modern Romances, and the temper of the Jewish Nation, who required a very great modesty on the Woman's side in demanding the conjugal Duty; for if any one asked it so loud that the Neighbours could hear their Conversation upon such a Subject, she might be divorced for it (93).

[M] We shall see what Grounds he goes upon.] So far is he from supposing, as Loredano does, that Eve was excited by the Prohibition to covet the forbidden Fruit; that, on the contrary, he says (94), the Serpent tempted her before she thought of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil. He adds, I. that she suffered herself to be persuaded that she had not well understood her Husband's Intention, or that her Husband had been deceived by some false Report. II. That believing it was not true that God had given such a Prohibition, she eat of the Fruit, and that her fault consisted in taking her Resolution too hastily in an affair of such Consequence, without consulting her Husband. III. That having sinned through ignorance (95), tho' not through an invincible ignorance, she committed a less grievous Crime than Adam; whose Sin was voluntary, and against his Conscience. IV. That Eve did not necessarily incur the Punishment of eternal Death; for the Decree of God only signified that Man should die if he sinned against his Conscience, ſi ſciens prudensque peccaſſet (96). V. That tho' God might without injustice have inflicted Death on Eve, yet he resolved, so great is his Compassion towards his Creatures, to let her live, seeing she had not sinned maliciously. VI. That being exempted from the Punishment included in the divine Decree, she might retain all the Privileges of her former Condition (97), except those which were not consistent with the Infirmities to which God condemned her. VII. That particularly she retained the Privilege of bringing forth Children who had a right to the celestial Blessedness, upon Condition of obeying the new Adam. VIII. That as all Mankind were to proceed from Adam and Eve, Adam was preserved alive for no other Reason but because his Preservation was necessary for the Generation of Children. IX. That therefore it was by accident, that the decree of Death was not executed upon him (98); but otherwise he was more severely punished than his Wife. X. That she was not expelled Paradise as he was, but was only obliged to go out of it to find Adam in cases of necessity, and then with full Privilege of returning again. XI. That Adam and Eve's Children were subject to eternal Death, not as proceeding from Eve but from Adam (100). This is what directly concerns Eve in that Book: those who would see the Proofs and Design of this Author, and the Consequences he draws from these new Thoughts, will do well to have recourse to this Book.

(91) Ibid. pag. 141.

(92) See Remark [C] of the Article LONGUS.

(93) Eodem Maim. c. 24, §. 12. & Ammud Golah, seu Liber preceptorum parvum, ubi in glossa additur: si fuerit exigens debitum conjugale a marito suo uxore clara, ita ut ejus vicina audire poterint eam loquentem de re ista. Pelygam. Triumphatrix, pag. 56, col. 1.

(94) See the Book intitled Cogitationes novae de primo & secundo Adamo examini Eruitorum compendiose propoſitae, printed at Amsterdam, apud Eleutherium Alſpiciam, anno Domini 1700, in 8vo, at the 26th Page.

(95) Ibid. pag. 10, 12.

(96) Ibid. pag. 15.

(97) Ibid. pag. 16.

(98) Ib. pag. 18.

(99) Ibid. pag. 19, 20.

(100) Ibid. pag. 23. See also pag. 60, 65, 140, & seq.

It cannot be objected against him, as against Lo-redano, that he has not preserved a decorum in supposing that Eve went to seek her Husband; for it was by pure necessity, since it was impossible for Adam to re-enter the terrestrial Paradise: and besides it is very probable, that if this Writer was asked; did Adam's Wife make use of her Privilege of remaining in the Garden of Eden? He would have answered, no. What should she have done there alone? she would soon have been tired of it: The most charming Landships, the most delicious Gardens, are not agreeable to a Woman who finds no manner of Company or Society there. Solitude in the finest place upon Earth is burdensome, unless a Man be a Philosopher, or of a contemplative meditating Temper. Therefore it is to be believed, that Eve, as well out of her own personal Interest, as because Reason required it, would prefer the Cottage of her exiled Husband to an abode in the Terrestrial Paradise. Wherever Adam pitched his Tent, was to her as the Garden of Eden (101). There it was her Duty to settle that she might be an assistance to him according to the end of her Creation, and might share with him the Cares of her Family. See the Margin (102).

(101) Apply to this what is said of Comillus. Tarpeia feda perusta Gallorum fœcibus, Velosque habuit tinte Camillo, Illic Roma fuit. When Gallus Flames the burning City set, At Vesuvius Rome with her Camillus danc'd. Lucan. Pharsal. lib. v. ver. 27.

(102) Note, the Author supposes, that Adam lived very near the Terrestrial Paradise, and that by God's Command.

EUGENIUS IV, created Pope on the third of March 1431, was of a Plebeian Family of Venice (a), and Son to Angelo Condelmerio, but not the Nephew of Pope Gregory XII [A], as is said in Moreri. He took the Celestine Habit when he was brought to Rome by the Nephew of that Pope (b). This Nephew was also a Celestine Monk, and Canon of the Congregation of St George in Alga. The brother Monk, he brought to Rome, soon insinuated himself into the Favour of Gregory XII, who made him his Treasurer, and then Bishop of Sienna, and at last Cardinal. Martin V gave him the Legateship of the Picentine, and afterwards that of Bologna. That Cardinal discharged his Office with great Ability, and succeeded Martin V (c). I shall not enlarge upon the Detail of his Actions, which may be seen in Moreri; but shall content myself with relating certain Things he has omitted, which highly deserved a Place in his Dictionary. Eugenius began his Pontificate with an Action which was attended with ill Consequences. He gave Ear to some Informers, who reported that Martin V governed by an insatiable Avarice, had amassed vast Treasures. According to the Advice of these People he caused Oddo Poccio, Vice-Chamberlain to Martin, to be seized; but he commanded Stephen Colonna, General of his Troops, to bring him without Noise, and without exposing him to any Disgrace. This Order was not executed. Oddo's House was plundered by the Soldiers, and himself dragged, like a Thief, to the Pope's Palace, in the fight of the whole City. Eugenius was very much concerned at this, and by his Threats compelled Stephen Colonna to retire to the Prince of Palestrina, whom he persuaded to expel the Pope; assuring him that unless he did so, the whole Family of Colonna was in danger of being ruined. The Prince giving credit to this Information, and pitying Martin V's Friends, who had been severely used, resolved to make himself Master of Rome. He seized the Appian Gate, and advanced as far as St Mark's Church, committing no violence nor meeting with any Resistance: but here he was forced to encounter Eugenius's Soldiers, supported by a good Party of the Inhabitants. After a sharp Engagement, in which a great many Lives were lost on both Sides, the Prince of Palestrina was forced to retire. But afterwards he committed all kinds of Hostilities. The Pope did the same upon the Colonna's and their Adherents. He fell Sick, either being poisoned, or for grief on account of so perplexing a War. Wherefore he thought of nothing but Peace, which being concluded by the Negotiation of Angelotto Fosco, a Roman Citizen (d), he recovered his Health (e). This happened a little before the Journey of the Emperor Sigismund into Italy. The Pope concluded a Treaty with him, received him magnificently at Rome, and crowned him there (f). Some time after he was exposed to a terrible Misfortune, which was a perfect Revolution [B]. The Romans took Arms, and

(d) Ex eodem, Platina, ibid.

(e) Naucerus, Generat. xlviii, folio, m. 934.

(f) In the Year 1433.

[A] He was not the Nephew of Pope Gregory XII. Mr de la Rochezay in his Nomenclator Cardinalium (1), Spondanus in his Annals of the Church (2), and an infinite number of other Writers assure us that Eugenius IV was the Son of Gregory the twelfth's Sister. I believe they are mistaken: my reason is that neither Platina, nor Volaterranus, give him that Quality, and they could not have been ignorant of it, if it had been true; and Platina's Silence is attended with such Circumstances that it amounts to a positive Proof. That Author relates that Antony Corario, Gregory the Twelfth's Nephew, brought to Rome Gabriel Condelmerio of the same religious Order with himself (3), and with whom he had lived familiarly from his Youth: Roman iturus Gabriel Condelmerium, that is, the same Eugenius IV, qui ejusmodi professionis erat, quicum ab ineunte ætate familiariter vixerat secum aliquandiu recusantem duxit (4). Is it possible for any Author with these Circumstances not to say, that such a one is the Nephew of such a one? and observe that Platina, mingling together the Preferments of these two Men, always gives Antony Corario the Title of the Pope's Nephew, without ever giving it the other. Some unattentive heedless Reader may have been deceived by this, without distinguishing what concerns Corario, from what relates to Condelmerio, and may have taken the latter for the Nephew of Gregory XII, after which Historians have copied one another without informing themselves more fully of the Matter.

[B] He was exposed to a terrible Misfortune, which was a perfect Revolution. Philip Duke of Milan, being incensed against the Pope, made an Irruption into the Territory of Rome. His Cavalry in this Expedition was commanded by Nicholas Fortebraccio, a famous Warriour, and who had quitted the Pope's Service in great discontent; for, having demanded his Salary, Eugenius told him he ought to think himself sufficiently paid by the Plunder he had got at several places. Enraged at this answer, he fought for a new Master, and being employed by Duke Philip against the Pope, he committed terrible Ravages near Rome. The City was under the greatest Consternation; the Pope himself for some time was uncertain where to go. The People came in Crowds to him, complaining of the losses they sustained: and as he was in an ill State of Health, and knew not which way to turn himself, he referred the People to the Cardinal his Nephew, and Chamberlain, an indolent and voluptuous Man, who gave no other answer to those that told him they had lost their Cattle, than this: You confided too much in your Cattle, the Venetians live much more agreeably without all that (5). They were so enraged at this answer, that they immediately began to cry out to Arms and Liberty. They deposed all the Magistrates of Eugenius's making, and

(5) Eos nimiam spem in pecoribus collocasse: Venetis quidem sine gregibus & jumentis longe urbaniorum vitam ducere. Platina, in Vita Eugenii IV, folio 310.

(a) Platina, in Vita Eugenii IV.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Ex eodem, ibid.

(1) Pag. 73.

(2) Ad. ann. 1408, n. 63, & ad ann. 1431, n. 4.

(3) That is a Celestine.

(4) Platina, in Eugenio IV, fol. 307.

he had much ado to escape their fury by flight; but not being able to maintain themselves in the State of Liberty this Revolution put them into, they were severely chastized. Eugenius died the twenty second of February 1447, being sixty four Years of Age (g). His Pontificate continued sixteen Years wanting a few Days, and was a true Series of War; for without reckoning the Ecclesiastical Contests, which were very violent between this Pope and the Council of Basil, he was embroiled in all the Wars of Italy. He persuaded the King of Hungary to take Arms against the Turks, and provoked the Dauphin to make War with the Swiss (b). He was the more accountable for the fatal Consequences of the first of these two Wars, for having sent a Cardinal Legate into Hungary, to induce the King to violate a Treaty solemnly concluded with the Port (i). The Reflexion he made upon his Destiny is remarkable [C], and a proof of the Vanity that is found in the highest Dignities by those that are possessed of them. It must not be forgot that, to make it appear, he was not wholly addicted to warlike Employments, he affected to perform in Person, and with great Splendor, some religious Ceremonies, and to procure the Embellishment and Reformation of certain Churches in Rome [D]. He was a handsome Man, of a venerable Aspect, and always looked downwards when he appeared in public (k). He drank no Wine, and was frugal as to his own Person, though there was a great deal of magnificence in his House (l). He was not learned, but a lover and encourager of learned Men [E]. In his Reign the Cardinals began to keep packs of Dogs and Stables; abandoning themselves to Luxury in their Furniture and Entertainments [F].

(g) Platina, in Vita Eugenii IV. Volaterr. lib. xxii, pag. m. 845, gives him but 63 Years.

(b) Platina, ibid.

(i) See Letter lxxxi of Aeneas Silvius.

(k) See Letter lxxxi of Aeneas Silvius.

(l) See Letter lxxxi of Aeneas Silvius.

(i) Vir aspectu insignis & veneratione dignus. Platina, in Vita Eugenii IV. Vultu aliqui decore, ac venerabili, oculos in publico nunquam attollebat, ut à parente meo qui eum sequebatur accipit. Volaterr. lib. xxii, pag. 845.

(l) Splendidus in victu familie, parvus in suo, & à vino ita alienus ut abstemius merito vocaretur. Platina, in Vita Eugenii IV.

put others in their Places, and seized the Cardinal his Nephew. The Pope seeing himself reduced to such Extremities disguised himself in the Habit of a Monk, and went on Board a Bark to make his escape to Ofia. Where he had the happiness to arrive notwithstanding the Stones and Darts thrown at him. Afterwards he retired to Florence (6). Some Writers say (7) he was committed to Prison in St Mary's Church beyond the Tyber; but that, deceiving his Guards, he got into a Fisher-boat, and went down the River to Ofia, being pursued and pelted with Arrows by the Romans. Volaterran (8) adds that the latter made themselves Masters of the Capitol and the Castle of St Angelo. I fancy he goes too far; for Platina, who is followed in this by a great number of Authors, assures us that the Castle of St Angelo was not taken. However that be, the Liberty of Rome was of no long Duration: the Pope's Authority was re-established in his absence by John Vitelleschi, Patriarch of Alexandria, who most severely punished the Mutineers. This Revolution happened in the Month of June 1434. It is so remarkable, and so many Authors have mentioned it (9), that I wonder Moreri has omitted it. He might have had it from Spondanus's Annals (10). Ambrose de Camaldoli makes mention of it in his Hodeporicon, and when the Abbot de la Roque made an Extract of that Work, he did not forget this Passage (11).

[C] The Reflexion he made upon his Destiny is remarkable. Being at the point of Death, he turned towards the Monks who surrounded the Bed, and with a Voice broken with Sighs declared that it had been much better for the Salvation of his Soul, if he had never been Cardinal or Pope. 'Hic (Eugenius) cum effect morti proximis, apud Raynaldum anno M.CCCCXLVII aliquid dixisse memorie proditur, quod nisi poenitentiam ostendat, certè mihi terrorem injicit: Verba sunt: Cumque à religiosis viris cinctus esset, interpancia suspiriis voce, versoque ad eos vultu dixisse fertur: O Gabriel, quando magis conduxisset animæ tuæ salutem, ut nunquam Cardinalatum, nec Pontificatum obtinuisset, sed in tuo monasterio religiosam disciplinam coluisses! Hæc ex vitæ Eugenii auctore, qui tunc claruit, & à Raynaldo laudatur (12). — This Eugenius, being at the point of Death, is reported by Raynaldus, in the Year 1447, to have used an Expression, which, if it did not denote his Penitence, does certainly strike me with Terror. Being surrounded with a religious Attendance, with a Voice broken with Sighs, and his Countenance directed to the Company, he is said to have spoke thus: O Gabriel, how much better had it been for thy Soul's safety, hadst thou never been promoted to the Dignity of Cardinal or Pope, but continued a religious Discipline in thy Monastery. This is quoted from the Author of Eugenius's Life, who lived at that time, and is cited by Raynaldus.

[D] He affected to perform in Person, and with great Splendor, some religious Ceremonies, and to procure the Embellishment . . . of some Churches in Rome.]

This appeared when Nicholas of Tolentino was canonized, and when St Silvester's Mitre was carried from Avignon to Rome. Read the following Words of Platina, in which you will also find that he expelled the Secular Canons from St John of Lateran, and established Regular Canons in their stead. 'Interea vero Eugenius ne rem bellicam solum curare videretur Nicolaum Tollerantem Ordinis sancti Augustini miraculis clarum in Sanctos referens: à sancto Petro cum omni clero supplicando ad sanctum Augustinum profectus solennia ipse celebrat astante populo Romano Cardinaliumque omnium cœtu: præterea vero pulsus omnino è sancto Joanne Laterano canonicis secularibus admittisque tantummodo regularibus: & porticum illam extruxit quæ ab ecclesia ad sancta sanctorum: & claustrum ubi sacerdotes habitant restituit: auxit & picturam templi à Martino antea inchoatam. Præterea vero sancti Sylvestri mitteram Romam Avenione delatam ipsemet è Vaticano ad Lateranum detulit magna cum veneratione & litania sacerdotum omnium populi que Romani (13). — In the mean time Eugenius, that he might not seem to have his Thoughts solely bent on War, canonized Nicholas the Tolentine of the Order of St Austin, a Man eminent for Miracles; and attended by all the Clergy, went from St Peter's to St Austin's, where, all the People and the whole Conclave standing by, he performed the Ceremony. He expelled moreover all the Secular Canons from St John of Lateran, admitting only Regulars; he built the Piazza from the Church to the Sancta Sanctorum; and repaired the Cloister where the Priests reside. He finished the Painting of the Church, begun before by Martin. He moreover with his own Hands carried, from the Vatican to the Lateran, the Mitre of St Silvester removed from Avignon to Rome, with extraordinary Solemnity, all the Clergy and People of Rome attending the Procession.'

[E] He was not learned, but he was a lover of learned Men.] According to Platina he spoke with more Gravity than Eloquence; he had but little Erudition, he understood History well (14). was liberal to all Men, but especially to learned Men. He took Pleasure in their Conversation; for he had for his Secretaries Leonard Aretin, Charles Aretin, Poggio, Arispa, Blondus, and George Trapezuntius. They make him the Author of several Books: but the Catalogue they give of them (15) contains so many writings that were composed by the Secretaries, that the same Judgment ought to be formed of all the rest. The Remark I have already made against Ghilini (16) will also serve for this Place.

[F] It was under his reign that the Cardinals began to be luxurious in their Entertainments. And it is observable that the Cardinal who began this Innovation had been a Physician. Read Volaterran's Words: 'Ludovicum Patriarcham Aquileiensem, cum exercitu Florentinis auxilio misit (Eugenius IV) qui tunc ad Anglare oppidum à Picinino duce copiarum Philippi vicecomitis oppugnabatur: ex quo victo-

(13) Platina, in Vita Eugenii IV. fol. 320, verso.

(14) Gravis in dicendo potius quam eloquens, modice literaturæ: multæ cognitionis historicæ præsertim. Id. ibid. folio 321.

(15) See the Nomenclator Cardinalium, pag. 74, and the Bibliotheca Pontificia of Father Jacob, pag. 65, and following.

(16) Is the Article CHARLES V, Rom. [C].

(12) Launolus, Epist. Ultima, Part I, pag. 82, Edit. Cantabrig.

(9) Blondus, St Antonin, Platina, Volaterran, Nauclerus.

(10) Ad. ann. 1434. n. 4.

(11) See the Journal des Savans, March 2, 1682, pag. 79, Dutch Edit.

(6) Ex Platina, in Eugenio IV, fol. 310.

(7) Volaterr. lib. xxii, pag. 814.

(8) Ibid.

(17) Volaterr.
Lib. XXII,
pag. 815.

* ria potiti sunt. Hic Ludovicus patria Paduanus:
* arte medicus, ob sua merita pugnae, in senatum
* ascitus, tantos sibi spiritus adsumperat, immemor
* generis, ut primus sit ausus cardinalium, canes e-
* quoque alere: convivorum, lautitiaeque, ac supel-
* lectilis plus quam illi ordini par erat, splendorem
* introducere (17). — Eugenius the IV sent Louis
* Patriarch of Aquila, with an Army to assist the Flo-
* rentines who were besieged at Anglars, by Picinin

* General of Philip's Forces, from whom they * gained the Victory. This Louis, Paduan by Birth, * and a Physician by Profession, being raised to the * Dignity of a Senator for his military Services, for-
* got his Extration, and became so elate with Pride, * that he was the first of the Cardinals who took the * Freedom to keep Hounds and Horſe, and introduce
* the Grandeur of Entertainments, and Equipage, more * than became that Order.

EUPHRATUS, a Disciple of Plato, arrived to so high a degree of Favour with Perdiccas, King of Macedonia, that he governed as much as the Prince himself. He was a wicked Man, and an Informer, and caused all those to be excluded from the Table of Perdiccas who did not understand Geometry or Philosophy [A]. Parmenio put him to death in the Reign of Philip, Successor to Perdiccas (a).

(a) Taken from Athenaeus, lib. ix,
sub finem, pag.
508.

[A] Excluding from the Table of Perdiccas, all those who did not understand Geometry or Philosophy. A Court, which like that of Macedonia at that time was just beginning to emerge from Ignorance, no doubt looked upon such a condition as a kind of Tyranny: for if the Professors, who put over the Doors of their Schools, Οὐδὲν ἀγνοῦντας εἰσῆναι, Let none enter that is ignorant of Geometry, required very hard Preliminaries; what must the Courtiers of Perdiccus think, when they saw that their Admission to their Prince's Table depended upon such a Law? If only a little acquaintance with the Poets, or History, had been required, they might have fulfilled the Condition; but Euphratus insisted upon being a Geometrician or Philosopher: now these are two Characters, and especially the first, which very few have a relish for, even among those who cultivate the Sciences.

EURYDICE, Wife of Amyntas, King of Macedonia, was the Mother of four Children, viz. three Sons, Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip, the Father of Alexander the Great, and a Daughter named Euryone. She was a most detestable Princess, for she fell so desperately in Love with her Son-in-law, that, in order to marry him, she engaged to set him upon the Throne, and murder her Husband [A]. This horrible Conspiracy would have taken effect, if Euryone had not informed the King of Eurydice's Adulteries and pernicious Designs. The King, tho' convinced of his Wife's Crime, did not punish her, pardoning her for the sake of the Children he had had by her. After his Death his Son Alexander succeeded him, but did not live long; for Eurydice, mad with Lust and Ambition, got him murdered. Perdiccas, her second Son, who ascended the Throne, after Alexander's Death, underwent the same fate (a). The Historians, that are extant, tell us no more of her; they do not inform us what became of her, or whether she was punished for her wicked Actions. Nay there are some Historians, who without saying any thing of her, either good or bad, ascribe to other Causes the Death of the two Princes who reigned successively after Amyntas. This is somewhat strange [B]. I shall relate one particular which is to be found in the Orations of Aeschines [C],

(a) Taken from Justin, lib. vii,
cap. iv, & v.

[A] She fell so desperately in love with her Son-in-Law, that, to marry him, she engaged to set him upon the Throne and murder her Husband. These are the Words of Justin who acquaints us with this horrible Wickedness. * Infidus Eurydice uxoris, quae nuptias generi pacta, occidendum virum, regnumque adultero tradendum susceperat, occupatus fuisset (Amyntas) ni filia pelliculatum matris & sceleris confilia prodidisset (1). — He had infallibly fallen a Sacrifice to the Treachery of his Wife Eurydice, who, having entered into a Contract of marriage with her Son-in-Law, had engaged to murder her Husband, and put the Kingdom into the Adulterer's Hands, had not her Daughter discovered the infamous Intrigues and Designs of the Mother.

(1) Justin, lib.
vii. cap. iv.

[B] This is somewhat strange. The Justin we have is an Abridgment of a general History, written more at large by Trogus Pompeius. No doubt Eurydice's Actions were to be found more particularly in that History, than they now appear in Justin; but above all, there is no question that Trogus Pompeius had read in very good Authors what he relates of her. Whence comes it then that Diodorus Siculus makes no mention of this Queen? how comes he to say that Alexander, Amyntas's eldest Son and Successor (2), was killed by Ptolemy Alorites his Brother (3), and that three Years after (4) the same Ptolemy was served in like manner by Perdiccas (5)? had not he read the same Authors that Trogus Pompeius had consulted? if he had not read them, we may justly complain of his Negligence, and if he had read them we may affirm that he ought not to have suppressed the story of Eurydice. In vain would he pretend it was without Foundation; for we might answer that at

(2) Diodorus Siculus, lib. xvi, cap. li, pag. m. 739.

(3) Idem, lib. xv, cap. lxxi, pag. m. 712, ad ann. 1, Olymp. ciii.

(4) Idem, lib. id.

(5) Idem, lib. xvi, cap. ii.

least he should have said that she was unjustly charged with causing her Sons to be put to Death. To allege that he knew she was guilty, but spared her by his Silence, is very improbable; for what reason could he have to spare a Queen who had been dead, and her Posterity extinct, so long since.

[C] I shall relate one particular, which is to be found in the Orations of Aeschines. [If we knew nothing of Eurydice but from this Passage, we should have a great Esteem for her Memory. We read in this Orator, that this Queen, after the Death of her Son Alexander, found a very perplexing Affair upon her Hands. Pausanias, who was under Banishment, took hold of this Conjecture, and having some Greek Troops at his Command, and many Friends in Macedonia, he resolved to usurp the Crown. Eurydice saw him very soon Master of some Places, and found there was little dependance upon her Friends. Her Subjects were divided, and a very great number inclined to Pausanias. In this sad Extremity she had recourse to Iphicrates the Athenian General, who was near Amphipolis, and putting her Son Perdiccas into his Arms, and Philip her Son upon his Knees, she reminded him that he was their Brother by Adoption, and that there had always been a strict Friendship between the late King Amyntas, and the Republic of Athens; intreating him, that for these reasons he would be pleased to protect her and them, and preserve the Kingdom for them. Iphicrates was so moved with these Supplications, that he drove out Pausanias (6). It would be well for Eurydice, if we had no other account of her; but when Justin's Narrations are called to mind, one is not inclined to commend her for what she did to Iphicrates. The

(6) Taken from Aeschines' Oration
de falsa Legatione, p. m. 200. See also Cornelius Nepos, in Vita Iphicratis, cap. llii.

VOL. II.

10 I

most

and criticize something in the Jesuit Bisselius [D]. We may observe that Arabeus, Prince of the Lyncistæ, descended from the Bacchiades, was Grandfather by the Mother's side to our Eurydice (b).

most ambitious Mother in the World, and the most capable of sacrificing the Lives of her Children to her Ambition, would have done upon such an occasion all that was done by Eurydice; for she was under the worst of Apprehensions from Pausanias.

[D] I shall criticize something in the Jesuit Bisselius.] He openly declares, that Diodorus Siculus acts dishonestly in saying nothing of Eurydice's Parricides: This is the sense of these Words, Diodorus

(7) Joannes Bisselius, Illustrum Romanum, Decade IV, pag. m. 1118.

(8) Idem, ibid. pag. 1287.

perpetuus Eurydice's parricidiorum dissimulatur (7). I do not object to him, that it cannot be imagined upon what Principle that Historian should have used Dissimulation: contenting my self with saying that he ought to stick close to his first Censure, that he ought to abide by it, that he ought not to refute it by loose and indeterminate Expressions: 'Qui Diodorus, says he, in another Place' (8), incertum qua causa studiove, de scelere ac parricidio Eurydice's alium flet. — It is uncertain 'for what reason, or with what design, Diodorus is 'so supinely silent with respect to the Crimes and 'Parricides of Eurydice.' He adds one thing which deserves still more to be censured. 'Et è contrario, in Perdicam verbis claris culpam detorquet necati 'hujus Ptolemæi, quin & necis Alexandri prædecessoris: quando sic loquitur, simili fraude sublatas est 'à Perdicæ Ptolemæus, qua fraude scilicet Alexan- der quem paulo superius dixerat, dolo interemptum: nec addit, ab Eurydice. — And on the contrary, 'lays the charge of Ptolemy's Murder expressly upon Perdiccas, as likewise that of his Predecessor Alexander; speaking thus; Ptolemy was taken off by Perdiccas, and by the same sort of Treachery, as had been practised towards Alexander, whom he had before mentioned to have been treacherously murdered; but had not said by Eurydice.' He is mistaken: Diodorus does not at all pretend to charge Perdiccas with the Treason by which Alexander was cut off: He imputes it only to Ptolemy Alerites, as is very evident by the Passage in the fifteenth Book (9). If Father Bisselius had known of that Passage in Diodorus, he would not have spoken as he has done; he would have known that That Author intended only to say (10), that Perdiccas deprived Ptolemy Alerites of his Life, by such a piece of Treachery as Ptolemy himself had practised to put Alexander to Death. By which it appears how necessary it is to know what an Author says in different Places. Besides, what does Bisselius mean (11) by citing Gutberlet, an Author of yesterday, to prove that the Reign of that Alexander continued but one Year, and that of Ptolemy Alerites three Years? should he not have proved these things by Diodorus Siculus (12)?

(9) Diod. Sicul. lib. xv, cap. lxxi.

(10) In Book xvi, chap. ii.

(11) Bisselius, ubi supra, pag. 1287.

(12) Diod. Sicul. lib. xv, cap. lx, lxxi.

EURYDICE, Daughter of Amyntas, the Son of that Perdiccas, King of Macedonia, who was Brother to Philip, the Father of Alexander the Great, married her Uncle (a) Arideus, Natural Son to the same Philip. Every body knows that this Arideus was declared King of Macedonia after Alexander's death (b). He was not a very fit Person to support that Dignity, and especially in such a troublesome time as that of his Reign. So that he may rather be called a titular than a real King. Eurydice, his Wife, had a greater share than himself in the regal Functions (c), especially when she was obliged to oppose Olympias, the Mother of Alexander; for then she was more jealous of her Authority, than if her Competitor had been of the other Sex (d). She put a great Confidence in Cassander, and ordered Antigonus and Polyperchon to resign the command of the Army to him; for which Reason he executed whatever she enjoined (e). She had the misfortune to be abandoned by her Soldiers when she would have hindered Olympias from returning into Macedonia (f). Upon this Desertion Arideus immediately fell into the hands of Olympias (g): Eurydice, his Wife, escaped to Amphipolis, where she also lost her liberty not long after [A]. Olympias shut them both up in a Dungeon, and treated them most inhumanly, and, perceiving that her Cruelty made the Athenians murmur, she put Arideus to Death by the hands of certain Thracians, six Years and a half after Alexander's Death. This Rigour was not able to bridle Eurydice's Tongue; wherefore Olympias, enraged at her Prisoner's incessant boasting, that the Crown belonged to her, would not suffer her to live any longer. She sent her a Sword, a Halter, and a Cup of Hemlock Juice, and gave her liberty to chuse which she pleased of these three kinds of Deaths. Eurydice, without a Tear, or losing any thing of her Firmness and Courage, and even before the Messenger returned, took her Girdle and strangled herself, begging of the Gods that the like Presents might be sent to Olympias (h). After Olympias's Death, Cassander made a Royal Funeral for Arideus, and Eurydice (i).

(a) Cyna, Philip's Daughter, was Eurydice's Mother. See the Prolegomena of Freinthemius upon Quintus Curtius, chap. iv.

(b) Quintus Curtius, lib. x, cap. vii. Justin. lib. xiii, cap. iii.

(c) See Justin, lib. xiv, cap. v.

(d) See Justin, ibid.

(e) Quo beneficio devinctus Cassander, nihil non ex arbitrio muliebri audacie gerit. — Cassander, in return to these extraordinary Favours, readily executes the Designs of an ambitious Woman. Id. ibid.

(f) Justin. lib. xvi, cap. v.

(g) Diod. Sicul. lib. xix, cap. xii.

(h) Taken from Diodor. Siculus, ibid.

(i) Idem. lib. xix, cap. liii.

[A] She lost her Liberty not long after.] It is said in the Supplement to Moreri that she was made Prisoner in a Battle. That is not true. I say nothing of other Omissions, and want of exactness: the Reader will observe them by comparing the two Articles together. But I say, the Father of our Eurydice was not Amyntas III (1). It is uncertain whether he was ever King, and if he was not, he ought not to have distinguished him by a numerical Epithet: if he was, he ought to have said Amyntas IV. The reason of this uncertainty is, that Justin (2) observes that Per- diccas left a Son under Age, of whom Philip was Guardian for some time. I will not tell my Readers that if, on the one hand, Women, generally speaking, are much more tender than Men; it is true, on the other, that those of them who are cruel and ambitious exceed Men in those two Vices. Optimi corruptio pessima. When Luxury is the reigning Vice, it is much worse; for then they spare neither the Lives of their Husbands nor Children. We have an instance of this in the other Eurydice (3).

(1) That of the preceding Article.

(1) Thus he is reckoned in the Supplement to Moreri.

(2) Justin. lib. vii, cap. v.

(a) Plutarch. de Libera educatione, in fin. pag. 24.

(b) It contains four Greek Verbs.

EURYDICE, an Illyrian Lady; Plutarch praises her, and recommends her for a Pattern, because, though she was of a barbarous Country, and advanced in Years, yet she applied herself to Study, that she might be capable of instructing her Children (a). She consecrated an Inscription to the Muses, which confirms this Account (b), and which is preserved in Plutarch (c). By this we are informed, that there was a City in Illyria, named Hierapolis (d), not mentioned by Geographers. One of Plutarch's Commentators

(c) Plutarch. ubi supra.

(d) See the Remark.

Commentators has committed some Mistakes [A].

[A] One of Plutarch's Commentators has committed some mistakes. His Name was Westphalus; he was Rector of the College at Hamburg. His Book, printed at Hamburg in 1665, is intitled, Plutarchi Chæronensis de puerorum educatione Libellus analysi logica, grammatica, ethica, politica, & historica illustratus. In which we find (1) that our Eurydice was a Queen, and a little after (2) that she was the Wife of Orpheus. These two Titles are not consistent with one another (3); and besides, the Wife of Orpheus had no need of teaching her Children herself; for their Father, who was a Man of Learning, would have discharged that Office. If he had died before her, my Remark would be an ill one; but it is well known she died young before her Husband (4). The Commentator (5) affirms, without any proof, that she was born in Illyria. What does he mean by observing that Hierapolis, a City of Asia, was situated over against Laodicea? Does Plutarch mean That Hierapolis in these Words, Εὐρυδικὴ Ἱεραπολῖτις, Eurydice Hierapolitana? Is it not an Illyrian Woman who speaks? he ought to have endeavoured to discover this City of the Illyrians, or at least he ought to have said that the Geographers knew nothing of it.

(4) Virgil. Geor. lib. iv, ver. 453, calls her puella.

(5) Pag. 403.

EURIPIDES, a Greek Poet, one of those who excelled in Tragedy, was born the first Year of the LXXXvth Olympiad, in the Island of Salamis, whither his Father and Mother retired [A], a little before Xerxes invaded Attica. There is a Dispute about their Quality [B]; some make them Noble, others Plebeian. A certain Oracle, misunderstood, occasioned Euripides to be brought up, like those whom the Greeks destined for Wrestlers [C]; but the Event shewed, that he was fitter for other things:

(1) In Greek Θῆβαις, a sort of Division in Athens.

(2) Spon, Voilage de Grece, Tom. II, pag. m. 478.

(3) Mr Spon, ibid. pag. 477, observes, that Stobæus and other Authors place Phlya under the Cecropian Tribe: as for himself he puts it under the Ptolemaid, upon the Authority of a Marble, and of Hesychius.

(4) Le Fevre, vis des Poëtes Grecs, pag. m. 27.

(5) Suidas, in Eurypidēs, & Manuel Moschopolus, in vita Euripidis.

(6) Id. ibid. Hesychius Illustratus, in Εὐρυπιδῆς, & Thom. Magister, in vita Euripidis.

(7) Joſua Barnesius, in vita Euripidis. Edit. Cantabrigiæ 1604, præfixa, n. 3.

(8) Lib. ii.

(9) In vita Euripidis, pag. 24.

(10) Stobæus, in Sermone xxi vij, folio 243, apud Barnesium, ibid. pag. 4.

(11) Τὸν Εὐρυπιδῆν τὴν τῆς λαχωνοειδῆς τριάδος. Ad Euripide filio eleum venditricis. Aristoph. in Theophrastus, pag. m. 722.

Ἀργία γὰρ ἡμᾶς, ὡς γυναικὶς δὲ καὶ ἀνδρῶν. Ἀτ' ἐν ἀγροίοις λαχωνοὶς αὐτῶν παραφύει. Ἀγροστὶς enim nos, ὁ mulieres, affert malis, utpote inter agrestia olera ipse enutritus. Id. ibid. pag. 776. Aul. Gell. lib. xv, cap. xx, quæstio thesi Perf.

[A] He was born in the Isle of Salamis, whither his Father and Mother retired. The Father of Euripides was named Mnesarchus. He was an Athenian, of the Oenoide Tribe, and of the Borough, or People, (1) called Phyle. This I find in the Life of Euripides, composed by the learned Mr Barnes, and placed at the Head of his excellent Edition of that Poet. But other learned Men (2) assure us, that Phlya of the Ptolemaid Tribe (3), was the Birth-place of Euripides. I should rather say it was the Birth-place of Mnesarchus the Father of Euripides, and expressly assign the Isle of Salamis for the Country of this Poet. Mr Le Fevre had done better to have expressed himself so than to say, that the place of his Birth was called Phlya, a Borough of Attica (4). I know that Clito, Euripides's Mother, was accidentally delivered of him at Salamis, having fled thither with many other Athenians, when it was thought proper to abandon the City of Athens at the time of Xerxes's Invasion. I know also that this is a good reason to affirm that Euripides is an Athenian, and of the same Country as his Father. But after all we are willing to know where great Men are born, and therefore it is not enough to tell us the Country of their Fathers, upon such Occasions as these where the Children are born during the Flight or Journey of their Mothers. Clito was big with Euripides when she left Athens, together with her Husband, to fly to Salamis (5): she was delivered the very day that the Greeks defeated the Fleet of the Persian King near that Island (6), and it is pretended that because that Victory was obtained near Euripides, the Child, Clito brought into the World, was called Euripides (7). This Etymology does not agree with Suidas, who makes mention of two Euripides different from this, and older than ours. They were both Tragic Poets, and the one was Nephew to the other. Add to this, that there is mention made of an Athenian Captain named Xenophon the Son of Euripides, in the second Year of the Peloponnesian War. Thucydides, who speaks of him (8), would probably have added, that this was Euripides the Poet, if it had been so. His silence makes me believe Mr Barnes (9) is in the wrong to suppose that this Xenophon was the Son of our Euripides.

[B] There is a dispute about their quality. Some say that Mnesarchus, the Father of Euripides, was a Boeotian, who in all probability had suffered in his own Country the Punishment of Bankrupts (10). They used in some parts of Boeotia to carry Persons who did not pay their debts into an open place: where they were commanded to lie down, and throw a Bushel. This was a mark of Infamy. As to Clito, the Wife of Mnesarchus, they pretend she was an Herb-Woman, for which they depend not only upon the authority of a Comic Poet, a Slanderer by Profession, but also upon that of an Historian. The Comic Poet is Aristophanes (11): the Historian's Name may be seen in these words of the twentieth Chapter of the fifteenth Book of Aulus Gellius. 'Euripidi Poëtæ matrem Theopompus agrestia olera vendentem victum quæsisse dicit. — Theopompus says, that the Mother of Euripides the Poet got her living by selling Greens.' Add to this the Testimony of Valerius Maximus:

'Quam matrem Euripides, aut quem patrem Demosthenes habuerit, ipsorum quoque seculo ignotum fuit: alterius autem matrem olera, alterius patrem cultelæ venditasse, omnium pene doctorem literæ loquuntur (12). — The Mother of Euripides, and the Father of Demosthenes, were unknown even in their own Ages; but the greatest part of Authors agree that the former sold Herbs, and the latter Knives.' Suidas says nothing particularly concerning the Birth of Mnesarchus; but he says it is not true that Euripides's Mother sold Herbs: she was, says he, very noble as is proved by Philcorus. Οὐκ ἀλλήδεις δὲ ὡς λαχωνοποιῶν ἢ ἡ μήτηρ αὐτῆς. καὶ γὰρ τῶν σφόδρα εὐγενῶν ἐν τῷ γένει ὡς ἀποδείκνυσσι Φιλόχορος. He confesses that Mnesarchus and his Wife fled into Boeotia, and afterwards dwelt in Attica. This gives rather an ill than a good Impression, confirming in some manner what is said by Stobæus. Note, that Aristophanes, to give the greater Edge to his satirical strokes, supposes that Euripides's Mother sold nothing but bad Herbs. 'Hæc est (scandix) quam Aristophanes Euripidi Poëtæ objicit joculariter, matrem ejus ne olus quidem legitimum venditasse sed scandicem (13). — This is the Scandix about which Aristophanes jeers Euripides the Poet, as if his Mother had not sold good Greens, but (Scandix) wild Chervils.' Father Hardouin's Notes inform, us in what place Aristophanes has made this jest, and also what the Scholiast observes, with other Particulars. He cites the fourth Scene of the second Act of the Comedy Acharnenses, p. 394. He might also have quoted the same Poet in Equitibus, Act. I, Sc. I, pag. 289; and in Cerealiis, p. 786, G, and p. 790, F. Mr Drelincourt gave me this Information.

[C] An Oracle misunderstood occasioned Euripides to be brought up like those whom the Greeks destined for Wrestlers. If it was true, as Mr Barnes pretends, that the Oracle of Apollo was consulted upon the Fate of Euripides, while Clito was big with him, it would be probable that she was not an Herb-Woman; for the Husband of such a Woman would hardly think fit to trouble Apollo about the Fortune of a Child unborn. 'Quum adhuc Clito mater illum in utero gereret, consulenti de eo oraculum patri hoc responsum dedit Apollo (14). — Whilst his Mother Clito was still with Child of him, his Father consulted the Oracle of Apollo, and received this Answer.' I do not affirm the fame of a Child of six or seven Years of Age: he might give such particular marks of a great Genius, or great Courage, that his Father, of what Condition soever, might be impatient to know what would become of so hopeful a Child. So, that whilst we are ignorant of the time the Oracle concerning our Euripides was delivered, we are able to come to no Conclusion in favour of his Nobility, nor contradict those who make him the Son of an Herb-Woman. Now it is certain that we know nothing concerning the time of it: the Author (15) quoted by Mr Barnes does not say a word of it, he only says that the Oracle returned this answer:

(12) Valer. Maximus, lib. iii, cap. iv.

(13) Plin. lib. xxii, cap. xxii, p. m. 203, 204.

(14) Barnes in vita Euripidis, n. 3. We shall see below, that Aulus Gellius says the Chaldeans made this Prediction after the Birth of Euripides.

(15) Oenomaus, apud Eusebium de Præpar. Evangel. lib. vi, cap. xxxiii, pag. m. 227.

*Esa

(a) Suidas in Eὐριπίδῃ; Manuel Moichopoulos, in Vita Euripidis.
See also Aulus Gellius, lib. xv,
cap. xx.

things: He learnt Rhetoric under Prodicus, Moral Philosophy under Socrates [D], and Physics under Anaxagoras; and when he saw the Persecutions that Anaxagoras suffered for having dogmatized against the popular Opinions, he abandoned Philosophy, and applied himself to Dramatic Poetry (a); he was then eighteen Years of Age (b): but we must not imagine that he neglected, for the rest of his Life, the Study of Moral and

(b) Aul. Gellius,
ubi supra.

Ἔσται σοὶ κύριος Μνησάρχιδης, ὃν τινα πάντες Ἀνδραποὶ τίσουσιν, καὶ ἐς κλέος ἐσθλὸν ὀρίσει, καὶ σεβίων ἱερῶν γλυκερὴν χάδιν ἀμφιβα-λέϊται.

Te, Mnesarche, manet summo cumulandus honore
Filius, ac meritis summa ad fastigia laudis
Conscendens, lætas sacro ex certamine palmas Auferet.

To thee, Mnesarchus, Fate a Son shall raise, Whom Greece shall honour, whom the World shall praise,
And whose victorious Brow the sacred Crown shall grace.

He might have criticized this Oracle much better than he has done: and I wonder since it was his Business to prove the Deity of Apollo an Imposition, that he should take no notice of the lie contained in these three Greek Verses. He must be guilty of great chicanery that denies the Oracle promises here the Crowns that are obtained at the Olympic, Pythian, and other Games. Now we never read that Euripides (16) gained any of those sorts of Crowns: for the very first time he offered himself to contend for them, he was refused (17). It will perhaps be said that Euripides gained Crowns in poetical Combats. I answer, he won but very few, and that if his Glory be estimated that way, it would be very small (18), and that, after all, dramatic Triumphs ought not to have been promised in such a manner. Therefore Apollo may justly be said to be mistaken. Nor was it enough to say, he only gave the Epithet of sacred to Crowns that did not deserve that Title (19). So that when I affirm in the Text of this Remark, that the Oracle was misunderstood, I do not pretend to deny that they assigned the most obvious sense of the Terms; but I say they mistook in not apprehending aright the ill expressed intention of him who had spoke. Wherefore Mnesarchus was not to blame in promising himself that his Son would become a great Wrestler; but Apollo was to blame to foretell it. However, Mnesarchus educated his Son with that view. We shall cite an Author who ascribes that promise only to Fortune-Tellers, Astrologers, in a word, to Chaldeans. 'Patri autem ejus (Euripidis) nato illo' responsum est à Chaldeis, eum puerum, quum adolevisset, victorem in certaminibus fore. Id ei puero fatum esse. Pater interpretatus athletam debere esse, roborato exercitatioque filii sui corpore, Olympiam certaturum eum inter athletas pueros deduxit. Ac primo quidem in certamen per ambiguum ætatem receptus non est. Post Eleusinio & Theseo certamine pugnavit, & coronatus est. Mox, à corporis cura ad excolendi animi studium transgressus, auditor fuit physici Anaxagoræ & *Prodic*i rhetoris, in morali autem philosophia Socratis, tragediam scribere natus annos duodevinti adortus est (20). — After the Birth of Euripides, his Father was answered by the Chaldeans that the Boy, when he was grown up, should be a Victor in the Games. That such was his Fate. His Father imagining that hereby was meant that his Son should be a Champion, having strengthened and exercised his Body, took him to Olympia to contend amongst the young Practitioners. He was at first refused, because they questioned his Age. Afterwards he was admitted a Combatant in the Games of Thebes, and those of Ceres, and was crowned. Passing afterwards from the Care of his Body, to the Improvement of his Genius, he frequented Anaxagoras the Natural Philosopher, Prodicus the Rhetorician, and Socrates the Moralist. He set himself to write Tragedy at eighteen.

[D] He learned Moral Philosophy under Socrates.] I have quoted my Authors for it: but I must observe here that it is very probable they are mistaken; for Soc- rates was younger than Euripides by almost thirteen Years. This difference of Age might permit the youngest of these two great Men, when he came to Years of Maturity, to contract an intimate Friendship with the other, and receive benefit by his learned Conversation: but this is not what is called going through a Course of Moral Philosophy under a Professor, being his Scholar, his Disciple. I easily believe, with Mr Barnes, that Socrates profited very much by the Conversation of Euripides: 'Haud bene temporum rationes considerant, says he (21), qui Socratem Euripidis in Moralibus magistrum affirmant, ipso nempe discipulo duodecim fere annis juniorum. Videtur potius ex Euripide multa hausisse, quem & apud Platonem haud raro laudare deprehenditur. — They have not, says he, well weighed the Circumstances of Time, who have made Socrates Master in Ethics to Euripides, almost twelve Years younger than his Scholar. He seems rather to have borrowed many things from Euripides. Of whom he often makes honourable mention, and that in Plato.' I would not question the Truth of what is said in Diogenes Laërtius (22), that Socrates assisted Euripides in writing his Tragedies; and this being granted, I should not be surprized that Socrates should hardly ever see a Play, but when a Piece of Euripides was to be acted. 'Ὁ δὲ Σωκράτης σπάνιον μὲν ἐπιποῖτα τοῖς θεαταῖς εἶπότε δὲ Εὐριπίδης ὁ τῆς τραγῳδίας ποιητὴς ἠγωνίζετο καὶ οἰοῖτο τραγῳδοῖς, τότε γὰρ ἀρκεῖτο. καὶ Πιερίοι δὲ ἀγωνίζοντο τῷ Εὐριπίδῃ καὶ ἐκὶ κατὰ. ἔχαιρε γὰρ τῷ ἀνδρὶ, δηλοῦντι διὰ τὴν σοφίαν αὐτῆς, καὶ τὴν ἐν τοῖς μετέσιν ἀρετὴν. Socrates vero raro veniebat in theatra, nisi quando Euripides Tragicæ Poëta cum novis tragædis certaret: tum enim accedere solebat. Et tunc quoque, quum Euripides in Piræo contenderat, eò descendebat. Nam amabat hominem, tum propter sapientiam, tum propter carminum virtutem & bonitatem (23). — Socrates seldom appeared at the Theatre, unless when Euripides the Tragic Poet contended with the new Tragedians, at which times he usually attended; and when Euripides had the contest in the Pyram, he was also present, having a peculiar esteem for the Man, in regard both to his Wisdom, and the excellence of his Compositions. Nor should I wonder at this, though I were persuaded the Philosopher had no hand in the Productions of the Poet; for the Tragedies of Euripides were so full of fine Morality, that they were infinitely pleasing to Socrates. Euripides was called the dramatic Philosopher, σκηνικός φιλόσοφος (24). ὁ ἐπὶ τῆς σκηνῆς φιλόσοφος (25). For the rest, Father Schottus would falsely prove, from Diogenes Laërtius, that Euripides chose Socrates for his Master after the Condemnation of Anaxagoras. 'Anaxagora præceptore capitis damnato ad Socratem se in Academiam contulit non intelligendi modo, sed & dicendi magistrum ea tempestate optimum. Ita enim Laërtius Diogenes (26). — His Preceptor Anaxagoras being condemned to die, he entered himself in the Academy of Socrates, the most eminent Master at that time, not only of Reason, but likewise of Oratory; for so says Diogenes Laërtius. I shall not copy the long Passage Father Schottus has tacked to these words. I only say that the Passage from Laërtius affirms no more than this, that it was believed Socrates helped Euripides to compose his Tragedies, and that after the Condemnation of Anaxagoras he became the Disciple of Archelaus. The great Error of that Jesuit is his applying to Euripides what Laërtius had said of Socrates; for it must be understood of Socrates, that after the Condemnation of Anaxagoras he went to hear Archelaus. This Error of Andreas Schottus is complicated with several others. He did not know that Euripides, upon seeing the Danger of Anaxagoras, quitted Philosophy, and followed the Stage, not Socrates the Philosopher. He did not know that Euripides was at that time but eighteen Years of Age: judge, if Socrates, who was much younger than Euripides, could be the

(21) Barnes in Vita Euripidis,
n. 13, sub fin.

(22) Lib. ii, in Socrate, init.

(23) Ælian Va.
Hist. lib. ii,
cap. xiii.

(24) Origenes
contra Celsum,
lib. iv, pag. 214.
See the next Remark.

(25) Clem. Alex.
Stromat. lib. vi,
pag. 571, c.

(26) Schott.
Notion Cleophr.
nisiore lib. ii,
cap. xv.

(16) See Barnes,
in Vita Euripidis,
pag. 10.

(17) See, below,
Aulus Gellius,
Citat. (20).
However, he says that Euripides,
after such Refusal, disputed the Prize, and won it in less famous Combats.

(18) See the Remark [I].

(19) Oenomaus makes his Criticism turn upon ebat, apud Eufebium, Præparat.
Evangel. lib. v,
cap. xxxiii, pag.
228.

(20) Aul. Gell.
lib. xv, cap. xx.

and Natural Philosophy: his Works are a Proof of the contrary [E]. He wrote a great number of Tragedies, which were highly esteemed, both in his Life-time, and after his Death, and there are some very good Judges, who look upon him as the most accomplished of all the Tragic Poets [F]. It is a probable Conjecture, that the reason of his not being mentioned by the Roman Poets, is because the Syllables of most learned Professor at that time. It is not he, but Plato, who taught in the Academy. Clement Alexandrinus (27) and Eusebius (28) have erred, with many others, in supposing that Euripides had been the Disciple of Socrates.

[E] His Works testify the contrary. They are full of moral Aphorisms, as has been observed in the preceding Remark. They also contain many Tenets of Natural Philosophy. See Diodorus Siculus (29), who twice recites the Opinions of this Poet in things relating to Natural Philosophy. But nothing is a better proof of the Inclination of Euripides to this Science, than the pains he took to know the Opinions of Heraclitus. That Philosopher concealed his Writings in the Temple of Diana, believing that one day or other they would take them from thence, and publish them as a mysterious Work; but Euripides prevented the Effects of these Hopes: he went continually to Diana's Temple, and by often reading over what Heraclitus had deposited there, got it by heart, and published it to the World. This Account I have from Tatian; for as to Diogenes Laërtius, he says indeed (30), that our Poet was more curious than Socrates to recover Heraclitus's Works, since it was he that procured Socrates's reading of them; but he says nothing of this diligent Attendance at the Temple of Diana. Tatian's Words are (31): Οὐτ' ἂν ἐπαίνεσαι καὶ ἀκρὺ-φάνη τὴν ποίησιν ἐν τῇ τῆς Ἀρχαίου νοῦ, μυστηρίου δὲ ὅπως ὑπερὸν ἢ τῶντος ἐκδοῖς γινώσκει. καὶ γὰρ οἱ μελὸν ἐπὶ περὶ τῶν, φασὶν Εὐριπίδην τὴν τραγῳδοποιὴν καλίστην, καὶ ἀναγινώσκοντα διὰ μνήμης κατ' ὅλην τὴν Ἡρακλείτου σκέτος σπουδαίως παραδεδωκέναι. Neque hoc in eo laudaverim quod carmina sua in fano Dianæ occultavit (32), ut olim veluti per mysterium ederentur. Nam quibus ista curæ sunt Euripidem Poëtam tragicum ædem Dianæ frequentasse, & paulatim tenebras istas Heracliti relegendo memoriæ prius infixisse produnt. — Nor can I approve his concealing his Works in the Temple of Diana, that they might be afterwards published as a Mystery. For they, to whose Care these things are entrusted, give out, that Euripides, the Tragic Poet, went frequently thither, and by reading over these bidden Remains of Heraclitus, by degrees imprinted them perfectly on his Memory. I add what has been observed by many (33), that Euripides often makes it appear by his Tragedies, that he followed the Opinions of his Master Anaxagoras. I said before that he was called the Philosopher of the Stage: the fame is confirmed by Origen, Clement Alexandrinus (34), and Eusebius (35). Vitruvius, whom I ought to have quoted before them, positively affirms it. 'Euripides auditor Anaxagoræ quem Philosophum Athenienses scenicum appellaverunt (36). — Euripides, whom the Athenians named the Stage Philosopher, was Scholar to Anaxagoras. I do not believe, though Mr Menage assures us of it (37), that Attenæus and Diodorus Siculus also testify the same.

[F] Good Judges . . . look upon him as the most accomplished of all the Tragic Poets. I have said elsewhere (38), that there is a Division among the Critics concerning the Pre-eminence of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides. Each of these Poets has their Adherents, who give him the first Place: and there are also some good Judges who will determine nothing concerning it. Quintilian seems to be of this Party: and yet it is easy to see that, all things considered, he gives the Preference to Euripides. These are his Words (39): 'Longe clarius (quam Æschylus) illustratur hoc opus Sophocles atque Euripides: quorum in dispari dicendi via uter sit Poëta melior, inter plurimos queritur. Idque ego sanè, quoniam ad præsentem materiam nihil pertinet, in judicatum relinquo. Illud quidem nemo non fateatur necesse est, iis qui se ad agendum comparant, utiliore longe Euripidem fore. Namque is & in sermone (quod ipsum reprehendunt, quibus gravitas & cothurnus & sonus Sophoclis videtur esse sublimior) magis accedit oratorio generi; & sententiis densus; & in iis quæ à sapientibus tradita sunt, penè ipsi par; & in dicendo ac respondendo cuilibet eorum qui fuerunt in foro disertis, comparandus. In affectibus vero cum omnibus mirus, tum in iis qui miseratione constant facile præcipuus. Hunc & admiratus maximè est (ut sæpe testatur) & secutus, quamquam in opere diverso, Menander. — Sophocles and Euripides have by far surpassed Æschylus on this Head, and brought the Art to a much greater degree of Perfection. It is a Question much canvassed, to which of these two, in their different manners, the Preference, in Poetry, is due, and as it has no relation to my present Subject, I shall leave it undecided. But this must be acknowledged by all, that, to Persons designed for the Bar, Euripides would be far more useful. For his Style (which those find fault with, who think the Majesty, the Air, and the Diction, of Sophocles more sublime) is more nearly a-kind to that of an Orator. His Sentences are also thick sown, nor does he fall far short of the Sages themselves, when he handles their Topics. In his Method of arguing and replying he is not inferior to the most eminent Speakers at the Bar. In raising the Passions he is universally admirable, but in that of Compassion inimitable. Menander, as he himself testifies, held him in the highest esteem, and copied him, though in a different Work.' Mr Barnes has collected (40) several Encomiums which the most learned Men of Antiquity have bestowed upon Euripides. Consult him and you will find, that if this Poet did not equal Sophocles in Majesty and Grandeur, yet he has made amends for that by so many other Perfections, that he may justly aspire to the first Rank. We shall see presently, that this is confirmed by a Oracle. The Partizans of Sophocles glory in the Judgment of Lucian: they say he weighed in a Balance the Verses of Sophocles and those of Euripides, and found the former heavier than the latter, and consequently more excellent, as true Gold is more weighty than counterfeit. 'Lucianus Sophista qui auctor re Laëtantio nec Diis nec hominibus pepercit unquam in librili suspendit carmina tragicorum Poëtarum, Sophoclis scilicet & Euripidis, comminisciturque Sophoclis versus tanquam plus gravitatis habentes terram petere, Euripidis vero veluti leviores ad cælum tendere, tanquam in tragico scribendi genere Sophocles sit Euripidi præferendus. Nec mirum igitur si Virgilius ait,

Sola Sophocleo tua carmina digna cothurno,

Hoc est gravi & excocto plus habente medullæ quam corticis, gravitatis quam levitatis (41). — Lucian the Sophist, who, according to Laëtantius, never spared either Gods or Men, weighed in a Balance the Verses of two Tragic Poets, namely Sophocles and Euripides, and pretends that those of Sophocles, as being the heavier, descended, whilst those of Euripides, being lighter, mounted; intimating that Sophocles, as a Tragic Writer, ought to be preferred to Euripides: so wonder therefore Virgil should say,

Such Verse as thine a Sophocles would own;

That is having more Solidity than Sap, more Force than Flash. In vain did Mr Barnes seek for this in Lucian (42), and whatever it be, he pretends that Author's Intention was misunderstood. He thinks him more favourable to Euripides than to Sophocles. He believes, that Lucian alludes to what is read in Homer (43) of the Fates of Hector and Achilles being put into a Scale by Jupiter. The Scale of Achilles being predominant mounted towards Heaven, that of Hector sunk towards the Earth. I conjecture, that Lucian has been mistaken for Arifophanes (44). It is Arifophanes (45), who supposes, that Bacchus putting a Verse of Euripides into the Scales against a Verse of Æschylus, always found that of Æschylus to weigh most. Now it is certain, that the Design of Arifophanes in that

10 K

(41) Johann Baptistus Pius, Annotation. postior. cap. xxviii, apud Barnes in vita Euripidis, p. 19. Thomas Stanley, Comment. in Æschyl. folio 701, & Lilius Gyrald. Poet. Hist. Dial. VII, are also cited by Mr Barnes, ibid.

(42) I do not think that Lucian has mentioned that. Mr Drelincourt writes me word that it may be boldly affirmed, that Lucian has said nothing of it.

(43) Ilid 2. ver. 212.

(44) Cælius Rhodiginus lib. xxiv. cap. xi is probably the source of the mistake.

(45) In Ranis, Act. V. Sc. III.

(27) Admonit. ad Gentes, pag. 60, A.

(28) De Præparatione Evangelii. lib. v, cap. xxxii, pag. 227, A.

(29) Lib. I, cap. viii, & xxxviii.

(30) Lib. II, in Socrate, n. 22.

(31) Orat. contra Græcos, pag. 143, B.

(32) Diog. Laërt. speaks of that, lib. 9, n. 6. Mr Menage, ib. observes against Mr Cooper, that Clement Alexandrinus says nothing of it.

(33) See Cassianus, and Menage in Diogen. Laërt. lib. ii, n. 10.

(34) See the foregoing Remark, Citation (25).

(35) Præp. Evangelii. lib. x, cap. ult. p. 504.

(36) Vitruv. lib. viii, in Præfat.

(37) In Diog. Laërt. lib. ii, n. 10.

(38) In the Article ESCHYLUS, Remark [K].

(39) Instit. Orat. lib. x, cap. i, p. m. 468, 469.

of his Name had not the Quantity necessary to agree with Latin Verses [G]. His Verses did a very great Service to the Athenian Soldiers, in the Island of Sicily [H], which is a Proof his Pieces met with prodigious Applause, and yet they very seldom carried the Piece is to shew, that the first Rank among the Tragic Poets is due to Æschylus, and the second to Sophocles. This is what I observe against the Explication of Mr Barnes.

[G] The Syllables of his Name were not fit for Latin Verses. Floridus Sabinus, in his Answer to Beroaldus, who had abused Euripides, among other Observations, makes use of this (46): 'Cumque Virgilius Sophoclem nominavit, hoc nempe versu, Sola Sophocleo tua carmina digna cothurno, non ideo factum reor quod eum Euripidi anteponeere voluerit, sed quia id nomen heroico metro melius conveniret. Cui & simile est Propertianum illud ad Lynceum Poëtam,

Define & Æchyleo componere verba cothurno,

'Non Æschylum scilicet quasi aliis præstantiorem nominavit Propertius, quem & rudem in perliquo & incompositum fuisse scimus, ut cujus Fabulas in certamen correctas deferre posterioribus Poëtis permiserint Athenienses, sed quod ab ejus nomine deductum nomen versu recte clauderetur. An cum Horatius de Romano populo sic inquit:

Serus enim Græcis admovit lumina chartis,
Et post Punica bella quietus quærere cœpit,
Quid Sophocles, quid Thæspis & Æschylus utile ferrent *

'An idcirco Euripidem non nominavit, quod vel Theopip eum vel Æschylo duxerit postponendum? hoc ne ipse quidem Beroaldus per somnium affirmaret. — And though Virgil mentioned Sophocles in this Verse Sola Sophocleo tua, &c. I do not imagine it was done in preference to Euripides, but because the Word was more proper for Heroic Verse. To which that of Propertius to Lynceus the Poet is nearly akin,

In Æschyl's Buskins strive no more to tread.

'Propertius did not mention Æschylus as superior to others; for we know him to have been often rude and incorrect (since the Athenians permitted succeeding Poets to bring his Compositions, when corrected, to the Contest); but because a Derivative from his Name would make up the Measure of the Verse. When Horace speaks thus,

'Till, Caribage ruin'd, she grew soft in Peace,
And then enquir'd what weighty Sophocles,
What Æschylus, what Thæspis taught the Age,
What good, what profit did commend the Stage.

'Could his Reason for not mentioning Euripides be, that he thought him inferior both to Æschylus and Thæspis? This Beroaldus himself, though asleep, would not affirm.' Mr Barnes adopts this Reason: 'Quod autem Virgilius, says he (47), tanto elogio Sophoclem ornet, Euripidem vero ne nominet quidem, id non tam illius judicio tribuendum (nam & sæpe eum imitatus est ut in 4 annotationibus ostendimus) quam legum metricarum necessitati, quandoquidem, ut supra diximus, Euripides apud Latinos, ut & apud Græcos, fit vox minus apta versui Heroico. — Though Virgil bestows so remarkable a Compliment on Sophocles, and does not so much as mention Euripides, this is not so much owing to his own Opinion (for, as I have proved in the Annotations, he has frequently imitated him) as to the Restraint of Metre, since, as I have before observed, Euripides is a Word very improper for Heroic Verse, both in Greek and Latin.' The God of Verse himself, the Delphian Apollo, was forced to submit to the Laws of Quantity. He found no other Expedient than to renounce Hexameter Verse, and answer in Iambics, when he was to name Euripides. So that if he had known only how to make Hexameters, he must have suppressed the definitive Sentence which adjusted the Precedence between three illustrious Persons (48). 'Nec absconum prorsus erit in hac controversia Pythii Apollinis iudicium audire qui Chærephonti Tragico Poëtæ de amico suo Socrate consulenti hoc oraculum traditur dedisse (49): — Nor may it be foreign to this Controversy to mention the Answer which the Pythian God is said to have given to Chærephon the Tragic Poet, when he consulted him concerning his Friend Socrates:

Σοφὸς Σοφοκλῆς, σοφώτερός γ' Εὐριπίδης,
Ἀνδρῶν δ' ἀπάντων Σωκράτης σοφώτατος.

That is to say, Sophocles is wise, Euripides is more so, but the wisest of all Men is Socrates. Giraldus wonders that the Priestess of Delphi should make use of Iambics for this Answer, and not of Hexameters, according to Custom (50). But she was forced to deviate from Custom, since Necessity has no Law: Euripides and Socrates are two Names altogether unfit for Heroic Verse. All the Muses in a Body could never bend them to it. 'Nec mirari debuit Lilius Gyraldus Pythiam Sacerdotem, Iambico jam trimetro respondisse cum heroico solita esset oracula reddere: nomina enim certe Socrates & Euripides heroico versui aptare nec ipse potuit Apollo, nec Musæ ipsæ (51). — Neither ought Giraldus to have been surprized that the Priestess should here answer in Iambics, where as she was wont to answer only in Hexameters; for Socrates and Euripides are Words that neither Apollo nor the Muses could adapt to Heroics.' Now who can say it is of no great Importance to have one Name rather than another (52)? Here is Euripides, who had perhaps a greater share in the Esteem of Virgil, and the rest of the Poets at the Court of Augustus, than Sophocles; he is, I say, deprived of this Advantage because they could not bring his Name into their Hexameters, and on account of this Impossibility they were forced to immortalize, to his Prejudice, those that were judged inferior to him: but the Laws of Verse pleaded in their Favour. This is one of those Conflicts between Rhyme and Reason so well described by Mr Boileau (53). Horace, being to name a little City of Italy, was not able to do it, but was constrained to describe it by certain Characters: the Name of it was Equitatum which could not be brought into an Hexameter.

Quattuor hinc rapimur viginti & millia rhedis
Manfuri oppidulo, quod versu dicere non est,
Signis perfacile est (54).

Hence four and twenty Miles, in four Hours time,
To a small Town whose Name won't stand in Rhime,
But by it's Signs with ease it may be known.

Sometimes it is a Happiness to have a Name not reducible to poetic Laws (55).

[H] His Verses did a signal Service to the Athenian Soldiers in Sicily] The Athenian Army, commanded by Nicias, suffered all the Miseries in Sicily that ill Fortune can inflict. The Conquerors pushed the Advantages they had gained with the utmost Cruelty: but how inhumanly soever they treated the Athenian Soldiers, they were exceeding kind to all those that could repeat some of the Verses of Euripides to them. Many, who, after escaping from the Battle, wandered from place to place, without knowing what to do, found a Resource by singing the Verses of that Poet. They found means to subsist by it, the People furnishing them with Provisions as a Reward for their Songs. Τότε γὰρ παρὶ τῶν σωθέντων οἰκάδ' εὖ συχνὲς ἀσπασσάσαι τὴν Εὐριπίδην φιλοφρόνως, καὶ διηγείσθαι τὸς μὲν, ὅτι δεινότερος ἀρεΐσσαι, ἐκδιδάξαντες ὅσα τῶν ἐκείνου ποιημάτων ἐμνήνητο, τὸς δ' ὅτι πλανώμενοι μετὰ τὴν μάχην, τροφὴς καὶ ὕδατος μέλαθρον τῶν μελῶν ἔσσαντες. Plures autem tunc commemorant, qui solites domum reversi sunt, Euripidem benigne salutavisse, ac prædicasse alios fuisse se manumissos, quod quæ ipsius carmina tenerant memoria, illos ea docuissent, alios palantes

(46) Franc. Floridus Sabinus, Lectionum subelivar. lib. ii, cap. xiii. apud Barnes. in vita Eurip. pag. 17.

† Ita Quintil. Instit. Oratoriæ lib. x. cap. i.

* II Epist. I. ver. 161.

(47) In vita Euripidis, pag. 19.

† Hecub. vers. 593. Orest. vers. 1434. Phœniss. vers. 18, &c.

(48) Barnes. pag. 20.

(49) Suidas, in voce Σοφίας.

(50) Mr Barnes, pag. 20, observes that that Priestess did not always answer in Hexameters: Quinimo fallitur vis docum quod Pythiam potat nonnisi heroicis uti solitam, nam ut cetera tacam extat etiam nam apud Pausaniam Oraculum Delphicum Iambico metro ab ipsa Pythia datum Trisidi Messenias. He puts in the margin, Quare Anton. van Dale hunc errorem errat cum aliis.

I Poët. Hifor. Dialog. VII, folio 271.

(51) Barnes. in vita Eurip. p. 20.

(52) See the Article BALZAC (JOHN LEWIS GUYE DE) Remark [A].

(53) In his Second Satire. Add to it this Exclamation of the Gentlemen of Port Royal, How many have been compelled to lie by rhyme? Act of Thinking, Part III, cap. xix, pag. 356.

(54) Horat. Sat. V, lib. i, ver. 86.

(55) See, before, the end of the Remark [C] of the Article BALZAC.

the Prize [I]. The Emulation, and, at length, Enmity, between him and the great Sophocles [K], created him less Uneasiness, than the Jeers of Aristophanes, who took a Pleasure to abuse him in his Comedies. It is thought the chief reason of his retiring to the Court of Archelaus, King of Macedonia, was to see the Comic Poets divert the Athenians at his Expence (c). There are several parts in his Tragedies against Women, and it cannot be denied he took Delight in ridiculing the fair Sex: for this reason they gave him the Name of Woman Hater (d) [L]. Nevertheless he married

(c) Thomas Magister in ejus Vita.

(d) Μισογύνος mulierum odor.

(56) Plat. in Nicom., sub finem, pag. 542. C.

(57) Id. ibid.

(58) Vies des Poët. Grecs, pag. 96.

(59) Gylippos, General of the Lacedemonians, had beaten the Athenians in Sicily.

(60) Aulus Gellius, lib. xvii, cap. iv.

(61) Menander à Philémone nequaquam pariter in certaminibus comidarum ambitu, gratiaque & facilitas sepe vincerebantur. Menander was several times vanquished in the Poetical Games by Philémone, who was far from being his equal as a Writer, but what he wanted in merit, he supplied by his methods and the favour of a famous Cabal.

(62) Ælian. Var. Histor. lib. ii, cap. viii.

(63) Thom. Magister says it in vita Euripidis.

(64) Isaac Casaubon, in Agellius, instead of five reads fifteen, because, says he, the Greek Writers testify that Euripides did carry off the prize fifteen times. Barnes, pag. 20.

(65) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 604.

(66) In vita Euripidis, pag. 27.

palantes post pugnam fuisse cibo & potu adjutos, quum verus illius canerent (56). — It is said, that those, who returned in Safety, in a grateful manner made their Acknowledgements to Euripides, declaring that they had been set at Liberty for teaching their Conquerors what Verses of that Poet they remembered; and that others, who wandered from place to place, were relieved with Meat and Drink in return for singing his Verses. No doubt it was a great Pleasure to Euripides to see many of these unfortunate Men come to him, gratefully acknowledging that his Verses had saved their Life and Liberty. The Sicilians gave another remarkable Proof of their Esteem for Euripides. A Caunian Vessel, chased by Pirates, endeavoured to make some Port of Sicily, but could not obtain Permission to enter, till it was known there were some Persons on board that could rehearse Verses of Euripides (57). It must not be forgot, that they were asked if they knew any. This single Question implies more than I can express. Let us quote a Passage of Mr le Fevre (58). 'Euripides must be sensibly affected with the Glory of seeing, every day, some of those unhappy Wretches coming to him and returning him thanks as their Deliverer, telling him that his Verses had changed their ill Fortune, and had been of more service to them, than if they had had a Passport signed by the five Ephori, and the two Kings of Lacedemon (59). Euripides was a great and glorious Poet; but what shall we say of the Sicilians of that time? Were they not generous Men? The world is, such an excellent Example as this has had no effect, and at this day such Histories would pass in France and Spain as the Stories of old Greece, which were always called Lies.'

[I] His Pieces seldom carried the Prize.] Of Seventy five Tragedies that he wrote, only five obtained it. Varro says this. 'Euripidem quoque M. Varro ait cum quinque & septuaginta tragedias scripserit in quinque solis vicisti, cum eum saepe vincerent aliqui Poetæ ignavissimi (60). — Varro says also, that of Seventy five Tragedies which Euripides wrote, five only carried off the Prize; he being often vanquished by the most grovelling Pretenders to Poetry.' Those who vanquished Euripides were commonly wretched Poetasters, as Varro observes. This is not to be wondered at; for at that time the Cabal (61), perhaps more than at present, determined the Fate of Plays, and there were no unfair Methods they did not put in practice to gain the Suffrage of the Judges. See the Indignation of Ælian (62) because one Xenocles, a Poet of no Merit, was preferred to Euripides, in a Contest of four Plays against four Plays, at the Celebration of the LXXXth Olympiad. It may be imagined there are two Errors in these Words of Varro; for some Authors say Euripides composed Ninety two Tragedies, and vanquished fifteen times (63). Mr Barnes has given us the Titles of Eighty four Plays of this Author. Thus Varro is convicted of Falshood upon one of these two Articles. As to the other, there are Critics who read quindecim instead of quinque in Aulus Gellius (64): Their Reason is, that by the Testimony of the Greek Authors Euripides gained the Prize fifteen times. This Reason is a weak one, since Suidas and Moschopolus, who are Greeks, mention only five Victories. Their Authority is worth as much as that of Thomas Magister, who reckons up fifteen of them.

[K] There was an Enmity between him and the great Sophocles.] It was next to an Impossibility, that two such excellent Poets, aspiring to the same Glory, should love one another. Athenæus relates some Particulars of their Quarrel, which are no Honour to them (65). If Euripides wrote the Letters which are ascribed to him, he must have lived in a very good Understanding with Sophocles. Mr Barnes (66), who attributes those Letters to Euripides, pretends, those two Poets were a long time at variance, but at last they became good Friends. Sophocles expressed a great Esteem for Euripides when he heard the News of his Death. He ordered a Tragedy to be acted, at which he appeared in Mourning, and made his Actors lay aside their Crowns (67). This is indeed a very equivocal Proof of Friendship or Grief. Two great Men, aspiring to the same Glory, that is, to exclude each other from the Superiority, inwardly esteem one another more than they would, but cannot love each other. Does one of them chance to die? the Survivor shall be the first to offer Incense to him. Then he praises and honours him with Heart and Good-will: he is delivered from the Thorns of Competition, and does Justice with a good Grace to the Merit of the Deceased, because he has the Pleasure not to stand any more in fear of him. Add to this, that he would do himself a great Injury in the Eyes of the Public, if he did not appear concerned at their Loss. This would too much discover his Jealousy.

[L] They affected to give him the Title of Woman-hater.] Suidas and Moschopolus assure us, that it was given him on Account of his austere and indifferent Temper. Ξυδζωπός δὲ τὸ εἶδος ἦν, καὶ ἀμείδης καὶ φεύγων τὰς συνουσίας, ὧν καὶ μισογύνος ἐδοξάσθη (68). Subtristis autem erat & risui minime deditus, nec coitus appetebat, unde & mulierum odor vocabatur. — He was extremely grave and serious, and industriously declined the Pleasures of Gallantry, for which Reasons he was named the Woman-hater. He neither laughed, nor cared for the Pleasures that are enjoyed with the Fair Sex. This is the Cause of that Epithet. If after this he is seen pointing a hundred Common-places in his Tragedies against Women, and taking a Pleasure to discover the ill Qualities of some of them under general Characters, this did but confirm the Title to him; and there is no question but his Stars having engaged him in an unhappy Marriage, that personal and domestic Reason sed his ill Humour, and furnished him with satirical Thoughts. 'Mulieres fere omnes in majorem modum exolus fuisse dicitur, five quod natura abhorret à mulierum cœtu, five quod duas simul uxores habuerat, quum id decreto ab Atheniensibus factum jus esset; quarum matrimonii pertædebat (69). — He is said to have conceived a violent Aversion to most of the Female Sex, either from a natural Antipathy to their Company, or because he had two Wives at the same time (such Practices being allowed by a Decree of the Athenians) and was thoroughly weary of his Consorts.' But otherwise nothing is more false than to maintain, that having quitted his own Country, because of the disorderly Lives of his two Wives, he conceived a general Hatred against the whole Sex, and endeavoured to expose them all for the Faults of some among them. This is confuted without a Reply, by shewing that he did not leave his Country, till a few Years before his Death, and after the Stage of Athens had echoed a hundred and a hundred times with his Invektives against the Women. 'Hac ignominia motus Euripides in Macedoniam se contulisse dicitur, & perperuo in omne genus mulieres odio exarissime, suarum nimirum uxorum adulterarum gratia. Sed pace Grammaticasticorum liceat dicere, quod & probatur sum, aliud huic nomini originem & causam dari. Euripides enim non modo quia tot scelestas mulieres, tot veneficas, tot adulteras, & viricidas & incestas in scenam induxerit, verum etiam quod tot aculeatis omnem illum sexum confoderet sententiis, apud veteres μισογύνος audiebat . . . & plures certe, si non omnes illius Tragediarum, in quibus tantopere mulieres perstringit, actæ erant antequam ad iter in Macedoniam animum applicaret (70). — Euripides, sung with this ignominious Treatment, is said to have withdrawn himself into Macedonia, and from a Resentment of the lewd Practices of his Wives, conceived a perpetual Hatred of the whole Sex: but by the leave of those Would-be-Critics let me say, what I shall

(67) Thom. Magister, ubi supra.

(68) See the Greek Verses quoted by Aulus Gellius, lib. XV, Cap. XX.

(69) Aul. Gell. lib. XV, Cap. XX.

(70) Barnes, pag. 19.

(c) Suidas, in Εὐριπίδης, Manuel Moscopulus, Thomas Magister, in *Vita Eu-
ripidis*.

(f) Φωράσας δὲ
τὸν αὐτῷ ὑποκριτὴν Κυφισο-φῶντα ἐπὶ τῇ γυναικί, καὶ τῇ ἐντεῦθεν μὴ φέρων αἰσχύνην, σκνπτόμενος ὑπὸ τῶν Κομφδοποιῶν ἁφείς τὴν Ἀθήνησιν διατριβὴν εἰς Μαmarried [M], not only before he had experienced at Home the Truth of his theatrical Common-Places, but also after the disorderly Life of his first Wife had forced him to repudiate her: The second he married was at least as leud as the first (e). I know not which of the two it was, he found one Day with one of his own Actors, but probably it was the last, since the Ignominy this exposed him to, and the frequent Raillery of the Comic Poets on this account, made him leave Athens (f). Some say, that making use of the Permission they had at Athens, of having two Wives, he took two together, and made so unlucky a Choice, that they exercised his Patience to the utmost, causing him to conceive an Aversion for the whole Sex (g). However he met with a very good Reception at the Court of Archelaus. That Prince was a lover of learned Men, and, by his Bounty, drew many to him. He raised Euripides to great Honours [N]. The Age of this Poet, and the Chastity which many ascribe to him,

(g.) Aulus Cel-lius. Lib. XV,
Cap. XX.

shall soon prove, namely, that the Origin of this Name was owing to another Cause. For Euripides was not so much distinguished by the Name of Woman-hater, for introducing so many vicious Women, so many Sorceresses, Adulteresses, Murderers of Husbands, and incestuous Characters of that Sex, as for those severe Reflexions wherewith he had so frequently lashed the whole Female Part of the Creation . . . Besides, a great Number, if not all, of his Tragedies, wherein he treats them with so much Severity, were acted before he ever thought of going into Macedonia. It must be remembered, that if Euripides has brought some very wicked Women upon the Stage, he has also brought Heroines upon it, making an honourable mention of the Fair Sex upon many occasions: but this did not efface the Character he had obtained; the Remembrance of an Injury destroying that of a Benefit. Let us observe the same in Latin with Mr Barnes. "Quamquam idem cum res ferret haud

* Ad Troad.
ver. 651, & Me-
nalip. ver. 54.
Protesilaum, ver.
5, &c.

(71) Ibidem.

minus honorificis fœminas tellimonis ornaverit, plurimas Heroínas ob virtutem eximias fabulis suis populo exhibendo, ut ostendimus plus femel in an- notationibus nostris *, manifest tam affixum Poëtæ vocabulum, quia plus mordent pauce offensusculæ, quam multa beneficia (71). Let it be remembered also, that Æriophanes, by seeming to defend the Fair Sex against Euripides, has abused them more than Eur- ipides did. I peak of the Comedy wherein Æriophanes supposes the Women to bring their Action against Eur- ipides. * Fatendum est in TheMopboriazus non tam Euripidem, adversus quem Drama illud institutum putatur, quam totum fœmineum genus hunc Comicum perfingere videri; peculiari sibi cavillandi cha-racterē usum, & quasi genus suo obsecundatum. Dum enim Euripidē à mulieribus condemnatum fingit, quod de iis male esset in suis tragœdiis locutus, multo plus iustus sexus flagitia in unica illa Comœ-dia profert, quam in omnibus suis Tragediis Eur- ipides unquam memoraverit, atque ita Euripidem ac-cusando absolvit, mulieres vero laudando excusando.

(72) Barnes.
pag. 4.

que maxime denigrat (72). — It must be allowed, that, in the Thesmophoriazuse, the Poet does not seem so much to lash Euripides, against whom the Plot of that Piece is thought to be laid, as the whole Female Sex, indulging his peculiar Fondness for finding fault, and forwarded therein by the Strength of his Fancy. For, at the same time that he supposes Euripides was condemned by the Ladies, for speaking disrespectfully of them in his Tragedies, he publishes more Enormities of that Sex in that single Comedy, than Euripides had ever mentioned in all his Tragedies. Thus by arraigning Euripides, he acquits him, and by seeming to declare himself an Advocate for the Women, he blackens their Characters the more. But would you see a Man, who has laid more against the Fair Sex in three Words than ever Euripides had done in fifty Tragedies, consider this Answer of Sophocles. Being asked one day, why the Women he brought upon the Stage were good and honest Women, whereas Euripides introduced none but what were very bad. He answered, Euripides represents them as they really are, and I as they ought to be. *Ἐρ-
tur Sophocles non nihil de hac questione haud minus in feminas aculeatum strinxisse, interrogatus enim quandoquidem Euripidis personæ mulieres malæ essent, cur ipsius ð contra forent bonæ. Αὐτὸς μὲν ἔχον ποιεῖν οἷας δεῖ, Εὐριπίδης δὲ οἷας εἰσιν (73).* Note, that Aristotle relates in general, and without any Dilinction of Sexes, that Sophocles

(72) Ibid. p. 17.

said, I represent Persons such as they ought to be, and Euripides represents them such as they are (74).

[M] Nevertheless be married.] This very Man, who shunned a Female Commerce so much (75), grew tractable betimes, and engaged himself by Contract at the Age of Twenty three Years (76), in order to secure his Chastity. Ut castitati quam unice colebat melius confuleret (77). The Woman he married was named Chærina (78): he had three Sons by her. After he had repudiated her, he married another, whose Name I know not. The Author of the Index to the Athenæus of Delechamp, says, that Euripides lost, in one Day, his Wife, two Sons and a Daughter, and refers to Page 60, where no such thing is to be found; but at Page 61, it appears, that Euripides, going to Icara made an Epigram upon a Disfalter, that happened at the House of a Countryman, where a Woman, two Sons and a Daughter, died by eating Mushrooms. Judge to what a Man is exposed, that depends upon the makers of Indexes. If Athenæus is to be believed, we should have no very good opinion of Euripides's Chastity. He assures us, that this Poet was a great lover of Women (79), and that Sophocles hearing some body say, Euripides hated them furiously, In his Tragedies, replied he, I grant he does, but, in Bed, he loves them passionately. Ἰερώνυμος γὰρ ἐν ἰσορικοῖς τοῦτον ἑστὶ μισθόνος ἐστὶν Εὐριπίδους, ἐν τῇ ταῖς τραγῳδίαις ἐπὶ δὲ Σοφοκλῆς ἐστί, ἐργὴ τῇ κλινῇ φιλοπόνος. Hieronymus in hisloricis Commentariis scribit, cum Sophocli diceret quidam Euripidem feminas averſari, eum respondisse, in tragediis quidem, at in cubili esse illarum amantissimum (80). Stobæus (81) says the same, and borrows it from Serinus's Books. See the Remark [R]. I have cited a Passage of Aulus Gellius, which informs us, that Euripides had two Wives at the same time. It is the twentieth Chapter of the fifteenth Book.

[N] Archeolus raised him to great Honours.] He made him, according to Solinus, first Minister of State. * Hic Archeolus in tantum literarum mire amator fuit, ut Euripidi tragico Consiliorum summam concederet: * cujus suprema non contentus prosequi sumptu ferneris, crines tonsus est, et maciorem quem animo conceperat vultu publicavit (82). — This Archeolus was so passionate an Admirer of Learning, that he be entrusted Euripides, the tragic Poet, with the sole Administration of Affairs, whose Funeral he did not only solemnize in the most magnificent manner, but likewise cut his Hair, and by his dress outwardly declared to the World the concern which he inwardly felt. * Thomas Magister says very near the same, tho' not so expressly. Ab illo (Archeolo) benefissime susceptus est, honoribusque ausus ad summam dignitatem pervenit (83). Can there be a clearer Demonstration of a great Esteem, than what Archeolus did to a Man who had affronted Euripides? the Man's Name was Decamichus: He had offended the Poet, by telling him that he had a stinking Breath. Euripides was not at a loss for a reply: he assigned glorious Cause to this fault of his Breath, viz. the Fidelity with which he had kept the Secrets, that had been entrusted with him. Εὐριπίδης ἀνδιδίχοντος αὐτῷ τίνος, ὅτι τὸ σῶμα δυνάμεθς ἡρ, πολλὰ γὰρ, εἶπεν, αὐτῷ ἀπορρητὰ ἐγκρατεσθαι. Euripides quum oris graveolentia illi à quodam obiectetur, multa enim, dixit, secreta in eo computrue- runt (84). — Euripides, being reproached by a certain Person, with having a stinking Breath, answered, it might

(74) Aristot. de Poët. Cap. xxv,
pag. m. 518, É.

(75) Φεύγων
τὰς συνουσίας, qui congressus
fugiebat. Suidas, in Εὐρυπίδης.

(76) It is Parnet's
Conjecture, pag.
24.

(77) Barnes. ubi
supra, pag. 24.

(78) Suidas, ubi
supra.

(79) Φιλεγγύνης
δ' ἦν καὶ Εὐρι-πίδης ὁ τραγῆς. Fuit & mulierosus Euripides. Athen.
Lib. XIII, pag.
557. See also
pag. 603.

(80) Athen. lib.
xiii, pag. 557.

(81) Sermone de Intemperantia.

(82) Solin. cap.
ix, pag. m. 26.

(S₃) Thom. Magister, ubi supra.

(84) Stobaeus, Serm. XXXIX, περὶ ἀποψῆς
των.

should prevent us from affording too easy a Belief to the Story of his Adventures in Macedonia [O]. Here he came to a tragical End; for as he was walking in a Wood, and, according to his Custom, in a deep Meditation, the Intenfeness of his Thoughts, no doubt, led him on too far, till he was met alone by the Prince's Dogs, who was then out a hunting. Those cursed Dogs tore him in pieces. Archelaus buried him in a magnificent manner [P]. The Athenians were so grieved at the News of his Death, that the whole City went into Mourning (b). Philemon, a Friend of his, was so moved with it, that he declared, if he thought, as some assured him, that the dead preserve a sense of

(b) Tho. Magist. ubi supra.

might well be so, when such a number of Secrets had lain so long buried in his Mouth. Archelaus, not thinking him sufficiently revenged by this answer, delivered up Decannichus to him, that he might atone for the Offence, by being soundly lashed. It is pretended, that Euripides made use of the King's Permission accordingly, and there is no doubt of it, if the Testimony of Aristotle may be relied on: his Words are: Τῆς Ἀρχαίας δ' ἐπιθέσεως Δεκαννίχου ἡγεμὼν ἐγένετο παραζύνων τὸς ἐπιδεμένους πρῶτος. αὐτὸν δὲ τῆς ὀργῆς ὅτι, αὐτὸν ἐξέδωκε μασιγῶσαι Εὐριπίδῃ τῷ ποιητῇ ὃ δ' Εὐριπίδης ἐχθαλέπαινον εἰπόντος τι αὐτῷ εἰς δυσωδίαν τὸ ζυμῆτος: That is to say, Decannichus was at the Head of the Conspiracy formed against Archelaus, for he was the first to provoke and irritate those who murdered that Prince; the cause of his Rage was, that Archelaus had delivered him up to Euripides to be scourged, and the cause of Euripides's anger was, that Decannichus had said something of the disagreeableness of his Breath (85). Mr Barnes would have no Credit given to Aristotle: his reason is, that Archelaus was not killed till six Years after Euripides's Death (86). This reason has no weight with me; for it is easy to conceive, that the Death of the Poet might not extinguish the resentment of Decannichus against the King. Suppose as much as you please, tho' Aristotle does not say so, that Decannichus was the cause of poor Euripides's Death: this will not hinder it from being very probable, that the anger of this Man against the Prince, who had subjected him to so grievous an affront, was kept in full Vigour, and prompted him at the end of six Years to improve the opportunities of Revenge, which presented themselves. We shall see, below, whether he was the Cause of Euripides's Death (87).

We must not forget the golden Cup, which was given this Poet by Archelaus, with an honourable Enticement. That Prince, having refused it to one who had begged it, sent it to Euripides, telling the other: Thou art fit to ask, but unworthy to receive; but as for him, he deserves to receive without asking. Σὺ μὲν (εἶπεν) αἰτεῖν ἐπιτήδειος εἰ καὶ μὴ λαμβάνειν. ἔτος δὲ λαμβάνειν καὶ μὴ αἰτεῖν. Tu quidem, inquit, ad petendum idoneus es, non ad accipiendum: ille autem ad accipiendum etiam non petens (88).

[O] We must not easily believe the Story of his Adventures in Macedonia.] He was Seventy two Years of Age when he went to the Macedonian Court, and it is acknowledged that he was always free from criminal Amours, Σκαλῖνς Κυπρίδας ἀλλήτριος (89). However, let us relate what is said of him. It is pretended (90), that at an Entertainment of the Macedonian King with his Friends, Euripides, having drank too freely, fell a kissing the Poet Agathon, who sat by him, and who was about forty Years of Age, and that, upon the Prince's asking him, if he thought Agathon was still an agreeable Object, he answered, Ναὶ μὲν Δία, εἰ γὰρ μόνον τὸ ἐὰν τῶν καλῶν καλλίσον, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὸ μετόπισθον. Per Jovem, inquit, omnino, non enim ver solum formosorum est pulchrum, verum etiam autumnus (91). — By Jupiter, I think he is very amiable, for the Autumn of beautiful Persons has something lovely in it. Plutarch pretends, that it was Archelaus who said this, in order to excuse Euripides for caressing a Man with a good Beard (92); but in other places (93) he imputes this Thought to Euripides: So true it is, that it was his Practice to make the same History serve several ends. He fathered it sometimes upon one, sometimes upon another, made use of it more ways than one, and even makes Alterations in it as there is occasion (94). Neque enim inusitatum Plutarcho casion (94).

VOL. II.

dem res & sententias aliquando narrando variare, aliquando diversis authoribus tribuere, non memoria lapsus, sed ut in rem suam quam præfens ornat, torqueat (95). — It is no uncommon thing with Plutarch to vary, in the Narration, the same Circumstances and Sayings, ascribing them sometimes to one Person, and sometimes to another, as may best tally to his present Purposes, which Variation ought not to be construed a Slip of the Memory. The learned Schefferus was ignorant of Plutarch's Variations concerning the Autumn of handsome Persons; he thinks that Plutarch always ascribed that Thought to Archelaus; and yet, in one of the places cited by him (96), it is plain Euripides pronounced that Saying on account of his killing Agathon. See Caillus Rhodiginus (97), who has censured one of Plutarch's Translators for misunderstanding a Place in the Life of Alcibiades, where this Saying of Euripides is related. The Adventure at this Feast is not the worst Fault of our Poet. It is said (98), that he was in love with Agathon, and that to please him he composed the Tragedy of Chrysis. It is also said, that he had leud Commerce with the Minion of Archelaus; and that as he was going to him by night he was met by the Women, and torn to pieces. Others say he was going to meet the Wife of Nicomachus the Arethusean. Οἱ δὲ, ἰσχυροῦσαν ἔχ' ὑπὸ κυνῶν ἀλλ' ὑπὸ γυναικῶν νύκτας διασπασθῆναι, περιεφύμενον δωρὶ πρὸς Κρατερὸν τὸν ἐρωμένον Ἀρχαίαν, καὶ γὰρ σκῆψιν αὐτὸν καὶ περὶ τὰς τοιαύτας ἐρωτάς, οἱ δὲ, πρὸς τὴν γεμετήν Νικομήνην τὴν Ἀρεθυσίαν. Alii vero non à canibus, sed à mulieribus noctu laceratum fuisse tradunt, dum intempesta nocte ad Craterum Archelai delicias iret. Nam illum & hujusmodi amoribus additum fuisse ferunt. Alii vero, ad uxorem Nicomachi Arethusei (99). These are the things I intended in the Text of this Remark.

[P] Archelaus made a magnificent Funeral for him.] Without doubt the following words in an Epitaph of Euripides, Ἀλλ' ἐμολος Πιλλαιῶν ὅπ' ἤριος, cæspite Pellæo astitit, induced Mr Barnes to say, that the Macedonian King would have this Poet buried in his Capital City. Designaverat inter Macedonicorum regum tumulos Euripidem reponere, atque ita paulo post in urbe Pella quam nonnulli Beræam putant, Macedoniæ metropoli nobile illi extructum sepulchrum (100). — He intended to bury Euripides amongst the Tombs of the Macedonian Kings, and accordingly soon after a magnificent Tomb was erected for him in the City Pella, which some take to be Beræa, the Metropolis of Macedonia. See, above, the Passage out of Solinus (101), and add to it the words of Aulus Gellius which I am going to quote. He declares at the same time the veneration they had for Euripides at Athens, and in Macedonia. The Athenians sent Embassadors into Macedonia to have his Bones, and could not obtain them. Sepulcrum autem ejus & memoriam Macedones eo dignati sunt honore, ut in gloriam quoque loco prædicarent, ἔποτε σὸν μνημῆμα Εὐριπίδης ὤλετο πῶ, quod egregius poeta morte obita sepultus in eorum terra foret. Quamobrem quum legati ad eos ab Atheniensibus missi petissent, ut ossa Athenas in terram illius patriam permitterent, transferri maximo consensu Macedones in ea re deneganda perstiterunt (102). — The Macedonians had that veneration for his Tomb and Memory, as to declare to his Honour, that after his Death that excellent Poet should be buried, and lie for ever amongst them; wherefore when the Athenian Embassadors came to desire leave to transfer his Bones to Athens, his native Country: the Macedonians with one consent determined to refuse them. It appears by a Passage in Viruvius (103), that the Tomb of Euripides was in 103.

(95) B rnef. ubi supra, pag. 30.

(96) Schefferus, in Ælian. lib. xiii, cap. iv, cited Plutarch in Amatorio, (where the Saying is attributed to Euripides) and in Apophth. Lacon. This is not found in the Apophthegms of the Lacedæmonians.

(97) Antiq. Lect. Lib. XXIV, cap. xii.

(98) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. II, cap. xxi.

(99) Suidas, ubi supra.

(100) Barnes, ubi supra, pag. 32.

(101) Citation (82).

(102) Ant. Gell. lib. xi, cap. x.

(103) Lib. VIII, cap. iii, pag. m.

(85) Aristot. lib. v, de Republica, cap. x, pag. m. 305, F.

(86) Barnes, ubi supra, num. 30, sub fin.

(87) In the Remark [R], where he is not named among those who are charged with the death of that Poet.

(88) Plutarch. de vitio Pudent. pag. 531, D.

(89) Dionysius Byzantinus, in Anthologia, lib. III, folio 274.

(90) Ælian. Var. Hist. Lib. XIII, cap. iv.

(91) Idem, ibid.

(92) Plutarch. in Apophth. p. 177, A.

(93) Idem, in Vita Alcibiadis, p. 192, A; & in Amatorio, pag. 770, C.

(94) See, before, Remark [M] of the Article ACHILLES, between the Citations (137) and (138).

of things, he would hang himself to enjoy the Sight of Euripides [Q]. This great Poet was near Seventy five Years of Age when he died; the Circumstances of his Death are variously reported [R], he never was with Plato, in Egypt [S], whatever Mr le the open Contry, at the Confluence of two little Rivers whose Waters were far unlike each other. The Water of one was mortal, whilst that of the other was so good that Travellers chose that place to dine at. Now could this have been said, if the Tomb of Euripides had been in the Capital City of Macedonia?

(104) Lib. xxxi, cap. ii, sub fin.

(105) Plut. in Lycurgo, sub fin. pag. 59.

(106) Plut. libid.

(107) Pausanias, lib. i. pag. 2.

(108) Lib. vii, pag. 256.

(109) Barnef. ubi supra, pag. 33. He cites Caelius Rhodiginus. Antiq. Lect. lib. xxi, cap. x; & Gyradius Poet. Hist. dial. vii, fol. 268. I have not found this in my edition of Rhodiginus, (which is of Francfort 1666) at the place put down. He should have cited lib. xxiv, cap. x.

(110) Tho. Magister, ubi supra.

And in that case would not, Vitruvius and Pliny (104) have better described the Situation of those two Rivers? Would they not have said, either that they ran through the City of Pella, or very near it? And would Plutarch have said that this Poet was interred near Arctufia (105)? Lightning fell upon the Tomb of Euripides, which was looked upon as a glorious accident, Lycurgus being the only Person to whom such a thing had ever happened: "Ὁς ἀπολόγημα καὶ μαρτυρεῖν μέγα εἶναι τοῖς ἀγαθῶν τὸν ἔδ-κευσαν, τὸ μὲν συμπιεῖν αὐτὸν μετὰ τελευτῆς, καὶ γενέσθαι δὲ τῷ θεοφιλεστάτῳ καὶ ὁσιωτάτῳ πρότερον συνέπεσε. Hoc quidem sup-petit magnum argumentum & testimonium studiosis Euripidis, quod soli ei post fata evenit & delatum fuerit illud, quod Diis gratissimo, & sanctissimo viro ante venerat (106). — The admirers of Euripides have this convincing Proof and Testimony of his worth; that to him alone after Death the same thing happened, which before had happened to a most virtuous Man, and distinguished by the favour of the Gods. The Athenians, not being able to get the Bones of Euripides, they erected a stately Cinerary to him (107) which was standing in Pausanias's time. Those are grossly mistaken who have said that the Argians also erected one to him. Caelius Rhodiginus, & ab eo deceptus Lilius Giraldus, aliud Euripidis sepulchrum memorat in medio Argivorum foro; & Palinthum nuncupatum ex Strabone refert; sed optandum est ut inter tot lectiones antiquas nullos novos errores proleminaret Caelii incuria, nam Strabo (108) hoc sepulchrum Danaï fuisse ait, quamquam eodem loco Euripidem authorem laudat (109). — Rhodiginus, and Giraldus, who by him was lead into the same mistake, mentions another Sepulchre of Euripides in the Forum at Argos; and says that Strabo calls it Palinthum; but it were to be wished that amongst so many lacubrations, Rhodiginus had not through want of care interperpetrated new blunders, for Strabo says this was Danaus's Sepulchre, though he mentions Euripides in the same place."

[Q] Philemon declared that he would hang himself to enjoy the Sight of Euripides. The Verses of this tender, but a little too unbelieving, Friend, deserve a place here. Tantopere autem Philemon cum adamavit, ut hæc de eo dicere non dubitaverit

Εἰ ταῖς ἀληθείαισιν οἱ τε θνήσκοντες
Αἰσθῆσιν εἶχον ἄνδρες, ὥς φασὶν τινες,
Ἀπὸ γὰρ ἀμύνειν, ὥς ἰδέναι Εὐεπίδῳ.

Si sensum haberent mortui, ut quidam volunt,
Finire vitam mihi laqueo meam velim,
Ut pascere oculos intuendo Euripidem (110).

Philemon loved him to that excess that he did not scruple to say,

If Shades have Sense, as some pretend,
A friendly cord my Life should end,
That I once more might see my Friend.

[R] The Circumstances of his Death are variously reported. The Reader may have seen in the Body of this Article, that the King being a hunting, some of the Dogs fell upon Euripides who was musing (111) in a Wood, and tore him to pieces. This is taken from Thomas Magister in the Life of this Poet. See also Diodorus Siculus, chap. 103 of the 13th Book. Others say it was not by accident he was exposed to the fury of the Dogs, but that they were purposely let loose upon him, and that by the Artifices of two Poets (112) who were jealous of his Glory, who hired the keeper of the King's Dogs with a Sum of

(111) Ἐπειδὴ ἐν τινὶ ἀλσὶ Φροντικῶν ἴτυχα. Quando forte fortuna per nos quoddam cogitandum ambularet.

(112) Arides, a Macedonian, and Cræteas, a Thessalian.

Money to do it (113). Valerius Maximus only says (114) Scitae, in that Euripides having supped with the King, and returning home, was so torn by Dogs, that he died of his Wounds (114). Aulus Gellius says expressly, that this ill turn was done him by some envious Person.

Is cum in Macedonia apud Archelaum regem esset utereturque eo rex familiariter, rediens nocte ab ejus cena canibus à quodam zelumulo immixtis dilaceratus est, & ex his vulneribus mors secuta est (115). — Being in Macedonia with Archelaus, who treated him with great familiarity, as he returned from supping with the King, he was miserably torn by Dogs, let loose by some envious Person, and died of the Wounds. I shall not repeat what I have touched upon in the Remark [O], that it is said, as he was going at an unreasonable Hour to visit a Man or Woman with an ill Design, he fell into the Hands of certain Women, who struck him down, and killed him; but I may very well insert here Mr le Fevre's Reflexion upon it. Others, say, he (116), would make us believe, that he was torn to pieces by Women to revenge the Honour of their Sex, whom he never mentioned without reproach. But it is very probable this History was copied from the Fable of Orpheus.

Let us finish this Remark with a little piece of Learning which Erasmus will furnish us with (117). There was in Macedonia a Village called the Thracian Village, because it was inhabited by People of that Nation. A Dog of Archelaus happening one day to stray, came to this Village, where he was sacrificed and eat according to the Custom of the Inhabitants. The King, being informed of it, condemned them to pay a Talent as a Fine. Not being in a Condition to raise this Sum, they begged Euripides to get it remitted, and by his intercession they obtained their Request. But he was punished for it not long after, for he was killed in a Forest by the King's Dogs (118), and they were persuaded that the Dogs which destroyed him were descended from the Dog that the Thracians sacrificed. This gave rise to a Proverb among the Macedonians (119). Here is another piece of Erudition of the same Erasmus: he pretends (120) that the Proverb, Promerit canes, owes its Original to the revenge which Promeras, an Officer of Archelaus, took upon Euripides for an ill turn that Poet had done him. He set the Dogs upon him, which tore him to pieces. Erasmus forgot to tell us what we learn from Stephanus Byzantinus. The unfortunate Euripides being very ill used by Dogs in a place of Macedonia called Bormiscus. He did not die upon the spot, but never recovered of those Wounds. Βορμίσκος χωρίον Μακεδονίας ἐν ᾧ καὶ σὸς πᾶσι τῶν γέγονεν Εὐεπίδης. ἐκ δὲ τῶν ἀνγμάτων ἀβήρισστα αὐτὸν ἀποθανεῖν. Bormiscus, oppidum (regiuncula, according to Berkelius) Macedonia, ubi à canibus discerptus fuit Euripides. . . . ex moribus oerò, quam agrotaret, ajunt obisse. I make no doubt but the 597th and 598th Verses of Ovid's Ibis, upon which Mr de Boissieu had no Observations to make, refer to the tragical end of our Poet:

Utque cothurnatum vatem tutela Dianæ Dilaniet vigilum te quoque turba canum.

Thine be the Fate of that fam'd bushin'd Bard Butcher'd by Dogs, Diana's fury Guard.

[S] He never was with Plato in Egypt. Authors are not agreed upon the Year of Plato's Birth, but one may without fear of erring place it in the LXXXVIIIth or LXXXIXth Olympiad. I would advise no body to contradict Mr Barnes, who assures us (121) that Plato was but seventeen Years of Age when Euripides went into Macedonia; and but twenty, at Euripides's Death. How absurd is it to say, as Laërtius has done, that Euripides followed Plato in his Travels into Egypt (122)! If they had been there together, it would have been just and decent that Euripides, a venerable old Man should have been the Leader, and that Plato, who was but a young Man, should follow him as his Disciple, just as the young English Lords, and the young German Counts, go beyond the Alps with a Governour.

(113) Scitae, in Edipide; & Manuel Mochopul. in vita Eu-
ripidis.

(114) Val. Max. lib. ix, cap. xii, ext. 4.

(115) A. Gallus, lib. xv, cap. xii.

(116) Vie des Poët. Græc. pag. m. 98, 99.

(117) Upon the Proverb Kanēs Promerit. Cuius vindictam. Alleg. Chel. I, Cent. vii, n. 47. p. m. 245.

(118) Cum Euripides in hys quadam solis el-set, & Archelaus venatu reventur, canes Euripidem exilium discerptum de-voraverunt. Erst. Alleg. ubi supra.

He is wrong to say they devoted him, this is con-futed by what we have said of the Tomb of Euripides.

(119) See above, Citation (117).

(120) Chel. II, Cent. vii, n. 88, pag. 561. Apollonius says in general of the same thing, Cent. xvi, num. 70.

(121) In vita Euripidis, p. 57.

(122) Ovidi Gen. et Euripidis autem Euripidis in Egyptum.

Mr le Fevre may say to the contrary. We have but twenty of his Tragedies remaining, though he composed Ninety two (i), he loved to intermix Sentences [T], full of good Morality, by which he gives his own Character; for he was a severe, grave Man, and indifferent to Pleasure. He used to shut himself up in a dismal Cave, to compose his Works [U]. However all his Maxims were not good. He broached one upon the Sanctity of an Oath [X], which seemed so unguarded, that they called him to an Account

(i) Suidas, who relates this, says also that according to others he made but 75. Mr Barnes found the titles of 84 Pieces of Euripides. See his Edition, pag. 55.

Governour. But let us leave the absurd inconsistency of maintaining, that Plato and Euripides were together in Egypt. Euripides went out of Athens harassed by the Jells of the comic Poets, and retired to the Court of Archelaus: when he was about seventy two Years of Age. It is certain his Journey into Egypt was not posterior to that of Macedonia: therefore, it must either be a Chimera, or it was before the seventy second Year of Euripides. Now it cannot be denied, that during the five or six Years preceding this Journey into Macedonia, Euripides was in his own Country. He exhibited his Orestes when he was sixty nine Years old (123). He received at Athens at the Age of sixty seven (124) the acknowledgments of those who had saved their Lives in Sicily, by repeating his Verses. Is it credible that at seventy Years of Age he should undertake to travel into Egypt? And if that absurdity will go down with some, let them tell me then how it is possible that Plato, who was not yet twenty Years of Age, should accompany him into Egypt, he who did not take this Journey till after (125) the Death of Socrates (126), which was some Years after that of Euripides; he, in a word, who did not undertake a Journey, into Egypt till after he had seen Italy (127), and who did not leave Athens till he was twenty eight Years of Age (128)? Though Diogenes Laërtius should swear to the Journey in question, he would deserve no Credit against the clear and solid reasons that are borrowed from Chronology. With much more reason ought such a Fable to be rejected, which he relates only upon hearsay. And nevertheless you see Joseph Scaliger, Mr le Fevre, Mr Magnage, very positive of this Journey of Euripides into Egypt in Company with Plato. I do not pretend to excuse Laërtius; for when a hearsay is manifestly false, it ought not to be told without contradicting it. Laërtius furnishes me with a proof against his hearsay. He observes that Euripides fell sick in Egypt, and that the Priests cured him by Sea Medicines; which made him say some time after,

Θάλασσα κλύζει πάντα τ' ἀνθρώπων κακὰ.

Mare universa proluit hominum mala.

The briny Waves all human Ills dispel.

This is the 1193d Verse of his Tragedy of Iphigenia in Tauris, which was prior to the fifty ninth Year of Euripides's Life, since the Tragedy of Orestes which he exhibited in his sixty ninth Year was the last Piece he composed at Athens (129). Therefore his Journey into Egypt must necessarily be before his sixty ninth Year, and so Plato would have gone into Egypt before he was fourteen Years of Age; which is absurd. The learned Men of England (130) have not been so easily imposed upon as those of France: they have not affirmed, as the great Scaliger does: 'Plato, Eudoxus, Euripides protectionis in Aegyptum focii planetarum curriculum ab Aegyptiis didicere; & primi omnium Græcorum populares suos id docuerunt, Plato quidem in Timæo, Eudoxus in ἐνόπτερον, Euripides in Thyeste. Verba sunt magni Scaligeri in Notis ad Sphaeram Manilii (131). — Plato, Eudoxus, and Euripides, made a Voyage together into Egypt, and from the Egyptians learned the Course of the Planets, and were the first of all the Grecians, who taught the same to their Countrymen, Plato in his Timæus, Eudoxus in his ἐνόπτερον, Euripides in his Thyestes. These are the words of the great Scaliger in his Remarks on the Sphere of Manilius. They do not say as Mr le Fevre (132), that Euripides after he had learned Rhetoric from Prodicus, travelled into Egypt with Plato, to enjoy the Conversation of the Priests of that Country, who had at that time a little more Reputation of good Literature than the Priests of Spain or Italy. There had passed above thirty Years between Euripides's learning Rhetoric, and the Birth of Plato. Which aggravates the Error of Mr le Fevre.

[T] He loved to deliver moral Sentences. The thing needs no proof: it is but reading what is still extant of his. But if any one is desirous of Testimonies for it, let him add to the Passage of Quintilian cited before (133) these words of Cicero (134): Cui (Euripidi) tu quantum credas nescio: ego certe singulos ejus versus singula ejus testimonia puto. As many Verses of Euripides, so many Maxims and Sentences in Cicero's Opinion. Can it be thought strange after this, that That illustrious Orator should prepare himself for Death by reading Euripides? It is observed (135) that the Assassins who pursued him, and murdered him, found him reading in his Litter the Medea of Euripides. Now as the best things spoil a Book if they are not managed with discretion, there may perhaps have been great reason to condemn in this Poet the too frequent use of Philosophical Aphorisms. Particularly his Hecuba is found to philosophize to excess and unseasonably. Τὸν Εὐεπίδην καταμεμψόμεθα ὅτι παρὰ καιρὸν αὐτῷ ἔκλεβεν φιλοσοφίαν. Euripidem vituperare sollemus, quod intempestivius apud illum philosophetur Hecuba (136).

[U] He shut himself up in a dismal Cave to compose his Works. It was in the Isle of Salamis: Aulus Gellius had the curiosity to enter into it. 'Philochorus refert, says he (137), in insula Salamine speluncam esse tetram & horridam quam nos vidimus, in qua Euripides tragædias scriptavit. — Philochorus reports, that there is in the Island Salamis a gloomy dismal Cave, that we have seen, in which Euripides composed his Tragedies.'

[X] He broached one Maxim upon the Sanctity of an Oath. He introduces Hippolytus guarded with a distinction, when he was put in mind of his Oath:

Ἡ γλῶσσο' ἀμώμοχ', ἢ δὲ φρήν ἀνώμοστον (138).

Lingua juravit, mens vero manet injurata.

I swore with my Tongue, not with the Mind (139).

This is exactly the Sophistry, or rather the Treason of mental Reservations. There was one Hygieanon who could not bear this Verse, he charged Euripides with impiety, as a teacher and protector of perjury. The Poet demanded to be tried by his proper Judges, appealing to the jurisdiction of the Judges appointed over all Theatrical Controversies, declaring that he had given, or was ready to give, an account of his Faith and Doctrine, before that Tribunal; and that it was there, and not before the usual Courts, that he ought to be accused. *Ἐφ' ἧς αὐτὸν ἀδικεῖν τὰς ἐν τῷ Διονυσιακῷ ἀγῶνι κρίσεις εἰς τὰ δίκασθαι ἀγοντα: ἐκεῖ γὰρ αὐτὸν δαδῶκεναι λόγον ἢ δώσειν εἰ βέλεται κατηγορεῖν. Dixit enim injuste agere ex Dionysiaco certamine judicia in forum traducentem, ibi enim se reddidisse rationem aut redditurum si voluerit accusare* (140). Aristotle, who informs us of this Circumstance, goes no farther: his subject not permitting him to tell us what followed, or what was the issue of the Cause: but if Euripides got off by contesting the jurisdiction of the Court, and had nothing better to allege in his defence, it must be confessed his Cause was bad enough, and he has found Friends and Advocates who have pleaded much better for him than he did himself. I do not reckon Cicero as one of his Apologists; for he has not taken the pains to justify that the distinction of Hippolytus was within the limits of the Rule he (Cicero) had just laid down; he is content to mention that distinction in general with an adverb of praise: 'Non falsum jurare perjurare est, says he (141), sed quod ex animi tui sententia juraris, sicut verbis concepitur more nostro, id non facere perjurium est. Scitè enim Euripides, juravi lingua, mentem injuratum gero. — To falsify

(133) Rem. [F] Citation (39).

(134) Epist. viii., lib. xvi ad Famil.

(135) Ptolemaeus Hephaest lib. vi. Variae Histor. apud Photium, pag. 485.

(136) Theo, in Progymnasticis, cap. i, pag. 4.

(137) Lib. xv, cap. xx.

(138) It is the 612th verse of Hippolytus.

(139) See Balzac's Prince, n. 262, pag. 191.

(140) Aristot. Rhetor. lib. ii, cap. xv, pag. m. 464.

(141) Cicero, Officior. lib. iii, cap. 29.

(123) Barnes, pag. 28, ex Scholiaste Eurip. & Joan. Meursio.

(124) Barnes, ibid.

(125) Diog. Laërt. in Platone, num. 6.

(126) See Remark [DD].

(127) Diog. Laërt. in Platone, n. 6. Cicero, V de Finibus, says the contrary; but as Apuleius observes that Plato went twice into Italy, and the second time after his journey into Egypt, it is easy to reconcile Cicero with Hermodorus in Diogenes Laërtius.

(128) Diogen. Laërt. in Platone, num. 6.

(129) Barnes, ubi supra, p. 30.

(130) See Barnes, ibid. pag. 27.

(131) Menagius ad Diog. Laërt. lib. iii, num. 6, pag. 140. Since he cites this without finding fault with it, he is an accomplice with Scaliger and le Fevre of Sasmar, in their errors.

(132) Vies des Poët. Grecs, pag. 97.

Account for it. Upon another Occasion he dogmatized so gravely in Defence of covetous Men, that the whole Audience were moved at it [Y]. Another time they were offended to such a Degree at the two first Verses of his Menalippus, which seemed to attack the Existence of the greatest of all the Gods [Z], that he was forced to alter them. He has vented some impious Propositions, which made him pass with some for an Atheist [AA]. I shall not enter into the Examination of this Point, but shall only observe in general, that it is altogether absurd to charge the Author

of

'sly one's Oath is not always perjury; but when a Man swears to the performance of any thing purely from his own choice, and in form, he is then perjured if he does not perform it. The distinction therefore of Euripides is ingenious enough.

What tho' my Tongue was bound, my Mind was free.

The Scholiast upon Euripides has given a much better explanation of it; he pretends the Poet's intention was this. When Hippolytus was sworn, he did not well understand the thing in question: Matters were disguised to him; he understood them in a certain manner, and swore according to the best of his Understanding. After this the affair was shewn him in another Light, and it was pretended that he was bound by his Oath: he answered that it was never his intention to swear to that, and therefore his Tongue only had sworn. This case seems to me to be very different from Equivocations, and mental Reservations. According to this Hypothesis Hippolytus ought to enjoy the prerogatives of Ignorance, which clears a Man in Law. 'Si certum est eum qui juravit, aliquod factum supposuisse, quod revera se ita non habere, ac nisi id credidisset non fuisse juraturum, non obligabit iuramentum (142).' But nevertheless the Maxim of Euripides, generally speaking, is a very bad one: there is no sort of perjury but may be excused by it. May not those who use Equivocations say, that their Heart and Tongue did not agree; that one swore, but the other did not swear? Mr Barnes to justify Euripides observes (143) among other things, that Hippolytus chose rather to die than to violate this verbal Oath.

[Y] He dogmatized so gravely in defence of covetous Men, that the whole Audience were moved at it.] The Actor would have been driven off the Stage, if Euripides had not come himself, and begged the People to have a little patience, assuring them they should soon see the miserable end of that Miser, whose Maxims had so much shocked the Audience. We owe this Particular to Seneca. He relates in Latin Verse the Maxims of that covetous Man, and then adds: 'Cum hi novissimi mi versus in tragedia Euripidis pronuntiati essent, totus populus ad ejciendum & actorem & carmen confurrexit uno impetu: donec Euripides in medium ipse profuit, petens, ut expectarent, viderentque quem admirator auri exitum faceret. Dabat in illa fabula pœnas Bellerophon, quas in sua quisque dat. Nulla enim avaritia sine pœna est, quamvis factis sit ipsa pœnam (144). — These last Verses being spoke in a Tragedy of Euripides, the whole Audience rose with one consent to expel the Actor, and condemn the Passage, till Euripides appeared on the Stage, and intreated them to wait with patience the exit of this admirer of Gold. Bellerophon in that Play suffered the same Punishment which is usually inflicted on others of that stamp. For Avarice never escapes without Punishment, although it is a sufficient Punishment of itself.' We ought in Equity to be satisfied with such an Apology as this. The same Poet makes use of it for his Ixion. Some Persons found fault with him for bringing so wicked and impious a Man as that upon the Stage: Take notice, replied he, that before I let him go off I will tie him to a Wheel.

Ὅσπερ ὁ Εὐερείδης εἰπεῖν λέγεται πρὸς τὴν τὸν Ἰξίωνα λοιδορῶντα ὡς ἀσεβῆ καὶ μαρὸν, οὐ μὲν τοι πρῶτον αὐτὸν ἐκ τῆς σκηνῆς ἐξήγαγον τὸ τεργὴν περιπαῶσαι. Quemadmodum Euripides fertur Ixionem ut impium flagitiosumque conviciantibus dixisse, Enimvero non ante eum a scena exiit, quam rotæ affigerem (145). This was the finest part of Tragedy; persecuted Virtue was seen to be triumphant, and wicked Men were at last punished: but nevertheless it was to be feared, that certain Examples, and certain Discourses should become infectious. See the Reflexion Aristophanes throws upon our Euripides (146) on account of his Phædra. Note, that in the Menagiana the two charges against Euripides are confounded together; for there it is said (147), 'that the five Judges appointed by the Athenians to regulate the differences which might arise concerning the Stage . . . having (148) one day summoned Euripides to give an account of a Verse in one of his Plays, wherein he makes the Actor say he had sworn with his Tongue, but not with his Mind; Euripides defended himself by saying, that they should wait till the end of his Play, when they would see that the Actor broke upon the Wheel.'

[Z] They were so offended at the two first Verses of his Menalippus . . . that he was forced to alter them.]

The proof of this may be seen in Plutarch: I shall relate his words at length, because they shew us what weight the Pagans laid upon Tradition (149), when they were to prove the existence of a Deity. Plutarch confesses openly that it was dangerous not to insist upon that proof, and difficult to find one more certain. The Philosophers of this Age are not reduced to such a strait; they give evident proofs, and much more demonstrative than can be furnished from Tradition. But let us hear Plutarch (150): 'You seem to me to start a great and bold question, or rather to touch upon a point, which ought not to be meddled with, viz. the Opinion and Belief we have of the Gods, by demanding the proof and reason of each Particular. For the ancient Faith, we have derived down from our ancestors, ought to be sufficient, nor can we imagine, or find out a better, or more convincing proof.'

For surely all the Wit of human Brain

This part of Knowledge never could attain.

So that Tradition being the Foundation and common Basis of all Religion, if once the Authority and Belief of it be shaken in one respect, it becomes uncertain and suspected in all others. No doubt you have heard how Euripides was hissed and insulted for beginning his Tragedy of Menalippus in these words,

— — — Jupiter, if his Name be so,
For 'tis by hearsay only that I know.

He was mighty fond of this Tragedy, as being exquisitely well writ, but was forced, by the Clamour and Complaints of the People, to alter the first Lines into what it is at present,

Love, for we own he has received that Name
From Truth alone, and not from common Fame.

[AA] Some represent him as an Atheist.] In this manner Plutarch among the Ancients, and Brown (151) among the Moderns, speak of Euripides. See the Remark [H] of the Article CRITIAS. Aristophanes says one thing which puts me in mind of the fear some were under at Ephesus, from the preachers of the Gospel (152). He introduces (153) a Widow who got her living by selling holy Nolegays; but, says she, since Euripides by his impious Verses has persuaded People that there are no Gods, I sell hardly any thing at all. Let it be remembered that the Pagan Gods were so ridiculous, that a Man might laugh at them without being an Atheist. So that the Passage of Euripides, quoted by Clemens Alexandrinus, proves nothing: I mean that in which the Poet says, if the Gods were called to an account for their Adulteries, Neptune and Jupiter himself would be forced to leave their Temples, pursuant to the sentence which would be pronounced against them; but he adds, I do not suppose it will ever come to this pass (154): 'Ἡ δὲ ἐν Ἰῶνι τῷ δράματι γυμνῇ τῇ κεφαλῇ ἐκκυλλῇ τῷ δεικτρῷ τὸς Οὐρανῷ.

Πῶς ἐν δίκαιον, τὰς νόμους ἡμᾶς βέλτοῖς πράττας, αὐτὸς ἀδίκας ἐβλάσαντι.

Et,

(142) Grotius, de Jure Belli & Pacis, lib. ii, cap. xiii, n. 4. In the Note he applies his Maxim to Hippolytus.

(143) In vita Euripid. p. 22.

(144) Seneca, Epist. cxv. pag. m. 452.

(145) Plutarch. de audiendis Poëtis, pag. 19.

(146) In Ranis, Act. IV, Sc. II, pag. m. 243.

(147) Menagiana, pag. m. 119.

(148) Ibid. pag. 120.

(149) See the Penfices diverses sur les Comètes, num. 137.

(150) Plot. in Anactorio, pag. 756.

(151) Reliq. Medici, t. xiv. Vide Notes in eum locum.

(152) Act. xix, 24, and following.

(153) In Theophrastis, pag. m. 777.

(154) Clem. Alexandrinus Ad. mont. ad Gentem, pag. 50.

of a Tragedy with the Sentiments he makes his Actors express upon the Stage [BB]. The manner in which Euripides received the Advice of the People, about the Correction of a Passage in one of his Tragedies, and his Answer to a Poet who boasted of his easy way of composing, are capable of a good and ill Construction [CC]: He was accused

Εἰ, δ' ἐ γὰρ ἔσαι, τῷ λόγῳ δὲ χρῆσσομαι
Δίκας βίαιον δώσας ἀνθρώποις γάμον,
Σὺ καὶ Ποσειδῶν, Ζεὺς θ' ὅς ἐγανὲς κρατεῖ,
Ναὺς τίνοντες ἀδίκῃ κενώσετε.

Jam verò in dramate, cui nomen est Ion, capite nudo Deos in theatrum inducit.

An hoc videtur, qui datis mortalibus
Leges, ut ipsi criminis sitis rei?
Quod si (futurum quod quidem nunquam reor)
Reddenda vobis ratio sit stupri & probri:
Neptunus, & tu, rexque Jupiter poli,
Templis relictis jure abibitis foras.

In his Tragedy, named Ion, he introduces the Gods bare-headed.

Ought you who Laws prescribe those Laws transgress?
O should the Hour but come, tho' vain the Thought,
Yet in Imagination let it come,
When all your Rapes should meet a righteous doom:
Theu, Neptune, and the mighty thunderer Jove,
Might mourn your Temples, and your Altars, lost.

(155) Methode
de lire chrétiennement les Pœtes, Tom. I,
Pag. 173.

Father Thomassin (155) reasons justly upon the Contradiction which appears in the Conduct of the Pagans. They adored the same Deities in their Temples, which were ridiculed with impunity upon the Stage.

(156) Quinetium
Euseb. 14 Præp.
cap. 6, refert Anaxagoram ab
Euripide Atheo
idecirco impugnatum. Theoph.
Raynaud. Theol.
Natur. Distinct.
V, num. 155,
pag. m. 525.

Observe a gross Mistake of Theophilus Raynaud. He says that Euripides the Atheist attacked the Philosopher Anaxagoras upon the Doctrine of the Unity of God (156); and he cites the sixth Chapter of the fourteenth Book of Eusebius's Preparatio Evangelica. He should have cited the sixteenth Chapter; but that would not have mended the Matter; for Eusebius, abridging the account Plutarch has given us concerning the Opinions of the Ancients upon the nature of God, says only that Euripides not daring to give his Opinion, for fear of the Court of Areopagus, insinuates it by introducing Sisyphus who denied that there were any Gods. Plutarch afterwards makes Anaxagoras the first who had orthodox sentiments of the Deity. This is all Eusebius says (157).

(157) Euseb.
Præp. Lib. xiv,
cap. xvi, p. 753.

[BB] It is absurd to charge the Author of a Tragedy with the Sentiments he makes his Actors express upon the Stage. Mr Barnes observes that, to support the Character of Sisyphus, it was necessary Euripides should make him reason like an Atheist, and therefore that Plutarch had no reason to find there the Trick of an Author; the Trick, I say, of safely delivering his own opinion under the name of another (158). 'Miror autem plurimum quid tanto viro persuaserit hæc vasse ab Euripide dicta sub Sisyphi persona, & poetæ ipsius esse sensus, cum nemo unquam exitit nostro poetæ pientior, ut ex innumeris ejus locis colligi potest, & Sisyphi characterem maxime decuit impie loqui: ut observavimus ad Bellerophon. (159). — I am much surprized what could persuade so great a Man, that Euripides had used a vicious cunning in speaking his own opinion in the Person of Sisyphus, when there never was a Man who paid a greater regard to Religion, as may be gathered from an infinite number of Passages in his Works, and it was highly agreeable to the Character of Sisyphus to speak prophetically, as I have observed on Bellerophon.' Grotius has judiciously said (160), 'Multa tragediis sunt non ex poetæ sensu dicta, sed congruenter personæ quæ loquens inducitur. — There are many things in Tragedies which are not agreeable to the Sense of the Poet, but to the Character of the Person introduced.' See la Chimere de la Cabale de Rotterdam démontrée (161), and what I have already said in the Remark [2] of the Article ERASMUS.

(158) Barnes.
Not. in Euripid.
Sisyphi Fragm.
pag. 492.

(159) The Fragments of this Piece contain the Discourse of a Man who positively denies a Providence, under pretence that wicked men are richer than good men.

(160) In Prefat.
ad Excerpta,
apud Barnes. in Vita Euripidis,
pag. 22.

(161) In the Preface, p. 210.

[CC] Two things . . . which are capable of a good or ill Construction. One day the People of Athens desiring him to strike out a certain Passage in a Tragedy of his: he came upon the Stage and told the People, I do not compose my Works to learn of you but to teach you. He complained once to the Poet Alceſtis, that for the last three Days he had not been able to make above three Verses, tho' he had studied with great Application; the other answered with an Air of Vanity, that he had made a hundred with ease: But, replied Euripides, there is this difference between your's and mine, that mine will continue thro' the utmost extent of time, and your's will perish in three Days. Valerius Maximus puts a favourable Interpretation upon all this. He can see no Footsteps of Pride in it. He finds nothing but that reasonable Confidence which a great Man ought to have in his own Merit. Nay, he assures us that, as to the first particular, they judged of it in Athens just as he judges.

Nec Euripides quidem Athenis, says he (162), arrogans visus est, cum postulante populo, ut ex tragedia quandam sententiam tolleretur, progressus in scenam dixit: Se, ut eum doceret, non ut ab eo diceretur, fabulas componere solere. Laudanda profecto fiducia est, quæ æstimationem sui certo pondere examinat, tantum sibi arrogans, quantum à contemptu & insolentia distare satis est. Itaque etiam quod Alceſtidi tragico poetæ respondit, probabile: apud quem cum quæreretur, quod eo triduo non ultra tres versus maximo impenso labore deducere potuisset, atque is se centum perfacile scripsisse gloriaretur: Sed hoc, inquit, interest, quod tui in triduum tantummodo, mei verò in omne tempus sufficient. Alterius enim fecundi cursus scripta intra primas memoriz metas corruerunt, alterius cunctante stylo elucubratum opus per omne ævi tempus plenis gloriæ velis feretur. — Nor did Euripides appear insolent at Athens, who, when the People demanded that he should strike out such a Sentence from one of his Tragedies, came on the Stage, and told them, that he wrote to teach, and not to learn. That assurance is certainly commendable which carefully weighs a Man's own worth, and assumes so much as will secure him from Contempt on one hand, or Insolence on the other. For which reason, the answer, which he gave to Alceſtis, the Tragic Poet, ought by no means to be condemned. Euripides had complained to him that in three Days he had not been able to write above three Verses, tho' he had laboured to his utmost; Alceſtis boasted that he had wrote a hundred with the greatest ease. But here, says Euripides, is the difference; your's will only live three Days, but mine to Eternity. For the over hasty Writings of the one perish in an Age; but the elaborate Works, and mature Productions of the other will be carried on the Wings of Fame for ever. No body is obliged to submit his own opinion to the Judgment of this Latin Writer, or to believe upon his Word, that the insulting Declaration of Euripides was well received at Athens. Therefore it is no wonder that Grotius, following his own Judgment, finds too much Haughtiness and Self-love, in these answers of the Greek Poet. He is only to be blamed, in pretending, that the Latin Author has produced them as a proof of Pride. At least, this is the fault Mr Barnes has reproached him with (163); after which, he makes this Reflexion upon the latter part of the Passage in Valerius Maximus: 'Vere hæc quidem Valerius, nam quum hodie ne tres quidem versus nedom unicus ullus ex innumeris jactabundi istius poetæ extemporanei versibus superesse videatur, sed neque ullum illorum vestigium ad Valerium ætatem perduravit, ad quam tamen omnia Euripidis opera solva & integra permanerunt, etiam post Valerii tempora jam mille & octingentos annos supersunt plures istius fabulæ integræ quam omnes Æschyli, Sophoclis, & Aristophanis tragediæ & comediæ simul sumptæ. — Valerius had reason to make this Assertion, since at this Day there are not three, not even one, of that vain-glorious Poet's extemporaneous Verses extant, nor did any Marks of them reach the times of Valerius, to which however all the Works of Euripides were conveyed safe and entire; nay, eighteen hundred Years after the Age of Valerius, there still survive more entire Plays of that Poet, than all the Tragedies and Comedies of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Aristophanes taken together.' Methinks, there are two

EURIPIDES
made Verses with difficulty.

(162) Val. M. x.
lib. iii, cap. vii,
ext. num. i.

(163) Lilius Gyraldus inco-gnitum dixit quod Poetam nostrum arrogan-tem & superbum
Valerius Maximus prodat, quum ta-men nobilis is author in eo ca-pit & loco quem Gyraldus delin-nat, nihil omnino tale in eo plane contrarium statu-at. Barnes. in Vita Euripid.
pag. 20.

accused of abusing Medea, out of Complaisance to the Corinthians [DD]. It is not true that in his Palamedes there is a tacit Insinuation of Reproach concerning the Death of Socrates [EE]. I wonder that a Particular we find in Eusebius, is mentioned by so few Authors [FF]. Moreri has committed some gross Mistakes [GG]. The best Edition things, which deserve censure in this Discourse. One is, that Valerius Maximus having lived under Tiberius, it cannot be said in the Year 1694, that he lived 1800 Years ago. The other, that there are still extant seven Tragedies of Æschylus, as many of Sophocles, and eleven Comedies of Aristophanes. All which together exceed in number the twenty Tragedies of Euripides, which we have left.

[DD] He is charged with having injured Medea out of Complaisance to the Corinthians. It is said the Corinthians killed Medea's Sons, and a long time after got Euripides to suppose that she had killed them herself. They add, that, by the great Reputation of this Poet, such a Fiction prevailed over the Truth (164), and that the City of Corinth discharged itself of the Infamy of their Crime, upon the Memory of the innocent Medea. The Author I cite does not say, this Translation of Scandal cost the Corinthians any thing but a Request, but others affirm it cost them five Talents. Which Sum they paid Euripides, if Parminiscus is to be believed (165). There are several Authors who say Medea did not kill her Children, and on the contrary that not being able to carry them with her, when she fled from Corinth, she took care to secure them in a Temple, where she hoped they would find an inviolable Sanctuary; but that the Corinthians murdered them there (166). It is alleged (167) in defence of Euripides, that he was not the first that charged Medea with the murder of her Children, since Carcinus (168) introduces her pleading her Cause against those who accused her of it, and Apollodorus (169) says positively that she killed the two Sons she had by Jason. Of these two Witnesses the first only can be of any service, for the latter lived 250 Years after Euripides. As to Carcinus he was before that Poet; he had a Son named Zenocles, who disputed the Tragic Prize with Euripides (170).

[EE] It is not true that in his Palamedes, there is a tacit Reproach concerning the Death of Socrates. The most uniform opinion in Authors, concerning the time of Euripides, is that he was born the first Year of the LXXVth Olympiad, and lived about Seventy five Years. So that his Death must be placed in the XCIIIrd Olympiad, as Suidas has done. Now it is certain that Socrates did not die till the XCVth Olympiad; so then it is not true that Euripides reproached the Athenians with the punishment of that Philosopher. Note, that Diodorus Siculus having said, that Apollodorus placed the Death of Euripides in the same Year with the Death of Sophocles, that is to say, in the third Year of the XCIII Olympiad, adds, that, according to others, Euripides had been torn in pieces by Dogs in Macedonia some time before (171). Observe also, I beseech you, these Words of Mr le Fevre (172): I am very well assured that Aristophanes exhibited the Comedy called Frogs in that same Olympiad XCII, and in that Play he speaks of Euripides as one who was already dead. Samuel Petit pretends to prove (173), that this piece appeared in the third Year of XCIII Olympiad. That is enough for me. I add, that the anonymous Author, who has given a Description of the Olympiads, puts under the XCIII the Contest between Euripides and Xenocles, in which Contest Palamedes was one of the four Tragedies produced by Euripides (174). Add to this the Authority of Philochorus, who wrote a particular Book upon the Life of Euripides (175). He says, in direct Terms, that the Execution of Socrates happened after the Death of that great Poet (176): and yet they had the boldness to publish, and that a great while ago, that Euripides drew Tears from all the Spectators by two Verses in his Palamedes pointing at the Death of Socrates. The story is as follows. Ὅσον λοιπὸν ἐκέλευσαν μὲν ἄνα δημοσίᾳ, οἷον ἐν κοινῷ θεάτρῳ, λέγων περὶ Σωκράτους. ἀμείλει λέγεται τι τοιοῦτον, ὥς ὅτι Εὐριπίδης βολόμενος εἰπεῖν περὶ αὐτοῦ, καὶ δειδύκτος, ἀπαλάσσεσθαι Παλαμήδην, ἵνα διὰ τὰς σχολῆς καὶ τὴν ἀντίθεσιν εἰς τὸν Σωκράτην, καὶ εἰς τὰς Ἀθηναίων ἐκάνετο ἐκάνετο τῶν ἑλλήνων τὸν ἄριστον, ὃς ἐν, ἐρονεύσατο. καὶ νοῦσαν, τὸ θεῖον ἄπαν ἐδάκρυσε, δίδυμι περὶ Σωκράτης ἠνίκτετο (177). Unde post edixerunt, ne quis in postero Socratis publice, ut in communi theatro, meminisset. Narratur autem hujusmodi quiddam accidisse: Euripidem, cum aliquid de eo dicere vellet, nec id tamen auderet, finxisse fabulam de Palamede, ut sub ejus persona occasionem haberet obsecrare ad Socratis interitum & factum Atheniensium alludendi, his verbis: 'Occidistis, occidistis Græcorum optimum.' Animadvertente autem populo, hæc verba ad Socratem pertinere: ortam in toto theatro esse complorationem. — For which reason they ordered that no one should speak openly, as on the public Theatre, concerning Socrates; which however is said to have been done, for Euripides being desirous to say something of him, but afraid to do it, composed his Palamedes, that he might have an opportunity, under that Mask, of alluding to the Death of Socrates, and the proceeding of the Athenians. Ye have slain, ye have slain the best of Greeks. Whereupon the whole Theatre burst into Tears, perceiving that the Words were applied to Socrates. Diogenes Laërtius (178) has related in a few words the principal Part of this false Adventure. Several of our most learned Moderns have adopted the same (179).

By the true date of Euripides's Death, Cælius Rhodiginus may be convicted of a notorious Falsity. He says (180), that the game of Cockals contained a number which rose to forty, and was called Euripides; and he gives this reason for it, that Euripides was one of the forty Magistrates, established in Athens after the Expulsion of the thirty Tyrants. How could he be one of those forty, when he died before Lysander made himself Master of Athens? Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hofman, have adopted this Error of Rhodiginus's entire.

[FF] Few have made mention of a thing which is to be found in Eusebius. By that account it looks as if Euripides had an Apartment in the Citadel of Athens, with a Pension from the Public. I shall relate the words of Oenomaus: and the learned may put what Construction they please upon them. Εἰ μὲν δὲ ὁ κρότος ἱκανὸς κριτῆς, καὶ ἡ ἐν Ἀκροπόλει τράπεζα, ἔδην ἐτι λέγων, βλέπων ἐν Ἀκροπόλει θωπεύοντα τὸν Εὐριπίδην, καὶ τὸν Ἀθηναίων ἄνα καὶ τὸν Μακεδόνων δῆμον ἐπιφορῶντα. Si ergo vel isti plausus, vel instructa in Arce mensa, idonei sunt hoc in genera arbitri, nihil addo: novi enim & in Arce Euripidem cenasse & Atheniensium atque Macedonum plausu celebratum eundem fuisse (181). — If therefore that Applause, and his Table in the Citadel, may be allowed in this Case as a sufficient Authority, I have nothing more to add: for I have known Euripides to sup in the Citadel, and honoured with the Acclamations of the Athenians and Macedonians.

[GG] Moreri has made some very gross mistakes. I. He ought not to have said, that our Poet was called the tragic Philosopher, but the Philosopher of the Stage. II. Instead of affirming that he was born at Phlia (182), he should have said in the Isle of Salamis. III. Since he was born the first Year of the LXXVth Olympiad, it is absurd to say he lived in that Olympiad; for that Expression is used to denote the time when a Man is most famous. IV. I have already observed (183) the Error of those who make him go into Egypt with Plato; V. And who affirm particularly, that he went thither after he had finished his Study of Rhetoric. VI. He would find it hard to prove that Decamnichus was the cause of Euripides's Death. The Authors who have preserved the Names of those that are charged with setting the Dogs upon him, never mention this Decamnichus. Therefore I wonder that Mr le Fevre insists so much upon this Name. VII. However, he should not have placed Decamnichus's Revenge against Euripides after the Death of Archelaus. Mr le Fevre took care to avoid this; and if Moreri had been a good Copier, he would have done the same: for it is certain Euripides died some Years before that Prince. VIII. To say, that Euripides died in the XCIII Olympiad at the Age of about Seventy five Years, when he had said before, that he lived in the LXXVth Olympiad,

(177) Anonymus, in Argumento Cræticis Socratis cui titulus Euripidis, pag. 232.

(178) Lib. II, in Socrate, n. 44.

(179) Daniel Heinsius, among others, in Delic. Tragicæ, Senecæ, apud Barnc. pag. 15.

(180) Antip. Lection. lib. II, cap. XXVI, pag. 115. Mr. Barnes, pag. 23, has observed this blunder, which he attributes not only to Rhodiginus, but also to Eusebius in Homer. fol. 1289, lin. 61.

(181) Oenomaus, apud Eusebium de Prep. Evang. lib. V, cap. XXXIII, pag. 228.

(182) See the Remark [A].

(183) See the Remark [B].

(164) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. V, cap. XXI.

(165) Apud Scholiasten Euripidis in Medæa, ver. 9. Mr Barnes, pag. 15, assures us that Plutarch, in the Life of Alexander, relates the same thing from Parmeniscus. I cannot find this in Plutarch.

(166) Parmeniscus & Didymus, apud Scholiasten Euripidis. lib. I. ver. 273. Didymus citat Creophylus. See Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. V, cap. XXI. & Apollodorus, Biblioth. lib. I.

(167) Barncf. in vita Euripidis, pag. 25.

(168) Apud Aristotel. Rhetor. lib. II, cap. XXIII, pag. 447.

(169) Biblioth. lib. I.

(170) Barncf. ubi supra.

(171) Diodor. Sicul. lib. XIII, cap. CIII, pag. m. 554.

(172) Vie des Poët. Grecs, pag. 85.

(173) Miscellan. lib. I, cap. XIV.

(174) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. II, cap. VIII, where it should be read ἀνεκδοκόν, and not ἔκταν, and then it will be found the XCIII Olympiad. See Schefferus in hunc locum Æliani.

(175) Suidas, in Φιλώκορος.

(176) Apud Diog. Laërt. lib. II, in Socrate, n. 44.

Edition of Euripides, is that which a Doctor of Cambridge published in Folio, in the Year 1694 [HH].

Olympiad, is to be ignorant of the Rudiments of his own Business as well as of Arithmetic. The worst Historians would never say, that a Man who lives in the LXXVth Olympiad, (that is, who is then in his flourishing State) and who dies in the XCIIIrd Olympiad, dies almost at the Age of Seventy five Years. Such a Man would at least have lived one entire Century. IX. He should not have said that this Poet retired after the Year of Rome 338, to Archelaus King of Macedonia: for since it must be affirmed that he died in the Year 348 of Rome, he was obliged to prove that he lived about ten Years at the Macedonian Court: a falsity condemned by all Authors, seeing they make Euripides stay but about three Years at Archelaus's Court. And we have already seen (184), that at Sixty nine Years of Age he exhibited his Orestes at Athens. X. The Citation of Diodorus Siculus l. 13. and that of Aulus Gellius l. 11. c. 4. are altogether unnecessary.

[HH] The best Edition . . . is that which a Doctor of Cambridge, published in Folio in 1694. His Name is Joshua Barnes. He has added Scholæ to it, and all the Fragments he could meet with. Many things he has illustrated by very learned Notes, and has prefixed to the Book a Life of Euripides full of Erudition.

I shall say a word or two of some of the former Editions. Gesner (185) observes that the first Edition of eighteen Tragedies of Euripides, is that of Venice by Aldus Manutius. It is in Greek only: he sets down neither the Year nor the size of it. I know from another Hand that Aldus printed this Poet without a Latin Version in the Year 1503, in 8vo. Hervae renewed this Edition at Basil in 1537, in 8vo, and in the Years 1544, and 1551 (186). They added to it a Latin Translation, word for word, in the Basil Edition by Robert Winter in the Year 1541 (187). The Translator conceals himself under the borrowed Name of Dorotheus Camillus (188). John Oporin printed an Edition of Euripides in Folio, in 1562, in Greek and Latin, containing the Notes and Prefaces of Gaspard Stiblinus, the Prolegomena of James Micyllus, and some Remarks of John Brodæus. The Edition of Plantinus, in 16mo, at Antwerp, 1571, contains one thing which was wanting in the preceding Editions: the Verses are there distinguished, each being placed in it's Line, according to its measure and length. William Canterus made this Division. Paul Stephens published Euripides in Greek and Latin, with the ancient Scholiast, and the Commentaries of Brodæus, Canterus, Stiblinus, and Portus, in the Year 1602, in 4to. The Edition I use is of Heidelberg, by Jerom Commelinus, 1597, in 8vo. It is in Greek and Latin: the Verses are ranged according to the order which Canterus assigned them: the Translation was revised by Emilius Portus: they added to the nineteen Tragedies of Euripides, the beginning of the twentieth intituled Danaë. Some Tragedies have been published separately, which were translated by different Hands. They printed four (189) at Antwerp, in 1581, translated into Latin Verse by Ratallerus. Erasmus translated into Iambic Verse, Hecuba and Iphigenia in Tauris, and this Version was printed at Venice, by Aldus, in 1507, in 8vo. Florent Christiamus has translated into Latin Verse, Andromacha and the Cyclop.

(186) See the Catalogue of the Library of Nicolas Heinflus, Part II, pag. 118.

(187) Gesner. Biblioth. folio 229, verso.

(188) Id. ibid.

(189) Viz. Phænissæ, Hippolytus, Corontus, & Andromacha.

(a) Others make her the Daughter of Phœnix. Apollodorus, l. iii, init.

(b) See Ovid. Metam. lib. ii, Fab. xiii, ver. 835, & seq.

EUROPA, the Daughter of Agenor (a), King of Tyre. The Poets have feigned that Jupiter disguised himself in the Shape of a Bull to carry off this Princess, and that he conveyed her into the Isle of Crete (b), where he had three Sons by her. Those who reduce the poetical Fictions, as near as possible, into historical Truths, say, that Taurus, General of the Troops of Asterius, King of Crete, having taken the City of Tyre, pillaged it, and carried away a great Number of the Female Inhabitants Prisoners, and among the rest Europa the King's Daughter [A]. She married Asterius, who, having no Children by her, adopted those she had had by her Lover [B]. They pretended that Jupiter enjoyed her the first time under a Plane Tree [C], which, from [A] Taurus General of the Troops . . . carried away . . . Europa the King's Daughter. I have followed the opinion of Meursius, though it is confirmed only by the single Testimony of Tzetzes (1), and though a great number of Authors maintain that Taurus was King of Crete. This is the Title that is given him by the Chronicon Alexandrinum, Eustathius, and Cedrenus (2). Be that as it will, Taurus, either King of Crete, or only Commander of the Troops of the Cretan King, made War with Agenor, and took from him the City of Tyre, and his Daughter Europa (3). He was a Native of Gnosus a City of Crete (4), and built in that Island the City of Gortys (5). Giving it the Name of his Mother.

[B] Asterius . . . not having Children by her, adopted those she had had by her Lover. It is justly suspected (6), that he was but a Child when Europa was carried away by Jupiter. When he married her, she was the Mother of Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Sarpedon, three Boys of Jupiter's begetting. Asterius adopted them, and left his Kingdom to Minos. This is what we find in Diodorus Siculus (7). Apollodorus says very near the same in his third Book. It is true the Prince who married her is not called there Asterius, but Asterion. In Eusebius's Chronicon, those three Children are not the Sons of Jupiter and Europa, but of Asterius and Europa, of Asterius, I say, who married her after Jupiter had enjoyed her. St. Austin says that it was Xanthus, King of Crete, who carried away Europa, and had by her Rhadamanthus, Sarpedon, and Minos. He owns they give that Monarch other Names: 'Per eos annos, says he (8), à Rege 'Xantho Cretensium, cujus apud alios aliud nomen invenimus, rapta perhibetur Europa, & inde geniti 'Rhadamanthus, Sarpedon & Minos, quos magis ex eadem muliere filios Jovis esse vulgatum est. —

About that time, says he, Europa is reported to

'have been carried away by Xanthus, King of Crete, (tho' his Name, I find, is changed by some Authors) and had by her Rhadamanthus, Sarpedon, and Minos, tho' they are more commonly taken for the Sons of 'of Jupiter and Europa. Nonnus pretends that Jupiter having got Europa with Child, married her, big as she was, to a very rich Person, viz. to Asterion.

Καὶ ζαδὸς ὠδίνος ἐν ἐγύμνα νύμφη καλλίπην Ἀστερίου βαδυνάτω παρακοίτη Ζεὺς πόσις.

Et sancti partus suam gravidam Nympham
Reliquit Asterioni opulento conjugi
Jupiter maritus (9).

Big with immortal Seed and Birth Divine,
To rich Asterion Jove the Fair resign'd.

This is the frequent practice of Kings: they marry to wealthy Men the Fair they have enjoyed as long as they pleased. Lyophron (10) insinuates, that it was for Asterion's sake that Europa was carried away.

[C] It was pretended that Jupiter enjoyed her under a Plane Tree. I think Theophrastus and Pliny are the only ancient Authors that can be cited for it. Pliny says (11): 'Est Gortynæ in insula Creta, juxta fontem Platanus una, insignis utriusque lingue monumētis, nunquam folia dimittens: statimque ei Græciæ fabulosis superstit, Jovem sub ea cum Europa concubuisse: cu vero non alia ejusdem generis esset in Cypro. Sed ex ea primum in ipsa Creta (ut est natura hominum novitatis avida). Platani fatæ regenerare vitium: quandoquidem commendatio arboris ejus non alia major est quam fo-

(9) Nonnus, Dionys. lib. i, ver. 353.

(10) In Cassandri, ver. 1300.

(11) Plin. lib. xii, cap. i.

There

(184) Above, in Remark [S], Citat. (123).

(185) Gesner. in Biblioth. folio 229, verso.

(1) In Lyophron, apud Meursium in Creta, pag. 125.

(2) Apud Meursium, ibid. pag. 251.

(3) Chronicon Alexandrinum: Palæphatus, (cap. xvi.) Eustathius ad Dionysium: Cedrenus, apud Meursium, ibid.

(4) Palæphat. & Tzetzes, ibid.

(5) Chronicon Alexandrinum: Eustathius, Cedrenus, apud Meursium, ibid.

(6) Meursius, ibid. pag. 124.

(7) Diod. Sicul. lib. iv, lib. lxxii.

(8) August. de Civit. Dei, lib. xviii, cap. xii.

from that Time, had a particular Privilege, viz. of preserving it's fine Leaves all the Year. It was also said that Europa, having lost her Maidenhead, immediately went and washed herself in a certain Water, which had a wonderful Property [D].

There is, at Gortyna, in the Island of Crete, near a Fountain, one Plane Tree, which never loses its Leaves, and which is famous in the Monuments of both Languages. The fabulous Greeks immediately pretended, that Jupiter lay with Europa under this Tree, as if there had not been another of the same nature in Cyprus. But, as Mankind is naturally fond of Novelty, they planted slips of this Tree in Crete, which still retained the fault of that from whence they were derived; for the greatest Recommendation of the Plane Tree is, that it keeps off the Sun in Summer, and admits it in the Winter.' These πρωταίης words seem to imply that Europa was upon the Tree, when Jupiter diverted himself with her the first time; and it is said, there are Medals which favour this Explication. Ἐν Κρήτῃ δὲ λέγεται παλαιάν τινά εἶναι ἐν τῇ Γορτυνίᾳ πρὸς πηγῇ τινὶ τὴν ἑκαλλοβολεῖν. μυθολογοῦσι δὲ ὅτι ἐπὶ ταύτῃ εἰμίτῃ τῇ Εὐρώπῃ τὸ Ζεὺς. In Creta insula quæ Gortynensi platano apud fontem quendam seorsum asseverant quæ nunquam folia deperdit. Jovem sub ea cum Europa concubuisse fabulantur (12). But to pass this by, let us consider Pliny's Expression. I confess I do not understand the entire Force of it. He observes very ingeniously that fabulous Greece was not wanting to itself upon seeing a Plane Tree of so singular a Nature: it presently laid hold of this opportunity to build Fictions upon it, and supposed that this Tree was not possessed of such a Privilege, but for affording it's shade to the greatest of the Gods, whilst he took possession of a Maidenhead. Pliny confutes this Chimeræ for this reason, that, in the Isle of Cyprus, there was a Plane Tree of the same nature. So far every thing is plain: but he adds, that they were desirous to have Plants from this Plane Tree, first in divers Places of the Island of Crete, and then in Italy, and that the Planes, which were derived from this Tree, propagated the same Defects; for what is most valuable in this kind of Trees, is to keep off the Sun in Summer, and to admit him in Winter. Here is a thought of Pliny which seems to me very confused. Probably it is because I do not understand it: tho' perhaps it may be a very fine and delicate one. The most natural Sense that I can find is this. All the Planes derived from this had the same fault of never losing their Leaves; they were deprived of the chief Perfection of the Trees of this kind, that is to say, they had not the property of giving Passage to the Sun in Winter, and of being impenetrable to his Rays in Summer. I find two great Inconveniences in taking Pliny's Text in this manner: one is, that there is no probability that, in the Isle of Crete and in Italy, there were many Planes which preserved their Verdure all the Year: the other is, that it cannot be conceived to be a Perfection in a Tree to lose it's Leaves in the Winter. Is not the Laurel the Symbol of Victory, because it has not this pretended Perfection? What Service can it be, that a Tree is without Leaves in the cold Season? Is it that one may sit under it's Branches without losing the warmth of the Sun? but what People are so simple, as to go into the Sun in cold weather under a Tree full of Branches? do they not look out for a Wall or a Hedge, which on one side guards them from the Winds, and on the other receives the Rays of the Sun? No doubt, Du Pinet, was sensible of this difficulty; but instead of endeavouring to solve it, he skips over it. His Version is as follows. ' At Cortina, a City in the Isle ' of Crete, is to be seen another Plane Tree near a ' very fine Fountain, on which account it is celebra- ' ted both by Greeks and Latins. For this Plane ' Tree is always green Summer and Winter: so ' that the Poets, who leave nothing untouched, say, it ' was under this Plane Tree that Jupiter deflowered ' the Princess Europa: as if there were no other ' Plane Trees in Cyprus of the same nature with this. ' But as Men are always curious of new things, ' the Cretans, desiring to have Plants from this Plane ' Tree, set scyons from it in many Places, and find- ' ing that these replanted Plane Trees served only to ' keep off the heat of the Sun in Summer, but ' lost their leaves in Winter; they were confuted in ' their opinion concerning the deflowering of Europa.

[D] It is said she went to wash herself in a certain Water, which had a wonderful Property. I have been forced to use the Word Water, because the Authors who tell us this Story neither use the Words River nor Fountain; and therefore the learned Meursius speaks of this Water, after he has mentioned all the Rivers and Fountains of the Isle of Crete. 'Et hi, says he (13), 'quidem fontes pariter fluvium in hac insula memorantur, præter quos & aqua fuit, cui si qui pluvius tempore infunderet, illi sicci permanebant. Solon. De Flum. 'Εν Κρήτῃ ὁχετός ὕδατος ἔστιν, ὃν οἱ διαβαίνοντες, ὅσους τὸ Διός, ἄρροχοι διασέσωσιν, ἐφ' ὅσον ἐν τῷ ὁχετῷ εἴσιν. In Crete aqua rivus est, quem qui transeunt, pluvie Jove, sicci faciunt, quamvis quidem sunt in rivis. Et Europa, post concubium cum Jove, cap. 129. ferebatur. Antigonus Caristius, Hist. Mirab. cæ. 102. Καὶ περὶ τὴ κατὰ τὴν Κρήτην ὕδασις, ἣ οἱ ἑπερχομίζοντες, ὅταν ὑπὸ τῆς, διασέσωσιν ἄρροχοι. παραδεδωσάν τῃ τοῖς Κρησὶν, ἀπ' ἐκείνου λίσσασάν τὴν Εὐρώπην, ἀπὸ τῆς τῆς Διὸς μίθου. Item de aqua in Crete, cui infunderet, dum pluit, sicci manent: ac tradi apud Cretenses, eâ se Europam quandam abluisse, postquam cum Jove rem habuisset. — These are the Fountains and Rivers: taken notice of in Crete, besides which there was a Water, into which they who entered, whilist it rained, remained dry. Europa is said to have washed there, after she had lain with Jupiter.' In favour of those who do not understand Latin, I must tell them the Privileges of this Water. Those who went into it, whilist it rained, did not wet themselves. The Authors, cited by Meursius, do not say, that Jupiter bestowed this Privilege in consideration of the Service this Water did Europa, or rather in consideration of the Honour Europa condescended to do the Waters; but without doubt the Inhabitants of Crete had recourse to that Cause. I wonder they have not given us the exact Situation of that Water; for since they knew where the Plane Tree stood, under which the amorous Mythry was celebrated (14), they must have known also where Europa bathed herself, when the Sport was over. To conclude: I observe that Europa entered the Isle of Crete, by the Mouth of the River that ran through Gortyna. Gortynum annis Lethæus præterfluit: quo Europa tauri domo Gortynii ferunt veritatem (15). — The River Lethe runs by Gortina, through which Europa is said to have been carried upon a bull's Back.

(13) Metastasis,
in Creta, pag. 52.

(14) Est Gortynae in insula Creta JUXTA FON-TEM platanus una, &c. Plin.
lib. xii, cap. i,
See, above, the Remark [C].
Citat. (11).

(15) Solin. cap.
xi.

EUSTACHE (DAVID), a Minister of the Protestant Church at Montpellier, and a Native of Dauphiné (a), published some Sermons, and some controversial Writings [A], which gained him Reputation. He assisted at the National Synod at London, as Deputy of the Province of Lower Languedoc, in the Year 1659, and was nominated, by the Assembly, to carry to the King the Letter they had written to his Majesty. He harangued that Monarch, who was then at Toulouse, and also the Queen-Mother, and Cardinal Mazarin, and came off with Applause. He died some Years after, leaving only two Daughters.

[A] He published some Sermons, and some controverſial Writings.] He published Les Remedes ſalutaires contre la ſeparation d'avec Dieu, in the Year 1645. La Viſtoire de la Foy. An Answer to Father Meynier, a Jeſuit, his Conference with Diſdier Barnuel, Curate of Entraigues (1). This is all the Bibliothèque of Dauphiné says of him. I add to this, that David Eustache is the Author of a Book divided into two Parts, which serves for an Answer to the Question that was asked the Protestants, Where was your Church before

(1) Allard,
Biblioth de Dauphiné, p. 94

before Luther? He published, in 1660, a little anonymous Book, intitled, L'Orateur Tertulle convaincu: it is an Answer to the Harangue supposed to be made by the wise Men of the pretended Reformed Religion, to the Queen Maria Theresia, upon her Entrance into the Kingdom, wherein they declared, that being informed she had expressed a great concern, that part of the King her Husband's Subjects were Heretics, they came to lessen that concern by embracing her Majesty's Religion, and that this they did after having been satisfied, by the Testimony of their most famous Authors, that one may be saved in the Romish Religion. It was not doubted but the Jesuit Meynier was the Author of that Harangue. He took great delight in that common Topic, and pushed it much farther some time after, in a Book which he intituled Mon- tauban justifié (2).

(2) See the Remark of the Article MON- TAUBAN.

EXPERIENS (PHILIP CALLIMACHUS), was one of those learned Italians who formed an Academy in the XVth Century, and gave themselves a new Name: He changed that of Geminianus (a), into Callimachus. Pope Paul II suspected some great Mystery in it: and looking upon that Company of learned Men, as a Gang of Conspirators, he committed them to Prison, and put them to the Rack, with great Cruelty (b). It was upon this Occasion that Platina was so severely treated, as we shall see in his Article. Callimachus was reckoned the Head of the Conspiracy, and in vain did Platina argue the Incapacity of that Man for such an Enterprize [A], and also the Hatred that there was between him and Callimachus: he was treated as one of the Conspirators. When they had sufficiently tormented these unfortunate Men, and discovered the Chimera of the pretended Plot, they were set at Liberty. Callimachus, full of Rage, abandon'd Italy, and retired into Poland, where the Court was extremely dissatisfied with the Conduct of the Pope (c). King Casimir gave him an honourable Reception, and made him Preceptor to his Son Albert; he also employed him in several Embassies (d). Callimachus insinuated himself, in such a manner, into the good Opinion of his Pupil, that he had great Credit in his Reign. This was very grievous to the Poles, and especially after the Battle they lost in Moldavia. They imagined Cal-

(a) This Surname fitted him, because he was born at Sangemini in Tuscany.

(b) See Platina, in the Life of Paul II.

(c) Jovius, Elog. cap. xli.

(d) Spondan. Annal. ad anm. 1496, num. 6.

limachus

[A] In vain did Platina urge the Incapacity of that Person. Platina speaks very contemptuously of Callimachus: he represents him, both for Body and Mind, as a Man void of the Qualifications necessary for a Conspirator. He is, says he, a fat unwieldy Fellow, that can hardly stir, and besides, has lost his Sight. It is hard to reconcile this with the Credit of Callimachus at the Polish Court, and with the Intrigues which made him so odious to the Poles. It is not improbable that Platina speaks like a Rhetorician and an Enemy. I mean that he cries down Callimachus, to confute the Accusation that was brought against himself, and because he hated him. 'Respondeo me nunquam consilium Callimachi participem fuisse, quippe cum inter nos simulatus esse haud parva (1). —

(1) Platina, in Paulo II, fol. m. 357, verso.

(2) Spondan. ad anm. 1496, sub fin.

(3) Platina, ubi supra, fol. 356, verso.

(4) Jovius, Elog. cap. xli.

(5) Ea nominum invidiosa populo, in pastor offensi, quasi occulte conspirationis visera esset, Platina & Callimachus tanquam impios & maleficos tormentis excruciat. Oliv. Ferrarius, Præf. pag. 88.

'I answer, that I had never been associated with Callimachus in any design, there being a considerable misunderstanding betwixt us.' Spondanus (2) cannot believe that a Man, such as Platina describes Callimachus to be, could have made himself so acceptable at the Court of the Polish Kings. Let the Reader determine this. Platina's Words are. 'Tum ego cum viderem omnia armis & tumultu circumsonare, veritus ne quid gravius ob formidinem & iram in nos consuleretur, rationes attuli quamobrem crederem Callimachus nil tale aliquid unquam molitum nedium mediatum fuisse, qui cum consilio, lingua, manu, sollicitudine, opibus, copiis, clientelis, armis, pecuniis, oculis postremo careret. Cæculus enim & P. Lentulo somniculosior, ac L. Crasso ob adipem tardior (3). — When I saw therefore, that all was in an uproar, and that we were in the utmost danger from all Parts, fearing least amidst this Alarm, and in the Height of Passion, we should have found a more severe Usage, I gave my Reasons why I thought that Callimachus never would nor ever had designed to engage in such Attempts, having neither Conduct, Elocution, Courage, Foresight, Substance, Forces, Friends, nor Money: in short, that he was half blind; that he was more drowsy than P. Lentulus, and more unwieldy than M. Crassus.' I wonder at one thing, that Platina, who names several of those who were put to the Torture for this Conspiracy, does not say whether Callimachus was one of the Number. According to Paul Jovius he was one of them. 'Ipse ante alios desumpti Græci nominis reus tormentis & carcere penas daret (4). — He particularly was condemned for assuming a Greek Name, put to the Rack, and imprisoned.' Olivarius Ferrarius may incline us to believe, that Callimachus was not imprisoned, though he assures the contrary (5): for he observes that Callimachus was not at Rome when the News of this pretended Conspiracy was carried to the Pope. 'Nam cum falso rumore delatus fuisset Callimachus Umbraticus vir, inermis & abdomine tardus adversus Sacrorum Regem conspirasse, jamque multos affectas habere, & ad urbem perendam resque immutandas festinare, iterum Platina in vincla conjectus est tanquam conjurationis conficius (6). — A false Rumour being spread, that Callimachus, a harmless, weak, unwieldy Man, had conspired against the Pope, had got together a great number of Followers, and was marching in all haste to lay waste the City, and subvert the Government, Platina was again put in Irons as an Accomplice.' I am very much afraid that Ferrarius gives us here a falsified Relation. The reason of my Suspicion is, that Platina speaks of two false Alarms given at the same time: one was the pretended Conspiracy of Callimachus; the other was a pretended Insurrection not far from Rome. It was reported that Luke Totius (7), who had been driven out of Rome, and had retired to Naples, was coming back, accompanied with many other Exiles. Whereupon the Pope was apprehensive of being oppressed both within and without. It is plain, that he who was said to be advancing with all speed to lay waste Rome, could not be Callimachus, and consequently Ferrarius seems to be under a Mistake. A better Judgment may be formed of this if the following Words of Platina are considered. 'Nunciatum ei (Paulo) quosdam adolescentes duce Callimacho in eum conspirasse; cui præ timore vix respiranti, nescio quo fato novus etiam terror additur. Advolat etiam quidam cognomento philosophus homo facinorosus & exul, qui vitam primo & reditum in patriam deprecatus nunciat, ac falso quidem, Lucam Totium Romanum civem Neapoli exultantem, cum multis exulibus in nemoribus Veliteris à se visum, ac paulo post affuturum. Timere Paulus ac magis trepidare tum cepit: veritus ne domi & foris opprimeretur (8). — The Pope being informed, that some young Men, under the Command of Callimachus, had formed a Conspiracy against him, was thereby struck half dead with fear, and by some ill Fate, or other his Fright was doubled. There came in also in great haste a notorious wicked Fellow, surnamed the Philosopher, one that had been banished; who having first sued for his Life, and Liberty to return into his Country, declared, and that falsely, that he had seen, in the Woods of Velitra, Totius, a Citizen of Rome, banished to Naples, with many other Exiles; and that he would be at Rome immediately. Paul began then to be seized with terror, fearing he should be attacked both within the Walls and without.' It is plain from this, that, according to the false Alarm, the danger they feared from Callimachus was already in the City itself, and that it was Totius who was advancing towards the City. Logicians make too much use of the Art of distinguishing, and Orators are in the other extrem.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Other Editions say Tortius.

(8) Platina, ubi supra.

VOL. II.

10 N

[B] The

(e) Ex Jovio Elogio, cap. xli.

(f) And not 1496, as Moseri says.

(g) In Biblioth. vet. & nova, pag. 355.

(h) He was successively Palatine, and Castellan of Cracow, and Great Marshal of Poland. Pol. Mich. Brutus, ubi infra.

(i) Joh. Mich. Brutus, Epistol. lib. iv, pag. 546, Edit. 1698.

(k) Popelin. Hist. dea kili. p. 430.

limachus was the Cause of that bloody Loss, and that he had advised the King to expose the greatest part of the Nobility to Slaughter [B]; that he had advised it, I say, as the most effectual Means to establish an arbitrary Government in Poland. The Indignation they conceived against him, on this account, alarmed him to such a Degree, that, not daring to appear abroad, he concealed himself at the House of an intimate Friend in a Village. He died in this Retirement, they durst not divulge his Death, but dried his Body by the heat of a Furnace, and kept it in a Cupboard. King Albert, being informed of this, ordered it to be carried to Cracow, and to be buried in the Church of the Trinity, where he erected a brazen Tomb over him (e). This is the Account given by Paul Jovius [C]; but the Polish Historians say nothing like it. They assure us, that Callimachus died in Peace and Quietness at Cracow, the first of November, 1496 (f), and was honourably interred there. Mr Konig (g) supposes, without Reason, that Philip Callimachus, and Callimachus Experiens, were two Authors. Callimachus composed some Histories, which are tolerably good [D].

There is a Letter of his, in which he complains that the Diet of Petricow had resolved to deliver him up to the Pope, and in which he affirms that his Enemies could not have treated him with so much Cruelty, if Andrew Sborow (b) had been at the Diet (i). This he wrote to that Polish Lord. Those who pretend to say, with la Popeliniere, that he lived about the Year 1552, are grossly mistaken (k).

[B] The Poles . . . imagined . . . he had advised the King to expose the greatest part of the Nobility to Slaughter. Paul Jovius mentions it as a certain Matter of Fact. 'Callimachus ab Alberto . . . post Casimir patris interitum, ad summum familiaritatis, atque potentia locum evectus est, tanta Polonorum consuetudine, odioque ut eum tanquam impium, & Moldavice cladis autorem, tyrannidemque impotentis imperio exercendam Regi suaderet, aula extruserint. Maligno enim judicio nobilitatem, quod imperata pecunie, & suscepto bello adversa esset, sævo hosti objectandam esse censuerat, ut nemo demum superesset, qui libertatis per manum tradita jura tueretur (9). — After the Death of Casimir, his Son Albert raised Callimachus to the highest degree of Familiarity and Power; whereat the Poles were so surprized and exasperated that they expelled him the Court, as a wicked Man, who had been the Cause of that dreadful Loss which they had sustained in Moldavia, and had counselled the King to render himself arbitrary. For he had, in the most iniquitous manner, advised the exposing to the Fury of the Enemy those who had opposed the levying of Money, and the undertaking of the War, that none might survive to defend the Cause of Liberty.' This is giving a black Idea of this Person, and whoever could be guilty of such Wickedness might also have done what Paul II suspected.

[C] This is the Account given by Paul Jovius. It has been justly said, that he is not sufficient to balance the Polish Writers, and that he took too much Pleasure in collecting together popular Traditions (10). 'Ejus obitus Jovius in Elogiis, ex vulgi fabulis, ut affolet, Vilnæ (11) in exilio contigisse refert: quem auctores Poloni quibus magis credendum placide

Cracoviae contigisse, & amplo funere honestatum esse asserunt. — Jovius, from vulgar Reports, according to his custom, says that Callimachus died at Vilna in exile; but the Polish Writers, whose Authority ought rather to be credited, affirm, he died at Cracow in peace, and was there enter'd with great Magnificence.' Vossius (12) makes the same Judgment of Paul Jovius.

[D] He composed some Histories which are tolerably good. The Relation of what the Venetians did to engage the Persians and Tartars in a War with the Turks, the Life of Attila, and the History of Ladislaus, King of Hungary, killed at the Battle of Varnes, are the principal Works of Callimachus. In this latter History he has excelled all those, who since Tacitus have set up for Historians. This is the Judgment of Paul Jovius. 'Adeo eleganter ejus gravissimi muneris legis implevisse existimatur, ut omnes qui à Cornelio Tacito per tot secula id scribendi genus attigerint meo judicio superarint (13).' This History of Ladislaus was written at the Desire of Matthias Hunniades, King of Hungary, who magnificently rewarded the Author of it (14).

This Man managed his Affairs successfully in those cold Countries. He went thither poor, and grew very rich there. 'Ad hos Callimachus Geminianensis meus familiaris penetravit, ubi & literis & ingenii solertia ex paupere dives magnopere apud eos reges quibus erat dilectus ante hos annos decessit (15). — Callimachus, my intimate Friend, made his way thither, where, by his Learning and his Address, he raised himself a plentiful Fortune from mean Circumstances, and died greatly esteemed by the Kings that employed him.' Consult the Thirtieth Book of Martin Cromerus's History of Poland.

(12) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. p. 620.

(13) Jovius, ubi supra.

(14) Vossius, ubi supra, pag. 619.

(15) Volaterranus, lib. vii, cap. de Polonia, pag. 257.

(a) Ezek. i. 3.

(b) Epiphanius, in vita Ezechielis.

(c) Ezek. i. 2.

(d) Epiphanius, ubi supra.

(e) Idem, ibid.

EZEKIEL, one of the four great Prophets, whose Writings make a part of the Old Testament, was the Son of Buzi the Priest (a), and descended from a High-Priest (b). He was carried to Babylon with King Jechonias, and began to prophesy five Years after (c), which he continued to do for twenty Years together (d). He was killed by the Commander of the Jews in those Parts, an idolatrous Man who could not bear the Reproofs of the Prophet (e). Ezekiel was buried in the Sepulchre of Sem [A], to which great Crowds of People resorted, from a Principle of Devotion. One Day the Chaldeans formed a Design of cutting these devout People to pieces; but they found in Ezekiel another Moses [B]. This is what is inserted in the Life of this great Prophet,

[A] Ezekiel was buried in the Sepulchre of Sem. The Author I cite (1) assures us, that this Tomb is still to be seen, composed of two Caves; but an Author who lived under the Reign of Constantine (2) relates, that Ezekiel's Sepulchre was the same with that of Job, Jesse, and David, near Bethlehem. Benjamin Tudelenus (3) says, that King Jechonias, having been set at Liberty, went with Thirty five thousand Jews, to build a magnificent Vault upon Ezekiel's Tomb, between the Chobar and the Euphrates. He pretends that Jechonias, and all those who had followed him, were to be seen painted on the Walls of the Vault. The Picture of Jechonias was the first, and that of Ezekiel the last. We shall mention, below, what that Author says of the Pilgrimages and Devotions which were performed at that Monument.

[B] The Chaldeans found in Ezekiel another Moses. The Chaldeans were under some Apprehensions at the sight of such a concourse of Pilgrims; wherefore they resolved one Day to put an end to those Assemblies, by putting all those to the Sword who were about the Tomb; but the Prophet stopp'd the Waters of the River, and ordered it so, that when the Israelites had gained the farther side, all the Chaldeans that durst follow them were drowned. He obtained also for the same Devotees, who were dying for hunger, a great multitude of Fish. It is pretended that, during his Life, he was transported out of Chaldea into Judea, in

(1) Epiphanius, (aut qui sub nomine Epiphani scriptis Vitas Prophetarum) in vita Ezechielis.

(2) Scriptor Itinerarii Hierosolymitani, apud Huet. Demonst. Evangel. p. 458, Edit. Lips. 1694.

(3) In Itinerario, pag. 8, & seq.

Prophet, attributed to St Epiphanius. He also mentions some other Miracles of the same Prophet. The Jews, infatuated with their Superstitions, and absurd Whims, have told a thousand strange things about his Tomb [C]. Some of their Doctors have given out, in order to convince the Unbelievers (4). If Abraham had depended upon that, he might have said that Ezekiel prophesied both in Canaan and Chaldea; he might, I say, have maintained it without fear of being refuted in the manner that Mr Huet refutes him. 'Facebat etiam Abraham qui Ezechiel & in terra Canaan, & extra eam vaticinium esse docet, cum quinto demum post deportationem suam anno futura prædicere aggressus sit (5). — Little Credit deserves Abraham, who says that Ezekiel prophesied both in Canaan and out of it, since he did not begin till the fifth Year after he had been taken Captive.'

(4) Ex Epiphanius, in vita Ezechielis.

(5) Huet. Dem. Evang. p. 458.

(6) In Itinerario, pag. 782, & seq.

[C] The Jews tell a thousand strange things about Ezekiel's Tomb. Benjamin Tudensis, who lived in the XIIth Century, assures us (6), that even to his time the Tomb of that Prophet had been looked upon as a holy Place; that they came thither to pray out of the most distant Countries; that those devout Pilgrimages began with the Year and continued till the Feast of Expiation; that the chief of the Jewish People did not fail to come from Bagdat to that Sanctuary, and pitch their Tents twelve Miles round it; that the Arabian Merchants held a Fair there; that upon the Day of Expiation they exposed to view a great Book written with the Prophet's own Hand, and read it; and that after the Prophet himself had lighted a Lamp upon his Sepulchre, they had never suffered it to go out, taking great care to supply it with Oil and Cotton; as often as there was occasion; that there was a very fine Library there, to which all those, who died without Children, bequeathed their Books; that even the Sons of the Mahometan Lords went thither to pray, such Veneration had they for Ezekiel; that all the Arabians did the same; and so much was this holy Place respected on account of the blessed Ezekiel, that even in time of War, neither Mahometans nor Jews would do any Body there an Injury.

(7) R. Petachias Ratibonensis. He lived in the XII Century: his Travels were published in Hebrew and Latin by Mr. Wagnier, in 1687.

Another Rabbi (7) tells us still more wonderful things; A King of Babylon being desirous to see the Relics of the Prophet Ezekiel, that great worker of Miracles, they answered him that it was impossible: As he was a Saint, you cannot, said they, dig him up. This answer not satisfying him, they desired him to make a Trial upon the Sepulchre of Baruch the Disciple of Ezekiel. Therefore he gave orders for Baruch to be dug up; but all those who attempted it fell down dead. By the advice of an Israelite, he commanded the Jewsto dig him up; they prepared themselves for the work by a fast of three days, and effected it without any Damage; the King, finding that it was too much for one place to have the Sepulchre of Ezekiel and that of Baruch, ordered the Coffin of the latter to be carried elsewhere. When they had carried it one mile, the Bearers had not strength to go a step farther: the Horses and Mules they would have made use of were under the same Incapacity (8). The Rabbi Solomon explained in this manner the Prodigy: It is here, said he, this is the place the Prophet chuses to be buried in. They acquiesced in his Interpretation, and built there a fine Monument to Baruch. What follows, relates to the Tomb of Ezekiel. It is situated in a Wood at a Day's Journey, or half a Day's Journey, from Bagdat, surrounded with a Wall, and accompanied with a fine Edifice: there is only one small Door in the Wall which the Jews keep the Key of: when they would go in by this Door, they are forced to creep upon all four, the Door is so low; but the day of the Feast of Tabernacles, a Day when prodigious Crowds of People throng thither (9), the Gate enlarges and rises of itself, so as Persons, mounted on Camels, may enter in by it; as soon as the Feast is over, the Door returns to its former Condition, and that in the sight of all the People, who are there to bring their Offering to Ezekiel's Tomb. There are no Evils, against which they recommended themselves with greater Devotion, or more frequently to the Intercession of this Prophet, than that of Barrenness. A Man who finds himself unable to beget Children, or a Woman who perceives herself not able to conceive, generally have recourse, and make their Vows at the Tomb of this Prophet. They also have recourse to it for the Barrenness of their Cattle (10). A Prince who had a barren Mare, and

(9) The number of the Jews that come there is from 60 to 80000 men. Peregrin. R. Petachias, apud Joh. Christoph. Wagnier, in Epiphanius, Exercit. IV, pag. 179.

(10) Compare with this what is read in Dr Burnet's Supplement to his Travels, pag. 193, of Beasts blessed at Rome upon St Anthony's Day.

who lived four Days Journey from this Sepulchre, engaged himself by a Vow to consecrate the Colt to the Prophet, if his Mare should have one. The Mare brought a Colt, which the Prince kept himself, finding it a very fine one. But the Colt ran away, and went of himself directly to Ezekiel's Tomb, where the Door in the Wall opened also of itself to let him enter. The Prince not being able to find his Colt, tho' he had searched every where with the utmost Diligence for him, his Vow suggested to him, that perhaps he should hear of him at the Prophet's Tomb. He found him there accordingly, but could not get him out, the Door being too narrow to let him pass through. Whereupon, by the advice of a Jew, he laid pieces of Silver upon the Tomb, and when he had laid to the value of the Colt, the Door widened as much as was requisite. 'Pauxillatim successive coufique Argentum monumento ingessit quoad pretium equavit, & dilatata porta, pullus egressus est (12).' All the Ismaelites, who go to Mabomet's Sepulchre, pass by that of Ezekiel, and there leave their Offerings, making this Prayer to him, My Lord Ezekiel, if I return in good Health I will give you such or such a thing (12). Those, who undertake a long Journey, deposit upon this Tomb what they have most valuable, and say, My Lord Ezekiel, keep for me this precious Deposit till I return, and suffer none but my Heirs to touch it. Many of these Deposits have had time to rot there. They also leave Books at the same Tomb: a Man was struck blind for having attempted to steal one away. This place is richly adorned; and thirty Lamps are kept in it burning Night and Day. The money, arising from Vows, is laid out in the Reparation of the Synagogue, and to marry Orphans, and for the Maintenance of certain poor Scholars. The Presents and the ex voto's are so numerous, that there are two hundred Persons appointed to keep them by turns. Formerly there was a Pillar of Fire upon the Prophet's Tomb; but some prophane Persons having mixed themselves with the eighty thousand devout Pilgrims that were assembled at the Feast of Tabernacles, the fiery Column disappeared (13).

Here are a great many Fables; but from hence we may certainly infer this Truth: that the Invocation of the Saints has been long since a Practice of the Jews; for not to insist upon other Proofs, we see here the Rabbi Petachias making Offerings and Prayers to Ezekiel, and pretending they wrought a great Miracle. 'Ipse R. Petachias ad Ezechielis sepulchrum se contulit, obryzum, five auri grana manibus secum afferens. Ea cum ex manibus forte fortuna excidissent, Domine Ezechiel, inquit, tui honoris causa excessi, (& ceu fateri me par erat, dona mea quæ tibi litteram, mecum attuli.) Sed amissi grana (aurea, hinc rei destinata, improvide) & perierunt illa, nihilo minus ubicunque locorum jacent, tua sunt. (Dixerat hæc) & mox conspicit oculis suis, e longinquo, aliquid sideris instar micare: cum gemmam esse suspicaretur, eo se contulit, & rem scrutatus est, reperitque grana sua aurea, ac proinde Ezechielis sepulchro illa dedicavit (14). — Rabbi Petachias himself went to the Sepulchre of Ezekiel, carrying in his Hand some grains of fine Gold; as they had accidentally dropt out of his Hand, Lord Ezekiel, says he, for thy sake came I hither, and according to my Duty I brought with me a present for an Offering; but through my negligence have I lost the grains of Gold destined for that purpose: they indeed are lost; but wherever they be, be they thine. Having thus spoke, he turned his Eyes, and at a great distance beheld something glitter like a Star: imagining it to be a Gem he directed his way thither, and having examined it found it to be his grains of Gold, and dedicated them to the Sepulchre of Ezekiel. They would not publish these Fables among the Jews, if they looked upon the Invocation of Saints as a thing prohibited. The Protestants have reason to lament the shameful Credulity of this People, and the confidence of their Writers in publishing a hundred thousand foolish Stories; but every one ought to learn by what passes in his own Party, that in this place the Declivity is very slippery. How many things are practised by the Protestants now-a-days, which would not have been

(11) Petach. Peregrin. pag. 180.

(12) Domine Ezechiel si sanus saluque rediero dabo tibi hoc aut illud. Ibid. pag. 181.

(13) Taken from the Travels of the Rabbi Petachias, pag. 182.

(14) Ibid. pag. 180, 181.

REFLECTIONS upon the Inclination of People to Credulity.

